to prove them : who moved the Horse-men to divide themselves, and give the Charge, before the fign that was commanded. They answered him, that they were forced to do it against their wills, because a young MEGALIPOLITAN Gentleman gave a Charge with his Company, before the Decaute a young MEGALIPOLITAR Genneman gave a Charge with ins Company, before the Antigonus Isy- fign was given. Then Antigonus laughing, told them the young Gentleman played the part of a fign wife and valiant Captain. This exploit, together with Antigonus testimony, gave great reputation and Philosophy and Philosophy are many easily imagine. So King Antigonus marvellons in interested him he would unto Philopamen, as we may eafily imagine. So King Antigonus marvellously intreated him he would ferve with him, and offered hima Band of men at Arms, and great entertainment, if he would go with him. But Philopamen refuted his offer, and chiefly because he knew his own nature, that he could hardly abide to be commanded by any. Notwithflanding, because he could not be idle, he took Sea, and went into CRETA, were he knew there was Wars, onely to continue himself in exercife thereof. So when he had ferved a long time with the CRETANS, which were valiant Souldiers, and very expert in all policies and feats of War, and moreover were men of a moderate and fpare diet: he returned home again to ACHAIA, with fo great credit and reputation of every one, that he was prefently chosen Generall of all the Horsemen. So when he entred into his charge, he found many Horfemen very ill horfed, upon little Jades, fuch as might be gotten cheapeft, and that they used not to go themselves in person to the Wars, but did send other in their stead : and to be fhort, that they neither had hearts, nor experience of the Wars, and all because the Generals and Captains of the People of the AGHAIANS that ferved before him, did take no heed to those matters, as fearing to offend any, because they had the greatest authority in their hands, to punish or reward whom they thought good. Philopamen fearing none of all these things, would leave no part of his charge and duty undone, but went himself in person to all the Cities, to perswade and encourage the young Gentlemen, to be well horfed, and well armed, that they might win honour in the Field, be able to defend themselves, and overthrow their Enemies. And where perswassion could do no good, there he would fet fines upon their heads that fo refused, and did use to muster them oft, and did acquaint them with tilting, turnying, and barriers, and one to fight with another, and at fuch times and places specially, as he knew there would be multitudes of People to give them the looking on: that in fhort space he made them very forward, proper, and ready Horlemen, whose chiefest property is, to keep their order and ranks in the Battell. So as when necessity ferved for the whole Company of Horsemen to turn together, half turn, or whole turn, or else every man by himself: they were so throughly trained in it, that all the whole Troop set in Battell ray, did seem as it were to be but one body, they removed fo together, and withall so easily, and at all times, and fo oft, as they should turn, on the one side, or on the other. Now in a great Battell the ACHAI-ANS had with the ETOLIANS, and the ELIANS, by the River of Lariffus, Demophantus Generali of the Horsemen of the Etolians, came from his Company to fight with Philopamen, who allo made towards him, and gave him first such a blow with his Spear, that he strake him stark dead. When Demophaneus fell to the ground, his Souldiers fled by and by upon it. This wan Philopamen great honour, who gave no place to the youngest men in fighting most valiantly with his own hands: nor to the oldest men in wildom, for the wife leading of his Army. Indeed the first man that made the People of Achaia grow in power and greatness, was Araim: for before his time Achaia was of small reckoning, because the Cities of the same stood divided between themselves, and Aratim was the first man that made them joyn together, and stablished among them an honest civil government. Whereby it happened, that as we fee in Brooks and Rivers where any little thing floppeth and falleth to the bottom, which the course of the water bringeth down the stream, there the rest that followeth doth use to stay, and go no further : even so in the Cities of GREECE that were in hard state, and fore weakned, by faction one against another, the ACHAIANS were the first that staid themselves, and grew in amiry one with the other, and afterwards drew on the rest of the Cities into league with them, as good Neighbours and Confederates. Some by helping and delivering them from the oppression of Tyrants, and winning other also by their peaceable Government and good concord: they had a meaning in this wife to bring all the Countrey of PELOPONNESUS into one body and league. Nevertheless, while Aratus lived, they depended most upon the strength and power of the MACEDONIANS : first with sticking unto King Prolomy, and then unto Ansigonus, and last to Philip, who ruled in manner all the State of GREECE. But when Philopamen came to govern, and to be the chiefest man, the ACHAIANS being strong enough to refist the strongest, would march then no more under any other bodies Enfign, nor would fuffer any more strange Governours or Captains over them. For Aratus (as it feemed) was somewhat too soft and cold for the Wars, and therefore the most things he did, were by gentle intreaties, by intelligences, and by the Kings friendships with whom he was great, as we have at large declared in his life. But Philopamen being a man of execution, hardy and valiant of person, and of very good fortune, in the first Battell that ever he made, did marvelloufly increase the courage and hearts of the ACHAIANS : because under his charge they ever foiled their Enemies, and always had the upper hand of them. The first thing Philochangeth the Achains order Pamen began withall at his coming, he changed the manner of fetting of their Tables, and their falhion of arming themselves: for before they carried little light Targets, which because they were thin and narrow, did not cover half their bodies, and used Spears far shorter then Pikes, by reason whereof they were very light, and good to skirmish and fight afar off: but when they came to joyn Battell, their Enemies then had great vantage of them. As for the order of their Battels, they knew not what it meant, nor to cast themselves into a snail or ring, but onely used the square Battell, nor yet gave it any such front where the Pikes of many ranks might push together, and where the Souldiers might stand to close, that their Targets should touch one another, as they do in the Squadron of the Battell of the MACEDO-MIANS: by reason whereof, they were soon broken and overthrown. Philopamen reformed all this, perswading them to use the Pike and Shield, instead of the little Target, Spear, or Bore-staff, and to put good Morians or Burganets on their heads, Corfelets on their bodies, and good Taffes and Greaves to cover their thighs and legs, that they might fight it out manfully, not giving a foot of ground, as light armed men run to and fro in a Skirmith. And thus having perswaded and tought the young men to arm themselves throughly, first he made them the bolder and more couragious to fight, as if they had been men that could not have been overcome : then he turned all their vain Superfluous charge, into necessary and honest expences. But he could not possibly bring them altogether from their vain and rich Apparell they had of long time taken up, the one to exceed another; nor from their fumptuous furniture of houses, as in beds, hangings, curious service at the Table and delicate kind of dishes. But to begin to withdraw this desire in them, which they had to be fine and delicate kind of diffies. But to begin to winding with the first the first winding specifiary and profitable the turned all cuwished them to look more nearly to their ordinary charge about themselves, taking order as well riosity and for their Apparell, as also for their Diet, and to spare in them, to come honourably armed to the dainty fare into Field, for defence of their Countrey. Thereupon, it you had looked into the Gold-fmiths Shops, brave and rich ve should have seen nothing else in their hands, but breaking and battering of Pots of Gold and Sil- Armour. ver, to be cast and molten down again, and the gilding or Armours and Targets, and silvering of bits. In the shew-places for the running of Hortes, there was managing and breaking of young Horses, and young men exercising Arms. Womens hands were also tull of Morians and Headpieces, whereto they tied goodly brave plumes of Feathers of fundry colours, and were also full of imbroidered arming Coats and Caffocks, with curious and very rich Works. The fight of which bravery did heave up their hearts, and made them gallant and lively : fo as envy bred straight in them who should do best service, and no way spare for the Wars. Indeed, sumptuouiness and bravery in others fights, doth fecretly carry mens minds away, and allure them to feek after vanities, which makes them tender bodied, and womanish persons, because this sweet tickling and inticing of the outward fense, that is delighted therewith, doth straight melt and soften the strength and courage of the mind. But again, the sumptuous cost bestowed upon war Brave Armour like Furniture, doth incourage and make great a noble heart. Even as Homer faid it did Achil-incourageth like Furniture, doth incourage and make Armour and Weapons she had caused Vulcan to make for mens minds to serve nobly him, and layed them at his feet: who feeing them, could not tarry, but was straight fet on fire with desire to occupie them. So when Philopæmen had brought the Youth of ACHAIA to this good pass, to come thus bravely armed and furnished into the Field, he began then to exercise them continually in Arms: wherein they did not onely flew themselves obedient to him. but did moreover strive one to excell another, and to do better then their fellowes. For they liked marvellous well the ordering of the Battell he had taught them, because that standing so close together as they did, they thought furely they could hardly be overthrown. Thus by continuance of time, being much used to wear their Armour, they found them a great deal easier and lighter then before, beside the pleasure they rook to see their Armour so brave, and so rich: insomuch then before, before the pleature they took to see their Armout to brave, and to rich; informed as they longed for some occasion to try them straight upon their Enemies. Now the Achai made Wars and at that time were at Wars with Machanidas, the Tyrant of Lacedamon, who sought with Machanidas. by all device he could with a great Army, to become chief Lord of all the PELOPONNESI- day Tyrant of ANS. When news was brought that Machanidas was come into the Countrey of the MANTI- Lacedamon. NEANS, Philopamen straight marched towardshim with his Army: fo they met both not far from the City of MANTINEA, where by and by they put themselves in order of Battell. They both had entertained in pay a great number of strangers to serve them, besides the whole force of their Battell sought Countrey: and when they came to joyn Battell, Machanidas with his strangers gave such a lusty between Philo-Charge upon certain Slingers and Archers, being the Forlorn-hope whom Pilopamin had put pamenand before the Battell of the ACHAIANS to begin the skirmish, that he overthrew them, and made Machanidas. them flie withall. But where he should have gone on directly against the ACHAIANS that were ranged in Battell ray, to have proved if he could have broken them, he was very busic and earnest still, to follow the chase of them that first fled, and so came hard by the ACHAIANS that stood still in their Battell, and kept their Ranks. This great overthrow fortuning at the beginning, many men thought the ACHAIANS were but cast away. But Philopamen made as though it had been nothing, and that he let light by it; and fpying the great fault his Enemies made, following the Forlorn-hope on the spur, whom they had overthrown, and staying so far from the Battell of their Footmen, whom they had left naked, and the Field open upon them: he did not make towards them to ftay them, nor did strive to ftop them that they should not follow those that fled, but suffered them to take their course. And when he saw that they were gone a good way from their Footmen, he made his men march upon the LACEDEMONIANS, whose sides were naked, having no Horimen to guard them: and so did iet upon them on the one side, and ran so hastily on them to win one of their Flanks, that he made them flie, and slew withall a great number of them. For it is faid, there were four thousand LACEDEMONIANS slain in the Field, because they had no man to lead them. And moreover, they fay they did not look to fight, but supposed Fhilogramen orather they had won the Field, when they faw Machanidus chafing fill those upon the spur, chanidus Army, whom he had overthrown. After this Philopæmen retired to meet Muchanidas, who came back Tyrant of the

from the chase with the strangers. But by chance there was a great broad ditch between them, Lucidemoniant so as both of them rode upon the banks fide of the same, a great while together, one against anoto as pour or ment rout upon the convenient place to get over and flie, and the other fide feeking means to keep them from flarting away. So to fee the one before the other in this fort, it appeared as they had been wild Beafts brought to an extremity, to defend themselves by force, from fo fierce a hunter as Philopamen was. But while they were striving thus, the Tyranis Horse that was lufty and couragious, and felt the force of his Mafters fours pricking in his fides, that the bloud followed after, did venture to leap the ditch, coming to the banks fide, flood upon his hindmost legs, and advanced forward with his foremost feet, to reach to the other side. Then Simmiss and Polyanus, who were about Philopamen when he fought, ran thither straight to keep him in with their borestaves that he should not leap the ditch. But Philopamen who was there before them, perceiving that the Tyrants Horfe, by lifting up his head so high, did cover all his Mafers body: forfook by and by his Horfe, and took his Spear in both his hands, and thruft at the Tyrant with fo good a will, that he flew him in the ditch. In memory whereof, the ACHAIANS that did highly efteem this valiant act of his, and his wildom also in leading of the Battell, did set up his Image in brass in the Temple of Apollo in Delphos, in the form he flew the Tyrant. They fay, that at the Affembly of the common Games called Nemea (which they folemnize in honour of Hercules, not far from the City of Argos) and not long after he had won this Battell of MANTINEA, being made Generall the fecond time of the Tribe of the ACHAIANS, and being at good leifure also by reason of the Feat; he first shewed all the GRECIANS that were come thither to fee the Games and Paltimes , his Army ranged in order of Battell , and made them fee how easily they removed their places every way, as necessity and occasion of Fight required, without troubling or confounding their Ranks, and that with a marvellous force and readiness. When he had done this, he went into the Theater to hear the Mustrians play and fing to their Instruments, who should win the best Game, being accompanied with lusty young Gentlemen apparelled in Porple Cloaks, and in Scarlet Coats and Caffocks they wore upon their Armour, being all in the flower of their youth, and well given and disposed: who did greatly honour and reverence their Captain, and befides that shewed themselves inwardly of noble hearts, being incouraged by many notable Bat-their Enemies. And by chance, as they were entred into the Theater, Pylades the Multian, finging

When he had sweetly fung out aloud these noble Verses, passingly well made, the whole Assembly of the Grecians in the Theater, that were gathered thither to fee the Games, cast all their eyes Araight upon Philopamin, and clapped their hands one to another for joy, because of the great hope they had in him, that through him they should soon recover their ancient reputation; and so imagined they possessed already the noble and worthy minds of their Ancestors. And as young Horses that do always look to be ridden by their ordinary Riders, if any stranger get upon their backs, do ftraight wax strange to be handled, and make great ado: even so when the ACHAIANS came to any dangerous Battell, their hearts were even down, if they had any other Generall or Leader then Philopamen, on whom still they depended and looked. And when they faw him, ever the whole Army rejoyced, and defired ftraight to be at it, they had fuch confidence in his valiantness and good fortune: and truly not without cause. For of all men , their Enemies did sear him most, and durst not stand before him : because they were afraid to hear his name onely, as it seemed by their doings. For Philip King of MACEDON (imagining that if he should find means to dispatch Philopeams out of the way, howfoever it were, the ACHAIANS would straight take part again with him) fent men fecretly into the City of Argos, to kill him by treaton: howbeit the practice was discovered, and the King ever after was mortally hated of all the GRECIANS generally, and taken for a wicked and cowardly Prince. It fortuned one day when the BOEOTIANS layed fiege to the City of MEGARA, and thought certainly to have won it at the first assault, there rose a rumour suddenly amongst them , that Philopemen came to aid the City, and was not far from it with his Army. But it was a falfe report. Notwithstanding, the BOEOTIANS were so scared, that for fear they left their fealing-Ladders behind them, which they had fet against the Walls, to have scaled the Town, and fled straight to save themselves. Another time, when Nabis the Tyrant of LACEDEMON, that succeeded Machanidas, had taken the City of Messina upon a sudden: Philoparan being then a private man, and having no charge of Souldiers, went unto Lyfippu Generall of the ACHAIANS that year, to perswade him that he would fend present aid unto them of Messina. Lifform toldhim, it was too late now to go thither, and that it was but a loft Town, not to be holpen; confidering the Enemies were in it already. Philopamen perceiving he could not procure him to go, went thither himself with the force of MESSINA onely, not flaying for the affembly of the MEGALIPOLITANS, that were in counfell about it, to give them Commillion by voyces of the People to take him with them: but they all willingly followed him, as if he had been their continuall Generall, and the man that by nature was worthieft of all other to command them. Now when he came near unto MESSINA, Nabis hearing of his coming, durft not tarry him, though he had his Army within the City, but stole out at another Gate, and marched away in all the haftene could, thinking himself a happy man if he could so scape his hands, and retire with fafety, as indeed he did. And thus was MESSINA by his means delivered from captivity.

PHILOPOEMEN.

All that we have written hitherto concerning Philopamen, falleth out doubtless to his great honour and glory: but afterwards he was greatly dispraised for a journey he made into CRETA, at Philopamende. the request of the GORTYNIANS, who sent to pray him to be their Captain, being fore trou-livered to Ci the request of the GORTYNIANS, who tent to pray min to be then captain, being tote troubled with Wars at that time. Because Philogomen went then to serve the GORTYNIANS, when trom Nabis the the Tyrant Nabis had greatest Wars with the MEGALIPOLITANS in their own Country, they iron Nabis the Tyrant of Lalaid it to his charge, either that he did it to fly the Wars, or elfe that he fought honour out of fee- ccdamon. fon with forrain Nations, when his poor Citizens the MEGALIPOLITANS were in fuch distress, Fillepanens that their Countrey being loft and destroyed, they were driven to keep them within their City, and second journey to fow all their void Grounds and Streets in the same with Corn, to sustain them withall, when into Creta and commended. their Enemies were incamped almost hard at their own Gates. And the rather, because himself making Wars with the CRETANS, and ferving strangers beyond the Sea in the mean time, gave his Enemies occasion to slander him that he fled, that he would not tarry to fight for defence of his own Countrey. Again, there were that faid, because the ACHAIANS did chuse other for their Generall, that he being a private man and without charge, was the rather contented to be Generall of the GORTYNIANS, who had marvelloully intreated him to take the charge: for he was a man that could not abide to live idely, and that defired specially above all things to serve continually in the Wars, and to put in practife his skill and discipline in the leading of an Army. The words he spake one day of King Ptolomie do witness as much : for when there were some that praised King Ptolomie highly, faying that he trayned his Army well, and that he still continued his perion in exercife of Armes: It is not commendable for a King (faid he) of his years, to delight in training his men to exercife Armes, but to do some Act himself in person. Well, in the end, the MEGALI-POLITANS took his absence in such evil part, that they thought it a piece of treason, and would needs have banished him , and put him from the freedom of the City : had not the ACHAIANS fent their Generall Aristantu unto them, who would not suffer the sentence of banishment to pass against him, although otherwise there was ever contention between them about matters of the Common-wealth. Afterwards Philopamen perceiving his Countreymen made no more account Philopamen of him, to spite them withall, he made divers small Villages and Cities rebell against them, and made divers small villages and cities rebell against them, and Cities to rebell taught them to fay, and to give it out, that they were not their subjects, neither paid them tribute against the from the beginning: and he made them stand to it openly, and maintain their sedition against the Megaliphinan. City of MEGALIPOLIS, before the Councill of the ACHAIANS. Thefethings happened shortly after. But whilest he made Wars in CRETA for the GORTYNIANS , he shewed not himfelf a PELOPONNESIAN, nor like a man born in ARCADIA, to make plain and open Wars: but he had learned the manner of the CRETANS, to use their own policies, fine devices, and ambushes against themselves. And made them know also, that all their crassswere but childish sports as The Cretans it were, in respect of those that were devised, and put in execution, by a wise experienced Captain politick men and skilfull to fisht a Battell. So Philanamen. having went great farms by his captain. and skilfull to fight a Battell. So Philopamen, having won great fame by his acts done in CRE-TA, returned again to Peloponnesus, where he found that Philip King of MACEDON had TA, tetting again to February what he foliate that Fitting and of MACEDON had Philogement been overcome in Battell, by T. Q. Flaminius: and that the ACHAIANS joyning with the Romade Generall and Generall and Generall immediately upon his return, and gave him Battell by Sea. In the which it feemed he fell into like misforman against the Tyran Carlot of the Atherican Action of the Atherican Carlot of the Atherica tune, as Epaminonda did : the event of this Battell falling out much worse with him then was looked Nabin. for, in respect of his former courage and valiantness. But as for Epaminordas, some say he returned willingly out of Asia, and the Isles, without any Exploit done, because he would not have his Countreymen fleshed with spoil by Sea, as searing left of valiant Souldiers by Land, they would by little and little (as Plato faid) become diffolute Mariners by Sea, But Philopamen contrariwise, prefuming on the skill he had to fet the Battell in good order by Land, would needs take upon him to do the fame by Sea. But he was taught to his cost, to know what exercise and experience meant, and how strong it maketh them that are practifed in things, For he lost not onely the Battell by Sea, being unskilfull of that service: but he committed besides a souler error. For he caused an old Ship to be rig-overcome by ged, which had been very good of fervice before, but not occupied in forty years together, and em- Sea. barqued his Countreymen into the same, which were all likely to perish, because the Ship had divers leaks, by fault of good calking. This overthrow made his Enemies despise him utterly, perswading themselves he was fled for altogether, and had given them Sea-room: whereupon they laid siege to the City of GYTHIUM. Philopamen being advertised thereof, imbarqued his men suddenly, and Nahibbesiegeth fet upon his Enemies ere they wift it, or had any thought of his coming; and found them ftragling up the City of and down, without Watch or Guard, by reason of the Victory they had lately won. So he landed his men closely by night, and went and set fire upon his Enemies Camp, and burnt it every whit: and in this fear and hurly-burly, flew a great number of them. Shortly after this fealing upon them, the Tyrant Nabis also stole upon him again unawares, as he was to go through a marvellous ill and dangerous way: which made the ACHAIANS amazed at the first, thinking it unpossible for them that they could ever scape that danger, confidering their enemies kept all the ways thereabouts. But Philopamen berhinking himself, and considering the nature and situation of the place: after he had viewed it well, he shewed them plainly then, that the chiefest point of a good Souldier and man of War, was to know how to put an Army in Battell , according to the time and fituation of the place. For he did but alter the form of his Battell a little, and forced it according to the fittation of the place, wherein he was compassed : and by doing this without trouble or business, he took awayall fear of danger, and gave a charge upon his Enemies in such sterce wise, that in a short

And when he perceived that they did not flie all in Troups together Philapzmen o- towards the City, but feattering wife, abroad in the Fields in every place, he caufed the Trumpet to towards the Country tout the Country found the Retrait. Then he commanded the chase to be followed no further, for that all the Country tound the retrait. Then be commissioned the country thereabout was full of thick Woods and Groves, very ill for Horfemen: and also because there were thereapout was run of times woods and Olives, the standard part over, he encamped himself premany Brooks, Valleys and Quavemires, which they should pass over, he encamped himself premany proofs, vancys and And so, fearing left his Enemies would in the night time draw unto the fently, being yet broad day. And so, fearing left his Enemies would in the night time draw unto the city, one after another, and by couples: he fent a great number of ACHAIANS, and laid them in one anter anomics, and Hills near about it, which made great flaughter of Nabia Souldiers, amouth amongst the Brooks and Hills near about it, which made great flaughter of Nabia Souldiers, amount amongs the brooks and the land about a featuringly one after another as they fled, one here because they came not all rogether in Troups, but scatteringly one after another as they fled, one here pecaute they came not an iogenical an interpretation of the formers Net. Thefe acts made another there, and so fell into their Enemies hands, as Birds into the Fowlers Net. These acts made another there, and to the made that Editional Manage, and they did him great honour in all their Thea-Titus Quintila tersand common Affemblies. Whereat T. Q. Flaminim, of nature very ambitious and covetous of ters and common anemones. Whereat a confining that a Confull of Rome should honour, did much repine, and was envious at the matter, thinking that a Confull of Rome should have place and honour among the ACHAIANS before a mean Gentleman of ARCADIA. And have place and monout among the Action of the Philogamen had: confidering how by the he imagined he had deferved better of all Greece, then Philogamen had: ne imagined ne nau deletved octier of an Okabele, man Ambigament Consisting now by the onely Proclamation of an Herauld, he had reftored Greece again to her ancient liberty, which before his coming was subject to King Philip, and unto the MACEDONIANS. Afterwards, T. Quinby the Æisi- iim made peace with the Tyrant Nabis, who was shortly after very trayteroully slain by the Ærotim made peace with the Lyran Araba, who was mostly made by the Erooccasion, went thither with his Army, and handled the matter so wifely, that partly for love, and partly by force, he wan the City, and joyned it unto the tribe of the ACHAIANS. So was he marvellously oytore, he wan the City, and printed trained that so notable Victory, to have won their Tribe and commended and effected of the Achaians for this notable Victory, to have won their Tribe and Commonalty fo famous a City, and fo great estimation. For the City of Sparta was no small increase of their power, being joyned as a member of ACHAIA. Moreover he wan by this means the love and good will of all the honeft men of LACED. MON, for the hope they had to find him a Protector and defendor of their Liberty. Wherefore, when the Tyrant Nabu house and goods were fold, as forfeited to the State: they refolved in their Councell to make him a Prefent of the Money thereof, which amounted to the fum of fixfcore Talents, and fent Ambaffadours purpofely unto him, to offer wince amounted to the main of material states, the man state of the man states of th deed. For first of all, there was not one of all the LACEDEMONIANS that durft prefume to offer him this Money, but every man was afraid to tell him of it; and every body that was appointed to do it, made fome excuse or other for themselves. Notwithstanding, in the end they made one Timolaus to take the matter upon him, who was his familiar friend, and also his Host. And yet the same Timelans when the came unto MEGALIPOLIS, and was lodged and entertained in Philopamens house, did so much reverence him for his wife talk and conversation, for his moderate diet, and just dealing with all men: that he faw there was no likely possibility to corrupt him with Money, so as he durst not once open his mouth to fpeak to him of the Prefent he had brought him, but found fome other occasion to excuse the cause of his coming unto him. And being sent unto him again the second time, he did even as much as at the first time. And making a third proof, he ventured at the last to open the matter unto him, and told him the good will the City of SPARTA did bear him. Philopamen became a glad man to hear it: and when he had heard all he had to fay to him, he went himself unto the City of Sparta. There he declared unto the Councill, that it was not honest men and their good friends, they should feek to win and corrupt with Money, confidering they might command their vertue upon any occasion, without cost unto them: but that they should seek to bribe naughty men with money, and such as by montant how feditious Orations in Councill did mutiny, and put a whole City in uprore: to the end that having their they flould bethey mound be. Row their gifts, mouths ftopped with gifts, they should trouble them the lefs in the Common-wealth. For, said he, it is more accellary to stop your Enemies mouths, and to sow up their lips from liberty of speaking, then it is to keep your friends from it. So noble a man was Philogamn against all covetousness of Money. Shortly after, the LACEDEMONIANS beginning to ftir again, Diophanes (who was then Generall of the ACHAIANS) being advertised of it, began to prepare to punish them. The LACE-DAMONIANS on the other fide preparing for the Wars, did fet all the Countrey of PELOPONNEsus in Arms. Hereupon Philopamen fought to pacifie Diophanes anger, declaring unto him, that King Antiochus, and the ROMANS, being at wars together at that present time, and they both having puissant Armies one against another in the middest of GREECE, it was meet for a good Generall and wife Governour, to have an eye to their doings, to be carefull of the same, and to beware that he did not trouble or alter any thing within his Countrey at that instant, but then rather to diffemble it, and not to feem to hear any fault whatfoever they did. Diophanes would not be perswaded, but entred Displanes and the Territories of LACEDEMON with a great Army, and T. Quintims Flaminius with him: and they together marched directly towards the City of Sparta. Philopamen was fo mad with their doings, invade Lucile, that he took upon him an enterprize not very lawfull, nor altogether just : nevertheless his attempt proceeded of a noble mind and great courage. For he got into the City of Sparta, and being but a private person, kept out the Generall of the ACHAIANS, and the Consull of the ROMANS for entring the City: and when he had pacified all troubles and feditions in the fame, he delivered it up again as it was before, into the hands of the Commonalty of the ACHAIANS. Nevertheless himself being afterwards Generall of the ACHAIANS, did compell the LACED & MONIANS to receive those home again whom they had banished for certain faults, and did put eighty natural born Citizens of SPARTA unto death, as Polybius writeth : or threehundred and fifty, as Ariftocrates another Histo-

PHILOPOEMEN. riographer reciteth. Then he pulled down the Walls of the City, and razed them to the ground and took away the most part of their Territories, and gave them to the MEGALIPOLITANS.

All those whom the Tyrants had made free Denizons of SPARTA, he compelled them to depart the Countrey of LACEDEMON, and forced them to dwell in ACHAIA, three thousand onely excepted, who would not obey his commandment : all those he sold for Slaves, and with the Money he made of them (to spight them the more) he built a goodly fair walk within the City of MEGA-

LIPOLIS. Yet furthermore, to do the LACEDEMONIANS all the mischief he could, and as it were, to tread them under the feet in their most grievous misery, he did a most cruell and unjust act toward them. For he compelled them to leave the discipline and manner of education of their act toward them. For he compelled them to leave the discipline and manner or education of their Philosemen, which Lycurgus had of old time infittituded; and made them to follow the manner the A. Philosemen made the oper-CHAIANS used, in lieu of their old grounded Countrey custom, because he saw they would never tast forfake be humble minded, fo long as they kept Lycurgus order and inftitution. Thus were they driven to Lycurgus Lays put their heads in the coller, by the milerable milhap that befell them : and in all despight, to stuffer Philonamen in this manner to cut afunder (as it were) the finews of their Common-wealth. But afterwards they made fute to the ROMAN'S, that they might be fuffered to enjoy their ancient difcipline again, which being granted them, they straight left the mainer of the ACHAIANS, and did fet up again as much as was possible (after so great misery and corruption of their manners) their old ancient customs and orders of their Countrey. Now about the time the Wars began in GREECE between the ROMANS and King Antiochus, Philopamen was then a private man and without any Authority. He feeing that King Anisochus lay still in the City of CHALCIS, and did nothing but feaft and love, and had married a young Maid far unmeet for his years: and per-lace and married ceiving that his Syrian Souldiers wandred up and down the Towns in great diforder, playing age at Chalche.

many lewd parts without guide of Captains, he was very forry he was not at that time Generall of the ACHAIANS, and told the ROMANS, that he envied their Victory, having Wars with Enemies that were so easily to be overcome. For (faid he) if Fortune favoured me that I were Gene. Philopemens rall of the ACHAIANS at this prefent, I would have killed them every man in the Cellars and tip- counfel against ling Houses. Now when the ROMANS had overcome Antiochus, they began to have surer footing in GREECE, and to compass in the ACHAIANS on all sides, and specially, by reason the Heads and Governours of the Cities about them did yeeld to the ROMANS, to win their favour, And now their greatness grew in haste, by the favour of the gods, so as they were become the Monarch of the whole World, who brought them now to the end that Fortune had determined Philopamen in the mean time did like a good Pilot, refifting against the billows and roughness of the waves. And though for the time he was forced to give place, and to let things pass, yet for all that he was against the ROMANS, and did withstand them in the most part of their proceedings, by feeking ever to defend the liberty of those, who by their eloquened and well-doing carried great Authority among the Achaians. And when Ariftanetus MEGALIPOLITAN, (2 man of great authority among the ACHAIANS, and one that ever bare great devotion to the ROMANS) faid in open Senate among the ACHAIANS, that they should deny the ROMANS nothing, nor shew fered him to speak (though it boyled in his heart, he was so angry with him) and in the end, breaking all patience, and as one overcome with choler, he faid : Aristanetsu, why have you fuch hast to fee the unfortunate end of GREECE? Another time when Manin Confull of ROME (after he had conquered King Antiochus) did make request to the Councill of the ACHAIANS, that fuch as were banished from LACEDEMON, might return home into their Countrey again, and that Titm Quinthemselves unthankfull to them: Philopamen hearing what he said, held his peace a while, and suftus Flaminius also did earnestly intreat them : Philopamen was against it, not for any hatred he bare unto the banished men, but because he would have done it by his own mean, and the onely grace of the ACHAIANS, to the end they should not be beholding for so good a turn, neither unto Titme, nor yet to the ROMANS. Afterwards he himself, being Generall of the ACHAIANS, did reftore them wholly to their own again. Thus was a bilopamen fometime a little too bold and quar-rellous, by reason of his great stomach: and specially when any man sought for to have things by Authority. Lastly, being threescore and ten years of age, he was the eight time chosen Generall Philopement of the ACHAIANS, and hoped well, not onely to pass the year of his charge in peace and quiet- chosen the nels, but also all the rest of his life without any stir of new Wars, he saw the affairs of GREECE take General of the fo good fuccefs. For like as the force and ftrength of fickness declineth, as the natural ftrength of Achaians, the fickly body impaireth : fo through all the Cities and People of GREECE, the defire of quarrell and being feventy of Wars furceased, as their power diminished. Nevertheless, in the end of his years government, the years old. gods divine (who juftly punish all insolent words and deeds) threw him to the ground, as they suffer a Rider unfortunately to take a fall off his Horse, being come almost to the end of his career. For they write, that he being in a place on a time amongst good company, where one was marvellously praised for a good Captain, faid unto them: Why Masters, can ye commend him that was contented to be taken Prisoner alive of his Enemies ? Shortly after came news that Dinocrates MESSINIAN (2 private Enemy of Philopamens for certain controversies past between them, and a man generally hated befides of all honourable and vertuous men, for his licentious wicked life) had withdrawn the City of MESSINA from the devotion of the ACHAIANS : and moreover, that he came with an Army to take a Town called COLONIDE. Philopamen was at that time in the City of Philopamens ARGOS, fick of an Ague, and yet he hearing these news, took his Journey towards MEGALIFO- journey against Lis, making all the hafte he could possible, for that he came above four hundred furlongs that day. Dinocrates.

thereupon the poyfon wrought his effect, and rid him straight out of his pain. The news of his Philopament death can prefently through all ACRAZA, which generally from high to low was lamented, death.

Whereupon all the ACHAIANS Youth and Counfellours of their Cities and Towns affembled them-laid him down as before. So nature trove not much within, his body being brought fo low, and taken.

Straight he departed thence towards MESSINA, and tarried not, but took with him a Company of men at Arms of the luftieft and wealthieft MEGALIPOLITANS: who were all young noble men of the City, and willingly offered themselves to go with him for the good will they bare him, and for the defire they had to follow his valiantness. Thus went they on their way towards the City of Most Evander, MESSINA, and marched follong, that they came near to the hill of Evander, where they met with Dinerates and his company, and gave to fierce an onfet on them, that they made them all turn tail: howbeit in the mean while, there came a relief of five hundred men to Dissocrates, which he had left to keep the Countrey of MESSINA. The flying men that were feattered here and there, feeing this fupply, gathered themselves again together, and shewed upon the hills, Philopamen searing to be environed, and being defirous to bring his men fafe home again, who most of love had followed him: began to march away through narrow bully places, himfelf being in the rereward, and turned oftentimes upon his Enemies, and skirmifhed with them; onely to drive them away from following oftenumes upon ins Engines, and skirimined with them; onely to drive find away nome of the reft of his company, and not a man that durft once let upon him: for they did but cry out aloot, and wheel as it were about him. Howbeit Philopamen fundry times venturing far from his company, to give thefe young Noblemen leifure to fave themselves one after another: took no heed to himfelf that he was alone environed on every fide with a great number of Enemies. Notwithstanding, of all his Enemies there was not a man that durft come to handstrokes with him, but ftill slinging and shooting at him afar off, they drave him in the end amongst stony places between hewn rocks, where he had much ado to guide his Horfe, although he had fpurred him that he was all of a gore blood. ne nau much aud to gunae in a and e, and and put it is age, that did not let him but he might have faved himself, for he was ftrong and lufly by the continual exercise he took: but by curted hap his body being weak with fickness, and weary with the long journey he had made that day, he found himself very heavy and ill disposed, that his Horfe stumbling with him , threw him to the ground. His fall was very great , and brused all his head, that he lay for dead in the place a great while, and never firred nor spake: fo that his Enemies thinking behad been dead, came to turn his body to ftrip him. But when they faw him lift up his head and open his eyes, then many of them fell all at once upon him and took him, and bound both his hands behind him, and did all the villany and mischief they could unto him, and such, as one would little have thought Dinocrates would have used in that fort, or that he could have had such an ill thought towards him. So they that tarried behind in the City of Messina, were marvellous glad when they heard these news, and ran all to the Gates of the City to see him brought in. When they faw him thus shamefully bound and pinioned, against the Dignity of so many Honours as he had received, and of fo many Triumphs and Victories as he had passed: the most part of them wept for pity, to consider the mishap and ill fortune of mans nature, where there is so little certainty, as in manner it is nothing. Then began there fome courteous speech to run in the mouths of the People by little and little, that the flould remember the great good he had done them in times paft, and the liberty he had reftored them unto, when he expulled the Tyrant Nabu out of Messina. But there were other again (howbeit very few) that to please Dinocrates, said they should hang him on a gibber, and put him to death as a dangerous Enemy, and that would never forgive man that had once offended him: and the rather, because he would be more terrible to Dinocrates then ever he was before, if he escaped his hands, receiving such open shame by him. Nevertheless, in the end they carried him into a certain Dungeon under the ground, called the Treasury (which had neither light nor air at all into it, nor door, nor half-door, but a great stone relled on the mouth of the Dungeon) and so they did let him down the fame, and stopped the hole again with the stone, and watched it with armed men for to keep him. Now when these young noble Acha-IAN Horsemen had fled upon the spur a great way from the Enemy, they remembred themselves, and looked round about for Philopamen: and finding him not in fight, they supposed straight, he had been slain. Thereupon they staid a great while, and called for him by name, and perceiving he anfwered not, they began to fay among themselves, they were beafts and cowards to flie in that for: and how they were dishonoured for ever for phave for laken their Caprain, to fave themselves, who had not spared his own life to deliver them from danger. Hereupon riding on their way, and entitled on the control of quiring fill for him, they were in the end advertifed how he was taken. And then they went and carried those news through all the Towns and Cities of ACHAIA, which were very forry for him, and took it as a fign of great ill fortune towards them. Whereupon they agreed to fend Ambassa dors forthwith to the Messinians, to demand him : and in the mean time every man should prepare to arm themselves to go thither, and get him either by force or love. When the ACHA-IANS had thus fent, Dinocrates feared nothing to much, as that delay of time might fave Philopamen, life: wherefore to prevent it, as foon as night came, and that the People were at reft, he ftraight eauled the stone to be rolled from the mouth of the Dungeon, and willed the Hangman to be let down to Thil pamen with a cup of poylon to offer him, who was commanded also not to go from him, untill he had drunk it. When the Hangman was come down, he found Philopamen laid on the ground upon a little Cloak, having no lift to sleep, he was fo grievoully troubled in his mind. Who when he saw light, and the man standing by him, holding a cup in his hand with this poyson, he face upright upon his Couch, howbeit with great pain, he was fo weak, and taking the cup in his hand, asked the Hangman if he heard any news of the Horfemen that came with him, specially of Lycortas. The Hangman made him answer, that the most of them were faved. Then he cast his hands a little over his head, and looking merrily on him, he faid: It is well, feeing we are not all unfortunate. Therewith speaking no more words, nor making other ado, he drunk up all the poyson, and into their City. But Dinocrates would not give them leifure to execute him by justice for he killed death into unit Cay. The state of the put to death. But those that would have had Philopamen hanged on a gibber, Lyeore as caused them to be taken, which afterwards were put to death with all kind of torments. That done, they burnt Philopament Philopamens body, and did put his afhes into a pot. Then they ftraight departed from MESSINA; funerall, not in disorder, one upon anothers neck as every man lifted : but in such an order and ray, that in the midst of the Funerals, they did make a Triumph of Victory. For the Souldiers were all crowned with Garlands of Laurell in token of victory, notwithstanding the tears ran down their cheeks in token of forrow, and they led their Enemies Prisoners, shackled and chained. The Funerall pot in the which were Philopamens ashe, swas so covered with Garlands of Flowers, Nosegays, and Laces. that it could feant be feen or diferened, and was carried by one Polybian a young man, the Son of Licertan, that was Generall at that time to the ACHAIANS : about whom there marched all the noblest and chiefest of the ACHAIANS, and after them also followed all the Souldiers armed, and their Horses very well furnished. The rest, they were not so forrowfull in their countenances, as they are commonly which have great cause of forrow: nor yet so joyfull, as those that came Conquerors from fo great a Victory. Those of the Cities, Towns and Villages in their way as they past, came and prefented themselves unto them, to touch the Funerall-pot of his asnes, even as they were wont to take him by the hand, and to make much of him when he was returned from the Wars: and did accompany his Convoy unto the City of MEGALIPOLIS: at the Gates whereof were old men. women and children, which trufting themselves amongst the Souldiers, did renew the tears. forrows and lamentations, of all the miserable and unfortunate City: who took it that they had loft with their Citizens, the first and chiefest place of honour among the ACHAIANS. So he was buried very honourably, as appertained unto him : and the other Prisoners of MESSINA Were all ftoned to death, about his Sepulcher. All the other Cities of ACHAIA, besides many other honours they did unto him, did fet up Statues, as like to him as could be counterfeited. Afterwards in the unfortunate time of GREECE, when the City of CORINTH was burnt and destroyed by the ROMANS, there was a malicious ROMAN that did what he could to have the fame pulled down again, by burdening and accusing Philopamen (as if he had been yet alive) that he was always ene- Note the humy to the ROMANS, and envied much their prosperity and Victories. But after Polybius had an manity of the fwered him , neither the Confull Mammiu, nor his Counfellors, nor Lieutenants , would fuffer them Romans, keepfwered him, neither the Contou Mannaum, nor us commenors, nor Lacutenants, wound nuter them to deface and take away the honours done in memory of to famous and worthy a man, although he ing their Enemies Monuhad many ways done much burt unto Piene Quintim Flaminiu, and unto Maniu. So, these good ments from men then made a difference between Dury and Profit ; and did think Honefty and Profit two di-defacing, fling things, and to feparated one from the other, according to reason and justice. Moreover, they were persuaded, that like as men receive courtesse and goodness of any, so are they bound to requite them again with kindness and duty. And as men use to acknowledge the same : even so ought men to honour and reverence Vertue. And thus much of the Life of Philopamen.

The end of the Life of Philopoemen.

Whereupon an the Acada Lipolis, where they all agreed without delay to revenge his death.

They made Lipona their Generall, under whose conduct they invaded the MESSINIANS, with The Advisor force and violence, putting all to the fire and fword : fo as the Messinians were fo feared with did revenge this merciles fury, that they yeelded themselves, and wholly consented to receive the Achaians Philopamens is easie to fee Titu Quintim Flaminim form and stature, by Philopamen: Statue of Brass, to whom we compare him: the which is now set up at ROME, near to great Apollo that was brought from CARTHAGE, and is placed right against the coming into the Shew-place, under which there is an Inscription in Greek Letters. But for his nature and conditions, they fay of him thus: he would quickly be angry, and yet very ready to pleasure men again. For if he did punish any man that had angred him, he would do it gently, but his anger did not long continue with him. He did good allo to many, and ever loved them whom he had once pleafured, as if they had done him some pleafure : and was ready to do for them still whom he found thankfull, because he would ever make them beholden to him, and thought that as honourable a thing as he could purchase to himself, because he greatly sought Honour above all things; when any notable fervice was to be done, he would do it himself, and no man should take it out of his hand. He would ever be rather with them that needed his help, then with those that could help him, or do him good. For, the first he esteemed as a mean to exercise his Vertue with : the other, he took them as his fellows and followers of Honour with him. He came to mans state, when the City of ROME had greatest Wars and trouble: At that time all the Youth of ROME, which were of age to carry Weapon, were fent to the War to learn to trail the Pike, and how to become good Captains. Thus was he entred into Martiall affairs, and the Titus Quintins first charge he took, was in the War against Hannibal of CARTHAGE, where he was made Colonell of a thouland Footmen, under Marcellin the Confull: who being flain by an ambush Hannibal had laid for him between the Cities of BANCIA and VENUSA, then they did choose Time Quintim Flaminius Governour of the Province and City of TARENTUM, which was now taken again the second time. In this Government of his, he wan the reputation as much of a good and just man, as he did of an expert and skilfull Captain. By reason whereof, when the ROMANS were requested to send men to inhabit the Cities of NARNIA and Cossa, he was appointed the chief Offices before Leader of them, which chiefly gave him heart and courage to aspire at the first to the Consulfhip, par-Confull.

Leader of them, which cherry gave multicart and comage to apparent by which (as by degrees) of fing over all other mean Offices, as to be Ædile, Tribune, or Prætor, by which (as by degrees) other young men were wont to attain the Confulship. Therefore when the time came that the Confuls should be elected, he did present himself among other, accompanied with a great number of those he had brought with him, to inhabit the two new Towns, who did make earnest fuit for him. But the two Tribunes Fulvius and Manlins, spake against him, and said: It was out of all reason, that so young a man should in such manner prease to have the Office of the highest Dignity, against the use and custom of ROME, before he had passed through the inferiour Offices of the Commonwealth. Nevertheless, the Senate preferred it wholly to the voices of the People : who presently pronounced him Consull openly, with Sextins Elius, although he was not yet T.Q. Flamini-Thirty years old. Afterwards, Alius and he dividing the Offices of the State by Lot, it fell upon us. Titus Quintins to make War with Philip King of MACEDON. In the which me thinks Forume Sextias Alias greatly favoured the ROMANS affairs, that made such a man Generall of these Wars : for T. Q. War any long time, to furnish himsels with Money and Victualls, to have a place and Cities to retire unto : and laftly, to have all other necessaries for his men and Army, it stood him upon to get the force of Greece. And had not the force of Greece been politically cut from him, the Wars against him had not been ended with one Battell. Moreover, GREECE (which never before bare the ROMANS any great good will) would not have dealt then so inwardly in friendship with them, had not their Generall been (as he was) a gentle Person, lowly and tractable, that wan them Titus courtesie more by his wisdom, then by his force, and could both eloquently utter his mind to them, and wan the Grecicourteoufly also hear them speak, that had to do with him, and chiefly ministred justice, and equity to every man alike. For it is not to be thought that GREECE would otherwise so soon have withdrawn themselves from the rule of those, with whom they were acquainted, and governed : and have put themselves under the rule of strangers, but that they saw great justice and lenity in them. Howbeit that may more plainly appear by declaring of his Acts. Titus was informed, that the Generalls before him fent to the War in MACEDON (as Sulpitius, and Publius Julius) used to come thither about the latter end of the year, and made but cold Wars, and certain light skirmishes, as sometime in one place, and sometime in another against Philip, and all to take some straight, or to cut off Victuals: which he thought was not his way to follow their example. For they tarrying at home, confumed the most of their Consulthip at ROME, in matters of Government, and so injoyed the Honour of their Office. Afterwards in the end of their year, they would fet out to the Wars, of intent to get another year over their heads in their Office, that spending one year in their Consulship at home, they might employ the other in the Wars abroad. But Titus not minding to trifle out the half of his Confulfhip at ROME, and the other abroad in the Wars : did willingly leave all his Honours and dignities, he might have enjoyed by his Office at Rome, and befought the Senate that they would appoint his Brother Lucius Quintins Lieutenant of their Army by Sea. Furthermore, he took with himself about three thousand old Souldiers of those that had first overthrown Asarubal in Spain, and Hannibal afterwards in A-FRICK, under the conduct of Scipio, which yet were able to ferve, and were very willing to go with in Epirus. him in his journey, to be the strength of his Army. With this company he passed the Seas without danger, and landed in Epirus, where he found Publius Julius encamped with his Army before King Apples 6. Philip, who of long time had lien in Camp about the mouth of the River of Aplus, to keep their straight and passage which is the entry into Epirus. So that Publins Julius had lain still there, and done nothing, by reason of the naturall force and hardness of the place. Then Titus took the Army of him, and fent him to ROME. Afterwards, himself went in Person to view and consider the nature of the Countrey, which was in this fort. It is a long valley walled on either fide with great high Mountains, as those which thut in the valley of Tempe in Thessaly : howbeit it had no such goodly Woods, nor green Forests, nor fair Medows, nor other like places of pleasure, as the other fide had: but it The descriptinor green Foreits, nor fair Medows, nor other like places or pleasure, as the other ride had; but it on of the was a great deep marith or quavernire, through the midft whereof the River called Apfus did run Countrey of being in greatness and swiftness of stream, very like to the River of Peneus: the River did Epirus. occupy all the ground at the feet of the Mountains, faving a little way that was cut out of the main Rock by mans hand, and a narrow straight path by the waters side, very unhandsome for an Army to pals that way, though they found not a man to keep the paffage. There were some in the Army that counselled Titus to fetch a great compass about by the Countrey of DASSARETIDE, and by the City of Lyncus, where the Countrey is very plain, and the way marvellous easie. Howbeit he flood in great fear he should lack Victuals, if he staid far from the Sea; and happily if he fell into any barren or lean Countrey, (Philip refusing the Battell , and purposing to flie) he should be constrained in the end to return again towards the Sea, without doing any thing, as his predeceffour had done before. Wherefore he determined to cross the Mountains to set upon his Enemies.

and to prove if he could win the passage by force. Now Philip kept the top of the Mountains with his Army, and when the ROMANS forced to get up the Hills, they were received with Darts, Slings and Shot, that lighted amongst them here and there: infomuch as the skirmish was very hot for the time it lasted, and many were slain and hurt on either side. But this was not the end of the War: for in the mean time there came certain Neat-heards of the Countrey unto Titus (who did use to keep Beasts on these Mountains) and told him they could bring him a way which they knew the Enemies kept not: by the which they promifed to guide his Army fo, that in three daies at the furthest, they would bring them on the top of the Mountain. And because they might be Charojus affured that their words were true, they faid they were fent to him by Charopus, the Son of Ma- (Machanis chat as. This Charopus was the chiefest man of the EPIROTS who loved the ROMANS very well, shirt man of yet he favoured them but underhand, for fear of Philip. Titus gave credit unto them, and fo fent the Epirote. one of his Captains with them, with Four thousand Footmen, and Three hundred Horsemen. The Heard-men that were their guides, went before still, fast bound, and the ROMANS followed aster. All the day time the Army refled in thick Woods and marched all night by moon light, which was then by good hap at the toll. Tits having fent these men away, rested all the rest of his Camp: faving that some dates he entertained them with some light skirmlishes to occupy the Enemy withall. But the fame day, when his men that ferched a compass about, should come unto the top of the Mountain above the Camp of his Enemies, he brought all his Army out of the Camp by break of day, and divided them into three Troops: with the one of them he himself went on that fide of the River where the way is straightest, making his bands to march directly against the fide of the Hill. The MACEDONIANS again, they shot luftily at them from the height of the Hill, and incertain places amongst the Rocks they came to the Sword. At the felf fame time, the two other Troops on either hand of him, did their endeavour likewise to get up the Hill, and as it were envying one another, they climbed up with great courage against the sharp and steep hanging of the Mountain. When the Sun was up, they might fee afar off as it were, a certain smoke, not very bright at the beginning, much like to the Mifts we fee commonly rife from the tops of the Mountains. The Enemies could ice nothing, because it was behind them, and that the top of the Mountain was possessed with the same. The ROMANS, though they were not affured of it, did hope being in the midft of the fight, that it was their fellows they looked for. But when they faw it increased still more and more, and in such fort, that it darkned all the Air : then they did affure themfelves it was certainly the token their men did give them that they were come. Then they began to cry out, climbing up the Hills with fuch a lufty courage, that they drave their Enemies up the Hill ftill, even unto the very rough and hardeft places of the Mountain. Their fellows also that were behind the Enemies, did answer them with like loud cries from the top of the Mountain: wherewith the Enemies were so aftonied, that they fled presently upon it. Notwithstanding, there was not tlain above Two thousand of them, because the hardness and straightness of the place did so guard them that they could not be chased. But the ROMANS spoiled their Camp, took all that they found in their Tents, took also their flaves, and wan the passage into the Mountains, by the which they entred the Countrey of EPIRUS: and did pass through it so quietly, and with so great abstineace, that though they were far from their Ships and the Sea, and lacked their ordinary portion of Corn which they were wont to have Monethly, and that Victuals were very feant with them at that time, yet they never took any thing of the Countrey, though they found great store and plenty of all riches in it. For Titm was advertised, that Philip passing by THESSALY, and flying for fear , had caused the Inhabitants of the Cities to get them to the Mountains , and then to set fire on their Houses, and to leave those goods they could not carry away, by reason of the weight and unhandsom carriage thereof, to the spoil of his Souldiers; and so (as it seemed) he lett the whole Countrey to the Conquest of the ROMANS. Whereupon Titus looking considerately to his doings, gave his men great charge to pals through the Countrey without doing any hurt or mischief, as the fame which their Enemies had now left to them as their own. So they tarried not long to enjoy the benefit of their orderly and wife forbearing of the Countrey. For, fo foon as they were entred THESSALY, the Cities willingly yeelded themselves unto them : and the GRECIANS inhabiting beyond the Countrey of THERMOPYLES, did marvelloufly defire to fee Titm, asking no other thing, but to put themselves unto his hands. The ACHAIANS also on the other fide, did renounce the League and alliance they had made with Philip and furthermore did determine in their Counsell, to make War with him on the ROMANS fide. And although the ÆTOLIANS were at that time triends and confederates with the ROMANS, and that they did shew themselves very loving to take their part in the Wars : nevertheless when they desired the Opuntians that they would put their City into their hands, and were offered that it should be kept and defended from Philip: they would not hearken thereto, but fent for Titm, and put themselves and their goods wholly into his Protection. They fay, that when King Pyrrus first faw the ROMANS Army range in order of Battell from the top of a Hill, he faid : This order of the Barbarous People fetting of their men in Battell ray, was not done in a Barbarous manner. And those also that never had seen Titus before, and came for to fpeak with him : were compelled in a manner to fay as much. For where they had heard the MA-CEDONIANS fay, that there came a Captain of the Barbarous People that deftroyed all before him by force of Arms, and subdued whole Countries by violence : they faid to the contrary, that they found him a man indeed young of years, howbeit gentle, and courteous to look on, and that spake the Greek tongue excellently well, and was a lover onely of true glory, by reason whereof they returned home marvellous glad, and filled all the Cities and Towns of GREECE with good will towards him: and faid, they had feen Titus the Captain, that would reftore them to their ancient liberty again. Then it much more appeared, when Philip shewed himself willing to have Peace, and that Titus also did offer it him , and the friendship of the People of ROME , with these condions, that he would leave the GRECIANS their whole liberties, and remove his Garrifons out of their (ities and strong holds : which $\mathcal{P}{\it hilip}$ rejused to do. And thereupon all Greece, and even those which favoured Philip, faid with one voice, that the ROMANS were not come to make Wars with them, but rather with the MACEDONIANS in favour of the GRECIANS. Whereupon all GREECE came in , and offered themselves unto Titus without compulsion. And as he passed through the Countrey of BOEOTIA, without any fnew at all of Wars, the chiefest men of the City of THEBES went to meet him : who though they took part with the King of MACEDON, because of a private man called Barchylelis, yet they would Honour Titus, as those which were contented to keep League and friendship with either side. Titus embraced them, and spake very courteously unto them, going on his way still fair and fostly, entertaining them forestime with one matter, and fometime with another, and kept them in talk of purpose, to the end his Souldiers being wearied. with journeying, might in the mean time take good breath : and fo marching on by little and little, he entered into the City with them. Wherewith the Lords of THEBES were not greatly pleafed, but yet they durst not refusehim, though he had not at that time any number of Souldiers about him. When he was within THEBES, he prayed audience and began to perswade the People (as carefully as if he had not had the City already, that they would rather take part with the Ko-MANS, then with the King of MACEDON. And to further Titus purpole, King Attalia being by chance at that time in the Affembly, did help to exhort the THEBANS very earneftly, that they would do as Titus perswaded them. But Attalia was more earnest then became a man of his years, for the defire he had (as was imagined) to fhew Titus his eloquence : who did fo frain and move himself withall, that he swounded suddenly in the midst of his Cration, whereby the rheum wil down so fast upon him; that it took away his senses, so as he sell in a Trance before them all, and King Athia. few daies after was conveyed again by Sea into Asia, where he lived not long after. In the mean death, time, the BOEOTIANS came in to the ROMANS, and took their part. And Philip having fent The Beotians Ambaffadours to Rome, Titus also fent thither of his men to folicite for him, in two respects. The reeld unto the one if the Wars continued against Philip, that then they would prolong his time there. The other Quintum if the Senate did grant him Peace : that they would do him the Honour, as to make and conclude it Army, with Philip. For Titus of his own nature being very ambitious, did fear leaft they would fend a fuccessour to continue those Wars, who should take the glory from him, and make an end of them, But his friends made such earnest sure for him, that neither King Philip attained that he prayed : neither was there fent any other Generall in Titus place, but he still continued his charge in these Wars. Wherefore, fo foon as he had received his Commission and Authority from the Senate, he went straight towards Thessaly, with great hope to overcome Philip. For he had in his Army above Six and twenty thousand fighting men, whereof the ATOLIAN'S made Six thousand Footmen and Three thousand Horsemen. King Philips Army on the other fide was no less in number , and they began to march one towards the other, untill at the length they both drew near the City King Philip. of Scotusa, where they determined to try the Battell; fo neither they nor their men were airaid and & ivina; to fee themselves one so near another; but rather to the contrary, the ROMANS on the one side meet with took greater heart and courage unto them, destring to fight, as thinking with themselves ruber their A.mies to be themselves one to hear another. Our annual took greater heart and courage unto them, defiring to fight, as thinking with themselves what near Scora/a. great Honour they should win to overcome the MACEDONIANS, who were so highly esteemed for their valiantness, by reason of the famous Acts that Alexander the Great did by them. And the MACEDONIANS on the other fide also, taking the ROMAN'S for other manner of Souldiers then the Persians, began to have good hope if they might win the Field, to make King Philip more famous in the world, then ever was Alexander his Father. Titus then calling his men together, spake and exhorted them to stand to it like men, and to shew themselves valiant Souldiers in this Battell, as those which were to shew the proof of their valiantness in the heart of GREECE. the goodlieft Theatre of the world, and against their Enemies of most Noble same. Philip then by chance, or forced to it by the speed he made, because they were both ready to joyn, did get up unwares upon a charnell House, (where they had buried many Bodies, being a little Hill raised up above the rest, and near the trenches of his Camp) and there began to encourage his Souldiers, as all Generalls do before they give Battell. Who when he saw them all discouraged, for they took it for an ill fign that he was gotten up on the top of a Grave to speak unto them, he of a conceit at the matter, did of himself defer to give Battell that day. The next morning because the night was very wet by reason the South winds had blown, the Clouds were turned to a Mist, and filled all the valley with dark gross thick Air, coming from the Mountains thereabouts, which covered the Field between both Camps with a Mist all the morning : by reason whereof the skouts on both sides that were sent to discover what the Enemies did, in very short time met together, and one gave charge upon another, in a place they call the Dogs heads, which are points of Rocks placed upon little Hills one before another, and very near one unto another, which had been called to, because they have had some likeness of it. In this Skirmish there were many changes, as commonly falleth out when they fight in such ill favoured stony places: for sometime the ROMANS fled, and the MACEDONIANS chased them : another time the MACE-DONIANS that followed the chase, were glad to fly themselves, and the ROMANS who fled before, now had them in chafe. This change and alteration came by fending new supplies still from both Camps, to relieve them that were diffressed and driven to fly. Now began the Mist to break up, and the Air to clear, fo that both Generals might fee about them what was done in either Camp : by reason whereof both of them drew on their Army to the Field and Battell. So Philip had the vantage on the right wing of his Army, which was placed on the height of an hanging Hill, from which they came so amain to set upon the ROMANS, and with such a fury, that the Strongest and Valiantest that could be, had never been able to abide the front of their Battell, so closely were they joyned together, and their Wall of Pikes was to strong. But on his left wing it was not so, because the ranks of his Battell could not joyn so near nor close Target to Target, the place being betwixt the Hills and the Rocks, where the Battell was coming, so as they were compelled by reason of the straightness and unevenness of the ground, to leave it open, and unsurnished in many places. Titus finding that disadvantage, went from the left wing of his Battell which he iaw lips Battell , he fet upon the MACEDONIANS on that fide , where he faw they could not close their Ranks in the front, nor joyn them together in the midft of the Battell (which is the whole frength and order of the MACEDONIAN fight) because the Field was up hill and down hill: and to fight hand to hand they were fo perferred behind, that one thronged and over laid another. For the Battell of the Macedonians hath this property, that so long as the order is kept close and joyn-The property of the Macido ed together, it seemeth as it were but the Body of a Beast of a force invincible. But also after that it is once open, and that they are fundred and not joyned together, it doth not onely lose the force and Power of the whole Body, but also of every private Souldier that fighteth : partly by reason of the divertity of the weapons wherewith they fight, and partly for that their whole strength confisheth most, in the disposing and joyning together of their ranks and orders, which doth stay up one another, more then doth every private Souldiers strength. So when this left wing of the MACEDONI-ANS Was broken, and that they ran their way : one part of the ROMANS followed the chafe, and the other ran to give a charge upon the Flanks of the right wing which fought yet, and they made great flaughter of them. Whereupon they now which before had the vantage, began to flag-Quintiest over. ger and break , and in the end ran away as fast as the other did, throwing down their weapons : infomuch as there were flain of them Eight thouland in the Field, and Five thouland taken Prifoners in their chase. And had not the fault been in the ÆTOLIANS, Philip had not faved himself by flying as he did. For whileft the ROMANS had their Enemies in chale, the ETOLIANS tarried, twirst the A- and rifled all King Philips Camp, fo as they left the ROMAN'S nothing to spoil at their return. Whereupon there grew great quarrel and hot words between them, and one with another. But afterwards it angred Titm worfe, challenging the Honour of this Victory to themselves, because they gave it out through GREECE, that they alone had overthrown King Philip in the Battell. So that in the Songs and Ballads the Poets made in praise of this Victory, which every Countrey and Town-man had in his mouth, they alwaies put the & TOLIANS before the ROMANS : as in this that followeth, which was currantly Sung in every place, O Friend which paffest by : here lie we wretched phears, against Alcaus But Titus took it grievously, who chiefly defired to be Honoured amongst the GRECIANS, by reason whereof from that time forwards he dealt in the reft of his matters alone, without making account of the ETOLIANS: wherewith they were marvellous angry, and specially when he received an Ambassadour from Philip, and gave car unto a treaty of Peace which he offered.

Hannibal was

For then they were so netted against him, that they gave it out through all GREECE, that Titus had fold Peace unto Philip, when he might altogether have ended the War, and utterly have deftroyed Philips whole Power and Empire, who had first brought GREECE into bondage. These slanderous reports and falle Tales which the ÆTOLIANS spread thus abroad, did much trouble the ROMANS friends and confederates : but Philips felf pulled this suspition out of their heads, when he came in Person to require Peace, and did submit himself wholly to the discretion of Ti-7. Quintius tus and the ROMANS. Titus then granted him Peace, and delivered to him his Realm of Magranted Philip CEDON, and commanded him he should give over all that he held in GREECE; and besides, that he should bay one Thousand Talest for the should be should b Ten Ships : and for affurance of this Peace, he took one of his Sons for Hoftage, whom he fent to ROME. Wherein Titus certainly did very well, and wifely did forefee the time to come. For then Hannibal of CARTHAGE (the great Enemy of the ROMANS) was banished out of his Countrey, and came to King Antiochus, whom he put in the head, and earnestly moved, to follow his good Fortune, and the increase of his Empire. Whom Hannibal so followed with these perswasions, that King Antiochus at length was come to it. And trufting to his former good fuccels, and notable Acts, whereby in the Wars before he had attained the furname of Great, he began now to aspire to the Monarchy of the whole world, and sought how to find occasion to make Wars with the ROMANS. So that if Titus (forfeeing that a far off) had not wifely inclined to peace, but that the Wars of Antiochus had fallen out together with the Wars of King Philip, and that thele two the mightieft Princes of the world had joyned together against the City of ROME: then it had been in as great trouble and danger, as ever it was before in the time of their Wars against Hannibal. Howbeit, Titus having happily thrust in this Peace between both Wars, he cut off the War that was prefent, before the other that was coming : by which means he took from one of the Kings his last : and from the other his first hope. In the mean time the Ten Commissioners that were fent by the Senate from Rome to Titus, to aid and affift him in the order of the affairs of GREECE, did counfell him to fet all the rest of GREECE at liberty, and onely to keep in their Chalcide: hands with good Garrison, the Cities of CHALCIDE, of CORINTH, and of DEMETRIADE, to Corinth hands with good Garriton, the Chies of Charles of Court in, and Dealer Glade, to make fure that by practife they should not enter into league and alliance with Anticobus. Then Powerriade, and the Charles of the Charl the ETOLIANS (that were the common flanderers of Titus proceedings) began openly to make Philip of Mathese Cities to rebell, and did summon Titus to loose the Chains of GREECE: for so did King codon, the Philip call these three Cities. Then they asked the Grecians in mockery, whether they were Chains of willing now to have heavier Fetters on their Legs then before, being fomewhat brighter and fairer Greece. then those they had been shackled with : and also whether they were not greatly beholding to Titus for taking off the Fetters from the GRECIANS Legs, and tying them about their necks. Tie tus being marvellously troubled and vexed with this, moved the Ten Counfellors fo earneftly, that he made them grant his request in the end, that those three Cities also should be delivered from Garison : because the GRECIANS thenceforth might no more complain, that his grace and liberality was not throughly performed and accomplished in every respect on them all, Wherefore when the Feast called Istimia was come, there were gathered together an infinite mul- Istimia. titude of People, come to fee the sport of the Games played there : for GREECE having been long time troubled with Wars, they feeing themselves now in sure peace, and in very good hope of full liberty, looked after no other thing, but delighted onely to fee Games, and to make merry. Proclamation was then made by found of Trumpet in the Affembly, that every man should keep silence. That done, the Herald went forward, and thrust into the midst of the multitude, and proclaimed out aloud: that the Senate of KOME, and Titus Quintim Flaminius, Confull of the People of ROME, (now that they had overthrown King Philip and the MACEDONIANS in Battell) did thenceforth discharge from all Garrisons, and set at liberty from all Taxes, subsidies, and impositions for ever, to live after their old ancient Laws, and in full liberty : the CORINTHIANS, the Lo-CRIANS, those of PHOCIDE, those of the Isles of EUBOEA, the ACHNIANS, the PHTHIO-TES, the MAGNESIANS, the THESSALIANS, and the PERROEBEIANS. At the first time of the Proclamation, all the People could not hear the voice of the Herald, and the most pare of those that heard him, could not tell directly what he said : for there ran up and down the Shewplace where the Games were Plaid, a confuled bruit and tumult of People, that wondred, and asked what the matter meant, fo as the Herald was driven again to make the Proclamation. Whereupon after filence made, the Herald putting out his voice far louder then before, did proclaim it in fuch audible wife, that the whole Affembly heard him : and then rofe there fuch a loud shout and cry of joy through the whole People, that the found of it was heard to the Sea. Then all the People that had taken their places, and were fet to fee the Sword-players play, rose up all on their feet, letting the Games alone, and went together with great joy to falute, to embrace, and to thank Titus the recoverer, Protector, and Patron of all their liberties of GREECE. Then was feen (which the recoverer, Protector, and Paulon of the Power of mens voices: for Crows fell down at that prefere time among crows flying, is much spoken of) the Power of mens voices: for Crows fell down at that prefere time among Crows flying, the People, which by chance flew over the Shew-place at that time that they made the same out- fell down by shout. This came to pass, by reason the air was broken and cut asunder with the vehemency the sound of and strength of the voices, so as it had not his naturall Power in it, to keep up the flying of the mens voices, Birds: which were driven of necessity to fall to the ground, as slying through a void place where they lacked air. Unless we will rather say, that it was the violence of the cry, which strook the Birds patting through the air, as they had been hit with Arrows, and so made them fall down dead to the Earth. It may be also, that there was some hurling wind in the air, as we do fee sometime in the Sea, when it riseth high and many times turneth about the waves, by wiolence of the storm. So it is, that if Tiens had not prevented the whole multitude of People which came to see him, and that he had not got him away betimes, before the Games were ended : he had hardly escaped from being stifled amongst them, the People came so thick about him from every place; But after that they were weary of crying and Singing about his Pavilion untill night, in the end they went their way : and as they went, if they met any of their kin, Friends or Citizens, they did kifs and embrace one another for joy, and fo supper and made merry together. In their more rejoycing yet, as we may think sull well, they had no other talk at the Table, but of the Wars of GREECE, discoursing among them what fundry great Wars they had made, what they had endured heretofore, and all to defend and recover their liberty. And yet for all that, they could never fo joyfully, nor more affuredly obtain it, then they did even at that prefent, receiving the Honourableft reward, and that which deserved greatest same through the world : that by the valiantness of strangers who fought for the same (without any spile bloud of their own in comparison, or that they loft the Life of any one man, whose death they had cause to lament) they were so restored to their ancient freedom and liberty. It is a very rare thing amongst men, to find a man very valiant, and Wife withall but yet of all forts of valiant men, it is harder to find a just man. For Agefilans, Lyfander, Niciai, Alcibinder, and all other the famous Captains of former times, had very good skill to lead an Army, and to win the Battell, as well by Sea as by Land : but to turn their Victories to any Honourable benefit, or true Honour among men, they could never skill of it.

the Philosopher, and faved him from Prison.

And if you do except the Battell against the Barbarous People, in the plain of MARATHON, the Battell of SALAMINA, the journey of PLATEES, the Battell of THERMOPYLES, the Battell Cimon fought about Cyprus, and upon the River of Eurymedon: all the other Wars and Battells of Greece that were made, fell our against themselves, and did ever bring them into bondage: and all the tokens of Triumph which ever were fet up for the fame, was to their shame and loss. So that in the end, GREECE was utterly destroyed and overthrown, and that chiefly through the wickedness and felf-will of her Governours and Captains of the Cities, one envying anothers doing. Where a strange Nation, the which (as it should feem) had very small occasion to move them to do it , (for that they had no great familiarity with ancient GREECE, and through the counfell and good wildom of the which, it should feem very strange that GREECE could receive any benefit) have notwithstanding with dangerous Battells and infinite troubles, delivered it from oppression and servitude of violent Lords and Tyrants. This and such like talk, did at that time occupy the Grecians heads: and moreover, the deeds following did answer and perform the words of the Proclamation. For at one felf time, Titus fent Lentulus into Asia, to fet the BARGILIANS at liberty, and Titilius into Thracia, to remove the Garifons out of the Isles and Cities which Philip had kept there : and Publim Juliu was sent also into Asia, unto King Antiochus, to speak unto him to set the GRECIANS at liberty which he kept in subjection. And as for Titus, he went himself unto the City of CHALCIDE, where he took Sea, and went into the Province of Magnesia, out of the which he took all the Garifons of the Cities, and redelivered the Government of the Common-wealth unto the Citizens of the fame. Afterwards when time came that the Feaft of Nemea was celebrated in the City of Argos in the Honour of Horcules, Titus was chosen Judge and Rector of the Games that were plaid there: where, after he had fet all things in very good order, pertaining unto the folemnity of the Feaft, he caused again folemn Proclamation to be made openly, for the Generall liberty of all GREECE. Furthermore visiting the Cities, he did stablish very good Laws, reformed justice, and did fet the Inhabitants and Citizens of every one of them in good peace, amity and concord one with another: and did call home also all those that were out-laws and banished men, and pacified all old quarrels and diffentions among them. The which did no less please and content him, that by perswasions he could bring the Grecians to be reconciled one with the other, then if he had by force of Arms overcame the Macedonians. Infomuch, as the recovery of the Liberty which Titus had reflored unto the GRECIANS, feemed unto them the least part of the goodness they had received at his hands. They fay that Lycurgs the Orator feeing the Collectors of Taxes, carry Zenocrates Orator, refeu- the Philosopher one day to Prilon, for lack of payment of a certain imposition, which the strangers inhabiting within the City of ATHENS were to pay : he refcued him from them by force, and moreover profecuted Law to hard against them, that he made them pay a fine for the injury they had done unto fo worthy a Person: And they tell, that the same Philosopher asterwards meeting Lycurgsu Children in the City, faid unto them : I do well requite your Fathers good turn he did me: For I am the cause that he is praised and commended of every man, for the kindness he shewed on my behalf. So the good deeds of the ROMANS, and of Titu Quintim Flaminiu unto the Grecians, did not onely reap this benefit unto them, in recompence that they were praifed and honoured of all the world: but they were cause also of increasing their Dominions and Empire over all Nations, and that the world afterwards had great affiance and trust in them, and that most justly. So that the People and Cities did not onely receive the Captains and Governours the ROMANS fent them : but they also went to ROME unto them, and procured them to come, and did put themselves into their hands. And not onely the Cities and commonalties, but Kings and Princes also which were oppressed by other (more mighty then themselves) had no other refuge, but to purthemselves under their Protection: by reason whereof in a very short time (with the favour and help of the gods, as I am perfwaded) all the world came to submit themselves to their obedience, and under the Protection of their Empire. Titus also did glory more that he had restored GREECE again unto liberty, then in any other fervice or exploit he had ever done. For when he offered up unto the Temple of Apollo in the City of DELPHOS, the Target of Silver with his own Shield, he made these Verses to be graven upon them, in effect as followeth:

T. Q. FLAMINIUS.

O Noble swins Tyndarides Dan Jove his Children dear, Throw out loud shouts of joy and mirth, rejoyce and make good cheer. O Noble Kings of Spartan foyl, which take delight to ride Your trampling Steeds, with fomy bit, and trappings by their side: Rejoyce you now, for Titus he, the valiant Roman Knight, These gifts so great to you bath got, evenby hu force and might: That having taken clean away from off the Greekish necks, The heavy yoke of fervitude, which held them thrall to checks, Unto their former liberty he hath restor'd them free , Which altogether perisht was , as men might plainty see.

He gave a Crown of massie Gold unto Apollo, upon the which he made this inscription to be written:

To

A valiant Roman Knight , even Titu by his Name, A Captain worthy by defert of high renown and fame : To thee (Apollo god) this Crown of pure fine Gold Hath given , thy godhead to adorn with fewels manifold : Therefore let it thee please (Apollo god of grace) With favour to requite this love to him and to his race : That his renowned fame and Vertue may be spred, And blazed through the world so wide, to shew what Life he led.

So hath the City of CORINTH enjoyed this good hap, that the GRECIANS have been twice proclaimed to be set at liberty : the first time by Titus Quintius Flaminius, and the second time by Nero in our time, and at the felf fame instant when they solemnly kept the Feast called 1sthmia. Nero did set Howbeit the first Proclamation of their liberty (as we have told you before) was done by the Greccast voice of an Herald : and the second time it was done by Nero himself, who proclaimed it in an Ora-liberty. tion he made unto the People in open Affembly, in the Market-place of the City of CORINTH. But it was a long time after. Furthermore, Titus began then a goodly and just War against Nabis the curfed and wicked Tyrant of LACEDEMON. Howbeit in the end he deceived the expectation of GREECE : for when he might have taken him, he would not do it, but made peace with Why Quinting him, forfaking poor Sparta, unworthily oppressed under the yoke of bondage : either because made peace him, for aking poor Sparta, unworthily oppretted under the yoke of bounge: entire because the beautiful that if the War held on, there should come a successor unto him from Rous, with Additional transfer of the War held on, there should come a successor unto him from Rous, with Additional transfer of the Spartage of that should carry the glory away to end the same, or else he stood jealous and envious of the Ho-Lacedemon. nour they did unto Philopamen: who having shewed himself in every place as excellent a Cap. The Honour of tain as ever came in GREBCE, and having done notable acts and famous fervice, both of great Philopamen. wisdom, and also of valiantness, and specially in the ACHAIANS War: he was as much Honoured and reverenced of the ACHAIANS in the Theatre and common Affemblies, even as Titus was. Whereat Titus was marvellously offended, for he thought it unreasonable that an Ar-CADIAN who had never been Generall of an Army, but in small little Wars against his neighbours, should be as much esteemed and Honoured as a Confull of Rome, that was come to make Wars for the recovery of the liberty of GREECE. But Titus alledged reasonable excuse for his doings. faying , that he faw very well he could not destroy this Tyrant Nabis , without the great loss and mifery of the other SPARTANS. Furthermore of all the Honours the ACHAIANS ever did him (which was very great) me thinks there was none that came near any recompence of his Ho-nourable and well deferving, but one onely Present they offered him, and which he above all the rest most esteemed : and this it was. During the second Wars of Africk, which the Ro-MANS had against Hannibal, many ROMANS were taken Prisoners in fundry Battells they loft, and being fold here and there, remained flaves in many Countries; and amongst other, there were dispersed in GREECE to the number of Twelve hundred, which from time to time did move men with spite and compassion towards them that saw them in so miserable change and state Twelve hunof Fortune. But then much more was their milery to be pitied, when these captives found in the dred Romans ROMANS Army, some of them their Sons, other their Brethren, and the rest their fellows and fold for slaves. friends, free and conquerours, and themselves slaves and bondmen. It grieved Titus much to fee these poor men in such miserable captivity, notwithstanding he would not take them by force from those that had them. Whereupon the Achaians redeemed and bought them for The Achaians Five hundred Pence a man, and having gathered them together into a Troop, they prefented all redeemed the the ROMAN captives unto Titus, even as he was ready to take Ship to return into ITALY : which Romans that present made him return home with greater joy and contentation, having received for his No. Baves in ble deed so Honourable a recompence, and worthy of himself, that was so loving a man to his Greece. Citizens and Countrey. And furely, that onely was the Crnament (in my opinion) that did most The Ceremobeautifie his Triumph. For these poor redeemed captives did that, which the slaves are wont to ny of slaves do on that day when they be fet at liberty: to wit they shave their heads, and do wear little manumissed. Hats upon them. The ROMANS that were thus redeemed, did in like manner : and fo followed Triumph. Titus Chariot, on the day of his Triumph and entry made into Roms in the Triumphing manner. It was a goodly fight also, to see the spoils of the Enemies, which were carryed in the shew of this Triumph: as store of Helmets after the GRECIANS fashion, heaps of Targets, Shields, and Pikes after the MACEDONIAN manner, with a wonderfull fum of Gold and Silver. For Itanus the Historiographer writeth, that there was brought a marvellous great Mass of Treasure in niggots of Gold, of Three thousand Seven hundred and Thirteen Pound weight; and of Silver, of torty three Thousand two Hundred Threescore and Ten Pound weight; and of Gold ready coyned in pieces called Philips, Fourteen thousand Five hundred and Fourteen, besides the Thousand Talents King Philip should pay for a ransom : the which sum, the ROMANS afterwards forgave him, chiefly at Titus sute and intercession, who procured that grace for him, and caused him to be called a friend and confederate of the People of ROME, and his Son Demetrius to be sent unto him again, who remained before as an Hostage of Rome. Shortly after King Antiochus went out of ASIA into GREECE with a great fleet of ships, and a very puiffant Army, to stir up the Cities to Maning Acitins forfake their League and alliance with the ROMANS, and make a diffention among them. To fur Confull, and ther this his defire and enterprife, the ETOLIANS did aid and back him, which of long time had Lieutenant, born great and fecret malice against the ROMANS, and desired much to have had Wars with fent into them. So they taught King Antiochus to fay, that the War which he took in hand, was to fet the Greece. GRECIANS at liberty; whereof they had no need, because they did already enjoy their liberty: but for that they had no just cause to make War, they taught him to cloke it the honestest way the Power of this great King, they fent thither Manius Acilius their General, and Titus, one of his Lieutenants for the GRECIANS fakes. Which arrival did more affure them that already bare good will to the ROMANS, after they had once feen Manius and Titus: and the reft that began to fly our, and to fhrink from them, thole Tiens kept in obedience from flarting, remembring them of the friendship and good will they had born him, even like a good skilfull Physirian than could give his Patient Phylick to perferve him from a contagious difeate. Indeed there were fome (but few of them) that left him, which were won and corrupted before by the ÆTOLIANS:

and though he had just cause of offence towards them, yet he saved them after the Battell. For

King Antischus being overcome in the Countrey of THERMOPYLES, fled his way, and in great haft took the Sea to return into Asia. And the Confull Manius following his Victory, entred into the Countrey of the ETOLIANS, where he took certain Towns by force, and left the other for a prey unto King Philip. So Philip King of Macedon on the one fide, fpoiled and facked the

DOLOPIANS, the MAGNESIANS, the ATHAMIANS, and the APERANTINES: and the

Confull Manius on the other side, destroyed the City of HERACLEA, and laid siege to the City of

NAUPACTUM, which the ETOLIANS kept, But Titus taking compassion of them to see the poor People of GREECE thus spoiled and turned out of all : went out of PELOPONNESUS

(where he was then) unto Manius Acilius Camp, and there reproved him for fuffering King Philip to usure the benefit and reward of his Honourable Victory, still conquering many People, Kings and Countries, whileft he continued fiege before a City, and onely to wreak his anger upon them.

Afterwards, when they that were befreged faw Titus from their Walls, they called him by his Name, and held up their hands unto him, praying him he would take pity upon them: but he gave them never a word at that time, and turning his back unto them, he fell a weeping. Afterwards he fpake with Manins, and appealing his anger, got him to grant the & TOLIANS truce for certain days, in which time they might fend Ambalfadours to ROME, to fee if they could obtain grace and pardon of the Senate. But the most trouble and difficulty he had, was to intreat for the CHALCIDIANS, with whom the Confull Manius was more grievoully offended, then with all the reft : because that King Antiochus after the War was begun, had married his Wifein their City, when he was paft years of marriage, and out of all due time. For he was now very old, and being in his extream age, and in the midft of his Wars, he fell in dotage with a young Gentlewoman, the Daughter of Cleopolemus, the fairest woman that was at that time in all GREECE. Therefore the CHALCIDI-Ans were much affected unto King Antiochus, and did put their City into his hands, to ferve him in this War, for a strong and sate retiring place. Whereupon, when Antiochus had lost the Battell, he came thither with all possible speed, and taking from thence with him his passing fair young Queen which he had married, and his Gold, his Silver and Friends, he took the Seas incontinently, and returned into Asia. For this cause the Consull Manius having won the Battell, did march ftraight with his Army towards the City of CHALCIDE in a great rage and fury. But Titus that followed him, did alwaies lie upon him to pacifie his anger, and did so much intreat him, together with the other ROMANS of state and Authority in Counsell : that in the end, he got him to pardon them of CHALCIDE also. Who because they were preserved from perill by his means, they to recompence this Fact of his, did confecrate unto him, all their most stately and fumptuous Buildings and common Works in their City, as appeareth yet by the superscriptions remaining to be feen at this day. As in the Shew-place of exercises: the People of CHALCIDE did dedicate this Shew-place of exercises, unto Tirus and Hercules. And in the Temple called Delphinium : the People of CHALCIDE did confecrate this Temple unto Tine, and unto Apollo. And rius for laving furthermore, unto this present time, there is a Priest chosen by the voice of the People, purposely to do Sacrifice unto Titus: in which Sacrifice after that the thing Sacrificed is offered up, and Wine poured upon it, the People standing by, do fing a Song of Triumph made in praise of him. But because it were too long to write it all out, we have onely drawn in brief the latter end of the same; and this it is: The clear unspotted faith of Romans we adore,

And vow to be their faithfull friends both now and evermore. Sing out you Muses nine to Joves eternal fame : Sing out the Honour due to Rome, and Titus worthy Name. Sing out (I say) the praise of Titus and his faith: By whom you have preserved been from ruine, dole and death.

Quintius cournature. Emulation betwixt Titus Quintius and Philogamen.

Now the CHALCIDIANS did not alone Honour and reverence Titus, but he was generally Honoured also by the Grecians ashe deserved, and was marvellously beloved for his courtesse and good nature : which argueth plainly that they did not fainedly Honour him, or through compulfion, but even from the Heart. For though there were some jar betwixt him and Philopamen at the first about service, for emulation of Honour, and after betwirt him and Diophanes also, both Generals of the ACHAIANS, yet he never bare them any malice in his heart, neither did his anger move him at any time to hurt them any way, but he ever ended the heat of his words in Couniell and Affemblies, where he uttered his mind frankly to them both. Therefore none thought him ever a cruell man, or eager of revenge: but many have thought him rash, and hasty of nature. Otherwife, he was as good a companion in company as possible could be, and would use as pleasant wife Mirth as any man. As when he faid to the ACHAIANS, on a time, who would needs unjustly usurp the Isle of the ZAZINTHIANS, to diffwade them from it : My Lords of ACHAIA, they thrust their heads out of their shels. And the first time he parled with Philip to treat of favings. Peace: when Philip faid unto him, you have brought many men with you, and I am come alone: Indeed it is true you are alone, said he, because you made all your friends and kin to be slaim. Another time, Dinocrates MESSINIAN being in ROME, after he had taken in his cups in a Feaft where he was, he difguifed himfelf in Womans apparell, and danced in that manner: and the next day following he went unto Titus, to pray him to help him through with his fute, which was, to make the City of Messina to rebell, and leave the Tribe of the Achaians. Titus made him answer, that he would think upon it: but I can but wonder at you (faid he) how you can dance in Womens apparell, and Sing at a Feaft, having fuch matters of weight in your head. In the Counfell of the Achaians, King Amiochus Ambassadours being come thither, to move them to break bassabours do their League with the ROMANS, and make their alliance with the King their Mafter, they made boat of their a marvellous large discourse of the great multitude of Souldiers that were in their Masters Army, Kings great and did number them by many divers Names. Whereunto Titus answered, and told how a friend Army. and the house that by hardy states of his hiving bidden him one night to Supper, and having ferved to many diffus of Meat to his witty aniver.

And even fo (quoth Tins) my Lords of Achala, effect not King Antiochus Army the more, to hear of fo many men of Arms, numbred with their Lances: and of fuch a number of Footmen with their Pikes: for they are all but SYRIANS, diversly Armed, onely with ill favoured little weapons. Furthermore, after Titus had done thefe things, and that the War with Antiochns was ended, he was chofen Cenfor at ROME, with the Son of that fame Marcellus, who had been five times Confull. This Office is of great dignity and as a man may fay, The Crown of all the Honours that a Citizen of Rome can Titus Quintini of great urginity and as a minimum. They put off the Senate, four men onely, but they were not facholen Censor mous. They received all into the Number of Citizens of Rome, that would prefent themselves to with Marcelbe enrolled in their common Register : with a proviso, that they were born free by Father and lut. Mother. They were compelled to do it , by Terentius Culeo, Tribune of the People, who to despite the Nobility perswaded the People of ROME to command it to. Now at that time two of the Noblest and most famous men of ROME were great Enemies one against another: Publiss Scipio AFRICAN, and mote famous first of ROME were great statuted and Public Scipio African, to be Prince of and Marcin Portini Cato. Of these two, Titim named Public Scipio African, to be Prince of P. Scipio, and Control of the great state of the great sta the Senate, as the chiefest and worthiest Person in the City: and got the displeasure of the other, M. P. Cato which was Cato, by this mishap. Titm had a Brother called Lucius Quintitus Flaminius, nothing great Enemies, at all like him in condition : for he was fo diffolutely and licentiously given to his pleasure, that he Secret gradge forgot all comelines and honesty. This Lucius loved well a young Boy, and carried him alwaies betwirt Tims with him when he went to the Wars, or to the charge and Government of any Province. This Boy and Cate, flattering him, one day faid unto Lucius Quintius, that he loved him so well, that he did leave the fight of the Sword-players at the fharp, which were making ready to the fight, although he had newer feen man killed before, to wait upon him. Lucius being glad of the Boys words, answered him straight. Thou shalt lose nothing for that my Boy, for I will by and by please thee as well. A cruel deed So he commanded a condemned man to be fetched out of Prilon, and withall called for the Hang- of Lucius man, whom he willed to strike off his head in the midst of his Supper, that the Boy might fee him Quintlut. killed. Valerius Antias the Hiftoriographer writeth, that it was not for the love of the Boy, but of a Woman which he loved. But Titus Livius declareth, that in an Oration which Cato himself made, it was written that it was one of the Gauls: who being a traitor to his Countrey-men, was come to Flaminius Gate with his Wife and Children, and that Flaminius making him come into his Hall, killed him with his own hands, to pleafe a Boy he loved, that was defirous to fee a man killed. Howbeit, it is very likely that Cato wrote in this fort, to aggravate the offence, and to make it more cruel. For, many have written it that it is true, and that he was no traitor, but an offender condemned to dye, and among other, Cicero the Orator doth recite it in a Book he made of age, where he made it to be told unto Cato's own Person. Howsoever it was, Marcus Cato being choicen Cenfor, and cleanfing the Senate of all unworthy Persons, he put off the same Lucius Quintius Flaminius, Catobeiag although he had been Consult : which difgrace did seem to redound to his Brother Titus Quintus Center did Flaminius also. Whereupon both the Brethren came weeping with all humility before the People, put Lucius and made a Petition that feemed very reasonable and civil : which was , that they would command Quintius Fle-Cato to come before them, to declare the cause openly, why he had with such open shame defaced minimus off the fo Noble a House as theirs was. Cato then without delay, or shrinking back, came with his com-Schate. panion into the Market-place, where he asked Titus out aloud, if he knew nothing of the Supper where fuch a Fact was committed. Titus answered, he knew not of it. Then Cato opened the whole matter as it was, and in the end of his Tale, he bad Lucius Quintins swear openly, if he would deny that he had faid was true. Lucius answered not a word. Whereupon the People judged the shame was justly laid upon him: and fo to Honour Caro, they did accompany him from the Pulpit for Orations, home unto his own House. But Titus being much offended at the difgrace of his Brother, became Enemy to Cato, and fell in with those that of long time had hated him. And so by practise he procured of the Senate, that all bargains of Leafes and all Deeds of Sales made by Cato du. T. Quinting ring his Office, were called in , and made void : and caused many Suits also to be commenced against answorthy Act him against caused many Suits also to be commenced against caused and answorthy Act him against cause him. Wherein, I cannot say he did wisely or civilly, to become mortall Enemy to an honest man, a good Citizen, and dutifull in his Office for his year, for an unworthy kiniman, who had justly deferved the shame laid upon him. Notwithstanding, shortly after when the People were Assembled in the Theatre to fee Games played, and the Senators were fet according to their cuftom, in the most Honourable places : Lucius Flaminius came in also, who in lowly and humble manner, went to fit down in the Furthest Seats of the Theatre, without regard of his former Honour: which when the People faw, they took pity of him, and could not abide to fee him thus dishonoured. So they cried out to have him come and fit among the other Senators and Confulls, who made him place, and received him accordingly. But to return again to Titms. The natural ambition and covetous greedy mind he had of Honour, was very well taken and effeemed, fo long as he had any occasion offered him to exercise it in the Wars, which we have spoken of before. For, after he had been Confull, of his own feeking he became a Colonell of a Thousand Footmen, not being called to it by any man. So when he began to ftoop for age, and that he had given over as a man at the last cast, to bear Office any longer in the State : they saw plainly he was ambitious beyond measure, to suffer himself in old age to be overcome with such youthfull violence, being far unmeet for any of his years. For methinks his ambition was the onely cause that moved him to procure Hamibals death, which bred him much difliking and ill opinion with many. For, after Hamnibal had fled out of his own Countrey, he went first unto King Antiochus: who, after he lost the Battell in PHRYGIA, was glad the ROMANS granted him Peace, with fuch conditions as themfelves would. Wherefore Hannibal fled again from him, and after he had long wandred up and down, at the length he came to the Realm of BITHYNIA, and remained there about King Prusia, the ROMANS knowing it well enough : and because Hannibal was then an old broken man, of no force nor Power, and one whom Fortune had spurned at her feet, they made no more reckoning of him. But Titus being fent Ambaffadour by the Senate, unto Prufius King of BIT HYNIA, and finding Hannibal there, it grieved him to fee him alive. So that notwithftanding Prussus marvellously intreated him, to take pity upon Hannibal a poor old man, and his friend who came to himstor succour : yet he could not persuade Titus to be content he should live. Hannibal long before had received answer of his death from an Oracle, to this effect:

The Land of Libya, shall cover under mould, The valiant corps of Hannibal, when he is dead and cold.

So Hannibal understood that of LIBYA, as if he should have died in AFRICK, and been buried HARMIDAL kept in CARTHAGE. There is a certain fandy Countrey in BITHYNIA, near to the Seas fide, where there is a little Village called LIBYSSA, and where Hannibal remained continually. He miltrufting King Prusias faint heart, and fearing the ROMANS malice also, had made seven privy Caves and vaults under ground long before, that he might fecretly go out at either of them which way he would, and every one of them came to the main vault where himself did lie, and could not be discerned outwardly. When it was told him that Titus had willed Prussas to deliver him into his hands, he fought then to fave himself by those mines; but he found that all the vents out, had Watch and Ward upon them by the Kings commandment. So then he determined to kill himself. Now some say, the he wound a Linnen Towell hard about his neck, and commanded one of his men he should fet his knee upon his buttock, and weighing hard upon him, holding the Towell fast, he should pull his neck backward with all the power and strength he could, and never leave pressing on him, till he had strangled him. Others say that he drank Bulls bloud, as Midas and Themissoles had done before him. But Titus Livius writeth, that he had Poylon which he kept for surpose, and tempered it in a Cup he held in his hands, and before he drank he spake these words : Come on, let us deliver the ROMANS of this great care, fith my life is fo grievous unto them, that they think it too long to tarry the natural death of a poor old man, whom they hate to much: and yet Titm by this shall win no honourable Victory, nor worthy the memory of the ancient ROMANS, who advertised King Pyrrm their Enemy, even when he had Wars with them, and had won Battells of them, that he should beware of poyloning which was intended towards him. And this was Hannibals end, as we find it written. The News whereof being come to ROME unto the Senate, many of them thought Titus too violent and cruell, to have made Hannibal kill himfelf in that fort, when extremity of age had overcome him already, and was as a Bird left naked, her Feathers falling from her for age : and fo much the more, because there was no instant occasion offered him to urge him to do it, but a coverous mind of Honour, for that he would be Chronicled to be the cause and Authour of Hannibals death. And then in contrariwise they did much Scipio African Honour and commend the clemency and Noble mind of Scipio African: who having overcome clemency com- Hannibal in Battell, in AFRICK felf, being then indeed to be feared, and had been never overcome before : yet he did not cause him to be driven out of his Countrey, neither did ask him of the CARTHAGINIANS, but both then, and before the Battell, when he parlied with him of Peace, he took Hannibal courteoully by the hand, and after the Battell, in the conditions of Peace he gave them, henever spake word of hurt to Hamnibals Person, neither did he shew any cruelty to him in his milery. And they tell how afterwards they met again together in the City of EPHESUS, and as they were walking, that Hannibal took the upper hand of Scipio : and that Scipio bare it patiently, and left not off walking for that, neither shewed countenance of misliking. And in entering into discourse of many matters, they descended in the end to talk of ancient Captains; and Supple Aprican Hannibal gave judgement, that Alexander the Great was the famoulest Captain, Pyrrus the second, and himfelf the third. Then Scipio smiling, gently asked him : What wouldst thou say then, Hannibals if I had not overcome thee? Truly, quoth Hannibal, I would not then put my felf the third man, judgement of but the first, and above all the Captains that ever were. So divers greatly commending the Captains. goodly fayings and deeds of Scipio, did marvellously millike Titus, for that he had (as a man may fay) laid his hands upon the death of another man. Other to the contrary again (aid, it was well done of him, faying, that Hannibal fo long as he lived, was a fire to the Empire of the ROMANS, which lacked but one to blow it: and that when he was in his best force and lufty age, it was not his hand nor body that troubled the ROMANS fo much, but his great wisdom, and skill he had in the Wars, and the mortall hate he bare in his heart towards the ROMANS, which neither years, nor age would diminish or take away. For mens naturall conditions do remain fill, but Fortune doth not alwaics keep, in a state, but changeth still, and then quickneth up our defires to fet willingly upon those that War against us, because they hate us in their hearts. The things which fell out afterwards, did greatly prove the reasons brought out for this purpose, in discharge of Titus. For one Aristonicus, Son of the Daughter of Aristonicus. a plaier upon the Cithern , under the fame and glory of Eumenes , whose bastard he was , filled all ASIA with War and rebellion, by reason the People rose in his favour. Again Mithridates, after fo many loffes he had received against Sylla and Fimbria; and after fo many Armies overthrown by Minbridates. Battell and Wars, and after so many famous Captains loft and killed : did yet recover again, and came to be of Power both by Sea and Land against Lucullus. Truly Hannibal was no lower brought then Caius Marius had been : for he had a King to his friend that gave entertainment to him and his family, and made him Admirall of his Ships, and Generall of his Horsemen and Footmen in the Field, Marius also went up and down Africk a begging for his living, insomuch as his Enemies at ROME Marius. laughed him to scorn : and soon after notwithstanding they fell down at his seet before him, when they faw they were whipped, murthered, and slain within ROME by his commandment. Thus we fee no man can fay certainly he is mean or great, by reason of the uncertainty of things to come : confidering there is but one death, and change of better Life. Some fay also, that Titus did not this Act alone, Tobe mean and of his own Authority, but that he was fent Ambaffadour with Lucius Scipio to no other end, or great in but to put Hannibal to death, by what means soever they could. Furthermore after this Ambassade, this Life is we do not find any notable thing written of Titus worthy of memory, neither in Peace, nor in Wars, nothing: but for he died quietly of a nanurall death at home in his Countrey.

THE

THE COMPARISON OF TITUS QUINTIUS FLAMINIUS, with PHILOPOEMEN.

T. Quintins benefits unto Grecce.

T is time now we come to compare them together. Therefore as touching the great benefits that came to the GRECIANS, neither Philopamen, nor all the other former Captains are to be compared with Titus. For all the ancient Captains almost being GRECIANS, made Wars with other GRECIANS: but Titm being a ROMAN, and no GRECIAN, made Wars for the liberty of GREECE. When Philopamen was not able to help his poor Citizens diffressed fore and vexed with Wars, he failed away into GRETA. Titus having overcome Philip King of Ma-CEDON in Battell, did reftore again to liberty all the People and Cities of the fame, which were kept before in bondage. And if any will narrow-ly examine the Battells of either party, they shall find that Philopamen being Generall of the ACHAI-

ANS, made more GRECIANS to be flain, then Titus did of the Macedonians, fighting with them for the liberty of the GRECIANS. And for their imperfections, the one of them was ambitious, the other was as obstinate: the one was quick and suddenly angred, the other was very hard to be pacified. Titus left King Philip his Realmand Crown after he had overcome him, and used great elemency towards the ÆTOLIANS: where Philopamen for spire and malice, took Towns and Villages from his own native Countrey and City wherein he was born, that had alwaies payed them tribute to the property of the country and the country an bute. Furthermore, Tirm continued a found friend to them, to whom he had once professed friendthip, and done pleasure unto: and Philopamen in a gear and anger, was ready to take away that he had given, and to overthrow the pleafure and good turn he had thewed. For Philopamen when he had done the LACEDEMONIANS great pleasure, did afterwards raze the Walls of their City, and fpoiled and destroyed all their Countrey: and lastly, overthrew their whole Government. It seemthe that of the second and the secon we look into the number of Battells, and Victories: The War which Titus made against Philip was ended with two Battells : whereas Philopamen in infinite Battells in which he had the better, never left it doubtfull, but that his skill did ever help him more to the Victory, then the good Fortune he had Moreover, Tirm wan Honour by means of the Power of Rome, when it flourished most, and was in best prosperity: Philopamen made himself, famous by his deeds, when GREECE began to stoop and fall altogether. So that the deeds of the one, were common to all the ROMANS: and the deeds of the other, were private to himself alone. For Titus was Generall over good and valiant Souldiers, that were already trained to his hand: and Philopamen being chosen Generall, did train his men himself, and made them afterwards very expert and Valiant, that were but mean and green Souldiers before. And whereas Philopamen had continuall Wars with the GRECIANS, it was not for any good Fortune he had, but that it made a certain proof of his valiantness. For where all other things are answerable to his, there we must judge that such as overcome, have the most courage. Now Philopamen making Wars with the most Warlike Nations of all GREECE, (as the CRETANS, and the LACEDE-MONIANS) did overcome the subtellest of them, by fineness and policy: and the most valiant by prowers and hardiness. Eut Titue overcame, by putting that onely in practife, which was already dy found and stablished: as the discipline of Wars, and order of Battell, in the which his Souldiers had long before been trained. Whereas Philopamen brought into his Countrey, both the one and the other, and altered all the order which before they were accustomed unto. So that the chiefest point how to win a battle, was found out anew, and brought in by the one, into a place where it was never before: and onely employed by the other, which had very good skill to use it, and had found it out already before. Again, touching the valiant acts done in the person of themselves, many notable acts may be told of Philopamen, but none of Titus; but rather to the contrary. For there was one Arche damus an ETOLIAN, who flouting Titus one day, faid in his reproach: that at a day of battle, when Philopamen ran with his fword in his hand, to that fide where he faw the MACEDONIANS fighting and making head against the Enemy, Titus held up his hands unto heaven, and was busie at his prayers to the gods, not firring one foot, when it was more time to handle the fword, and to fight of all hands. All the goodly deeds Tiens ever did, twere done always as a Conful, or Lieutenant, or Magistrate: multipor be as whereas Philopamen shewed himself unto the ACHAIANS, a man no less valiant and of execution, his prayers being out of Office, then when he was a General. For when he was a General, he did drive Nabis the when he should Tyrant of the LACEDEMONIANS out of MESSINA, and delivered the MESSINIANS out of bon- occupy his dage: and being a private man, he shur the Gates of the City of SPARTA, in the face of Diophanes (General of the ACHAIANS) and of Tiens Quintins Flaminius, and kept them both from coming in, and thereby faved the City from facking. Thus being born to command, he knew not onely how to command according to the Law, but could command the Law it felf upon necessity, and when the Commonwealth required it. For at fuch a time he would not tarry while the Magistrates which should govern him, did give him authority to command, but he took it of himself, and used them when the time served : esteeming, that he which knew better then they what was to be done, was more truly their General, then he whom they had chosen. And therefore they do well, that do commend Titus Acts, Quinting clefor his clemency and courteste used to the GRECIANS: but much more the Noble and Valiant Acts mency to the of Philopamen unto the ROMANS. For it is much easter to pleasure and gratisfie the weak, then it is Grecians. to hurt and refift the firong. Therefore fithence we have throughly examined and compared the one love tothe Rewith the other, it is very hard to judge altogether the difference that is between them. Peradventure therefore the judgment would not feem very ill, if we do give the GRECIAN for Discipline of War, the preheminence and praise of a good Captain : and to the ROMAN for Justice and Clemency, the Name and Dignity of a most Just and Courteous Gentleman,

Anno Mundi. 3662.

Ant. Christ. 286.

Pyrrus kindred, and beginning of the Kingdom of Evirus.

Pyrrus, red.

T is written, that fince Noahs floud, the first King of the THES PROTIANS, and of the Molossians, was Phaeton, one of those who came with Pelasgus into the Realm of EPIRUS. But some say otherwise, that Deucation, and his Wife Pyrra remained there, aiter they had built and founded the Temple of Dodone, in the Countrey of the MOLOSSIANS. But howfoever it was, a great while after that, Neoprolemus the Son of Achilles, bringing thither a great number of people with him, conquered the Conntrey, and after him left a Succession of Kings, which were called after his name, the PYRRIDES : because that from his infancy he was furnamed Pyrrus, as much to fay, as red; and one of his legitimate Sons whom he had by Lanaffa, the Daughter of Cleodes the Son of Hillus, was also named by him Pyrrus. And this is the cause why Achilles is honoured as a god in Epirus, being called in their language, Aspetos, that is to fay, mighty, or very great. But from the first Kings of that race until the time of Tharryta, there is no memory nor mention made of them: nor of their Power that Raigned in the mean time, because they all became very Barbarous, and utterly void of civility. Tharrysas was indeed the first that beautified the Cities of his Countrey with the GRECIAN tongue, brought in civil Laws and Customs, and made his name famous to the posterity that followed. This Tharrytas left a Son called Alceras; of Alceras came Arymbas, of Arymbas and Troiade his Wife came Aacides, who married Phithia the Daughter of Menon THESSALIAN, a famous man in the time of the wars, furnamed La-MILAN, and one that had far greater authority than any other of the Confederates, after Leofthens. . This Actides had two Daughters by his Wite Phithia, to fay, Deidamea and Troiade, and one Son called Pyrrus. In his time the MOLOSSIANS rebelled, drave him out of his Kingdom, and put the Crown into the hands of the Sons of Neoptolemus. Whereupon all the friends of Aucides that could be taken, were generally murthered and flain outright. Androclides and Angelus in the mean time fole away Pyrrus, being but a fucking babe, (whom his enemies nevertheless eagerly fought for to have de-How Pyrras Arroyed) and fled away with him as fast as possible they might, with few fervants, his Nurses and neceffary women only to look to the Child and give it fuck: by reason whereof their flight was much himdred, fo as they could go no great journeys, but that they might eafily be overtaken by them that followed. Tor which cause they put the child into the hands of Androction, Hippins, and Neander, three hifty young men whom they trufted with him, and commanded them to run for life to a certain City Magnet a Ci- of Macedon, called Megares, and they themselves in the mean time, partly by entreaty, and partty of Macelon. 1y by force made flay of those that followed them till night. So as with much ado having driven them back, they ran after them that carried the child Pyrru, whom they overtook at Sun-fet. And now, weening they had been fafe, and out of all danger, they found it clean contrary. For

when they came to the River under the Town Walls of MEGARES, they faw it so rough and fwift, that it made them afraid to behold it; and when they gaged the foord, they found it unpoffible to wade through, it was so high rifen and troubled with the fall of the rain, besides that the darkness of the night made every thing seem fearfull unto them. So as they now that carried the Child, thought it not good to venture the paffage over of themselves alone, with the women that tended the child: but hearing certain Countrey men on the other fide, they prayed and befought them in the name of the gods, that they would help them to pals over the Child, shewing Pyrrus unto them afar off. But the Countrey men by reason of the roaring of the River understood them not. Thus they continued a long space, the one crying, the other listning, yet could they not understand one another, till at the last one of the Company bethought himself to pill off the Bark of an Oak, and upon that he wrought with the tongue of a buckle, the hard fortune and necessity of the Child. Which he tied to a stone to give it weight, and so threw it over to the other fide of the River: other fay, that he did prick the Bark through with the point of a dart which he cast over. The Countrey men on the other side of the River, having read what was written, and understanding thereby the present danger the Child was in : felled down trees in all the hast they could possible, bound them together and so passed over the River. And it fortuned that the first man of them that passed over, and took the Child, was called Achilles: the refidue of the Countrey men passed over also, and took the other that came with the Child, and conveyed them over as they came first to hand. And thus having escaped their hands, by easie journeys they came at the length unto Glaucias King of ILLYRIA, whom they found in his houle fit- Glaucias King ting by his Wife: and laid down the (hild in the middeft of the floor before him. The King of Illyria. hereupon stayed a long time without uttering any one word, weighing with himself what was best to be done: because of the fear he had of Cassander, a mortal Enemy of Aacides. In the mean time, the Child Pyrrus creeping of all four, took hold of the Kings Gown, and scrawled up by that, and fo got up on his feet against the Kings knees. At the first, the King laughed to see the Child : but after it pitied him again, because the Child seemed like an humble suter that came to feek fanctuary in his Arms. Others fay, that Pyrrus came not to Glaucias, but unto the Altar of the familiar gods, alongst the which he got up on his feet, and embraced it with both his hands, Which Glaucias imagining to be done by gods providence, prefently delivered the Child to his Wife, gave her the charge of him, and willed her to fee him brought up with his own. Shortly after, his Enemies sent to demand the Child of him: and moreover, Cassander caused two hundred talents to be offered him, to deliver the Child Pyrrus into his hands. Howbeit Glaucias would never grant thereunto, but contrarily, when Pyrrus was come to twelve years old, he brought him into his Countrey of Epirus with an Army, and stablished him King of the Realm again: Pyrru had a great Majesty in his countenance, but yet indeed more fearfull then triendly. He had also no Teeth in his upper Jaw that stood distinctly one from another, but one whole bone Pyrrus counter throughout his Gum, marked a little at the top onely, with certain rifts in the place where the Teeth should be divided. For when he was dead, and that they burnt his body, all the reft being confumed to ashes, his great toe was whole, and had no hurt at all: but of The fire could that, we will write more hereafter. Now, when he was seventeen years of age, thinking him-not burn Pyrfelf fure enough of his Kingdom, it chanced him to make a journey into ILLYRIA, where he rus great toc. married one of Glaucias Daughters, with whom he had been brought up. But his back was no sooner turned, but the MOLOSSIANS rebelled again against him, and drave out his friends and Pyrrus Resim fervants, and destroyed all his goods, and yielded themselves unto his adversary Neoptolemus. taken from him King Pyrrm having thus loft his Kingdome, and feeing himself for faken on all fides, went to D_e -in his absence. metrius (Antigonus Son) that had married his Sifter Deidamia, who in her young age was affured to Alexander the Son of Alexander the Great, and of Roxane, and was called his Wife. But when all that race was brought to wicked end, Demetrius then married her, being come to full and able age. And in that great battle which was stricken near to the City of HIPsus, where all the Kings fought together, Pyrrus being then but a young man, and with Demetrius, put them all to flight that fought with him, and was worthily reputed for the valiantest Prince amongst them Pyrrasvaliantall. Furthermore, when Demetrius was overcome, and had loft the battle, Pyrrus never for look ness at the bathim, but faithfully did keep for him the Cities of Greece, which he put into his hands. And the of Hisfat. afterwards when Peace was concluded betwixt Demetrius and Ptolomy, Pyrrus was fent an Hostage for Demetrius into the Realm of EGYPT : where he made Ptolomy know (both in Hunting and in other exercises of his person) that he was very strong, hard, and able to endure any labour. Furthermore perceiving that Berenice amongst all King Ptolomy's Wives, was best beloved and esteemed of her husband, both for her Vertue and Wisdom, he began to entertain and honour her above all the reft. young Princes, to be the Husband of Antigona, the Daughter of Queen Berenice, whom she had Pyrms married by Philip, before she was married unto Prolomy. From thenceforth growing through the alliance of ryrrammetricu that marriage, more and more in estimation and favour by means of his Wise Antigona, who shewthe Daughter ed her felt very vertuous and loving towards him : he found means in the end, to get both men and of Philip King money to return again into the Realm of Epirus, and to conquer it: fo was be then very well or Micedan, and of his wife received of the people, and the better, for the malice they bare to Neoprolemus, because he dealt both hardly and cruelly with them. That notwithstanding, Pyrrus tearing lest Neoprolemus would repair unto fome of the other Kings, to feek aid against him, thought good to make peace with him. Whereupon it was agreed between them, that they should both together be Kings of Epirus. But in process of time, some of their men secretly made strife again between them, and set them at defiance one with another: and the chiefest cause as it is said, that angred Pyrrus most, grew upon this; of Epirar with the Kings of Epirars had an ancient custom of great antiquity, after they had made solemn sacrifice unto Inpiter Martiall, in a certain place in the Province of MOLOSSIDE (called PASSARON) to take their Oath, and to be sworn to the EPIROTS, that they would reign well and justly, according to the Laws and Ordinances of the Countrey; and to receive the Subjects Oaths interchangeably also, that they should defend and maintain them in their Kingdom, according to the Laws in like manner. This Ceremony was done in the prefence of both the Kings, and they with their friends did both give and receive Presents each of other. At this meeting and solemnity, among other, one Gelon a most faithfull servant and assured friend unto Neoprolemus, who besides great thews of friendship and honour he did unto Pyrrus, gave him two pair of draught Oxen, which one Myrillus a Cup-bearer of Pyrrus being present, and seeing did crave of his Master. But Pyrrus denyed to give them unto him, whereat Myrilus was very angry. Gelon perceiving that Myrtilus was angry, prayed him to fup withhim that night. Now fome fay, he fought to abuse Myrtilus, becaule he was fair and young: and began to perswade him after supper to take part with Neoprolemus, and poylon Pyrrus. Myrilus made as though he was willing to give ear to this periwation, and to be well pleafed withall. But in the mean time, he went and told his matter of it, by whose commandment he made Alexicrates, Pyrius chief Cup-bearer, to talk with Gelon about this practife, as though he had also given his consent to it, and was willing to be partaker of the enterprize. This did Pyrrus to have two Witnesses, to prove the pretended poyloning of him. Thus Gelon being finely deceived, and Neoprolemus also with him, both imagining they had cunningly foun the thread of their treason: Neoptolemus was so glad of it, that he could not keep it himself, but told it to certain of his friends. And on a time going to be merry with his Sister, he could not keep it in, but must be pratling of it to her, supposing no body had heard him but her felf, because there was no living creature near them, faving Phænareta, Samons wife, the Kings chief heardman of all his beafts, and yet the was laid upon a little bed by, and turned towards the wall: fo that the feemed as though the had flept. But having heard all their talk, and no body miltrufting her: the next morning she went to Antigona King Pyrrus wife, and told her every word what she had heard Neoptolemus say to his Sister. Pyrrus hearing this, made no countenance of any thing at that time: but having made facrifice unto the gods, he bad Neoprolemus to supper to his houle, where he flew him, being well informed before of the good will the chiefest men of the Realm did bear him, who wifhed him to dispatch Neoprolemus, and not to content himself with a piece of EPIRUS onely, but to follow his natural inclination, being born to great things: and for this cause, this suspection also falling out in the mean while, he prevented Neoptolemus and flew him first. And surthermore, remembring the pleasures he had received of Ptolomy and Berenice, he named his first Son by his Wife Antigona, Prolomy, and having built a City in the PRES-Berenicile, a QUE, an Isle of EPIRUS, did name it BERENICIDA. When he had done that, imagining City of Epirus great matters in his head, but more in his hope, he first determined with himself how to win that which lay nearest unto him: and so took occasion by this means, first to set foot into the Empire of Macedon. The eldeft Son of Cassander, called Anipater, put his own Mother The falonica to death, and drave his Brother Alexander out of his own Countrey, who fent to Demetrius for help, and called in Pyrrus also to his aid. Demetrius being troubled with other maters could not fo quickly go thither. And Pyrrus being arrived there, demanded for his charge fultained, the City of NYMPHEA, with all the Sea coafts of MACEDON: and befides all that, certain Lands also that were not belonging to the ancient Crown and Revenues of the Kings of Ma-CEDON, but were added unto it by force of Arms, as Ambracia, Acarnania, and Amphilochia. All thele, the young King Alexander leaving unto him, he took possession thereof, and put good Garrifons into the same in his own name; and conquering the rest of MACEDON in the name of Mexander, put his Brother Antipater to great diffres. In the mean time King Lysimachus lacking no good will to help Antipater with his force, but being busied in other matters, had not the mean to do it. Howbeit knowing very well that Pyrrus in acknowledging the great pleasures he had received of Ptolomy, would deny him nothing: he determined to write counterfeit Letters to him in Ptolomy's name, and thereby instantly to pray and require him to leave off the Wars begun King Lifima- against Antipater, and to take of him towards the defraying of his charges, the sum of three hunconstructed dred Talents. Pyrrus opening the Letters, knew straight that this was but a fetch and device of Lysimachus. For King Prolomy's common manner of greeting of him, which he used at the beginning of his Letters, was not in them observed : To my Son Pyrrus, health. But in those counterfeit was,

King Ptolony, unto King Pyrus health. Whereupon he presently pronounced Lysimachus for a naughty man: nevertheless, afterwards he made Peace with Antipater, and they met together at a day appointed, to be sworn upon the Sacrifices unto the Articles of peace. There were three beafts brought to be facrificed, a Goat, a Bull, and a Ram: of the which, the Ram fell down dead of himlelf before he was touched, whereat all the standers by fell a laughing. But there was Theodotus a Soothfayer, one Theodotus, that perswaded Pyrrus not to swear: saying that this sign and to judgement, a ken of the gods did threaten one of the three Kings with sudden death. For which cause Pyrrus Soothsayer. concluded no peace. Now Alexanders Wars being ended, Demetrius notwithstanding came to him, knowing well enough at his coming that Alexander had no more need of his aid, and that he did it onely but to fear him. They had not been many days together, but the one began to mistrust the other, and to spy all the ways they could to intrap each other; but Demerrius embracing the first occasion offered, prevented Alexander, and slew him being a young man, and proclaimed himself King of MACEDON in his room. Now Demetrius had certain quarrels Pyrrus quarrel before against Pyrrus, because he had over-run the Country of THESSALY : and furthermore, and war with greedy covetousness to have the more (which is a common vice with Princes and Noble men) Demetrius. made, that being so near neighbours, the one stood in sear and mistrust of the other, and yet much more after the death of Deidamia. But now that they both occupied all MACEDON between them, and were to make division of one self Kingdom: now I say began the matter and occasion of quarrel to grow the greater between them. Whereupon Demetrius went with his Army to fet upon the ATOLIANS, and having conquered the Countrey, left Pantauchus his Lieu- Pantauchus, tenant there with a great Army: and himself in person in the mean time marched against Pyrrus, Demetrius and Pyrrus on the other fide against him. They both missed of meeting, and Demetrius going on Lieutenant in further on the one fide, entred into the Realm of Epirus, and brought a great spoil away with him: Pyrrus on the other fide marched on, till he came to the place where Pantauchus was. To whom he gave battle, and it was valiantly fought out between the Souldiers of either party, but specially between the two Generals. For doubtless Pantauchus was the valiantest Captain, the Privite fights floutest man, and of the greatest experience in Arms, of all the Captains and Souldiers Demetrius with Pantaus had. Whereupon Pantauchus trusting in his strength and courage, advanced himself forwards, chasand luftily challenged the combat of Pyrrus. Pyrrus on the other fide being inferiour to no King in valiantness, nor in desire to win honour; as he that would ascribe unto himself the glory of Achilles, more for the invitation of his valiancy, then for that he was descended of his blood; passed through the midst of the battle unto the first rank, to buckle with Pantauchus. Thus they began to charge one another, first with their darts, and then coming nearer, fought with their fwords, not onely artificially, but also with great force and fury: untill such time as Pyrrus was hurt in one place, and he hurt Pantauchus in two, the one near unto his throat, and the other in his leg: fo as in the end Pyrrus made him turn his back, and threw him to the ground, but nevertheless killed him not. For, so soon as he was down, his men took him up, and carried Pyrrus vistory him away. But the EPIROTS encouraged by the victory of their King, and the admiration of of Pantauchuc. his valiantness, stook to it so lustily, that in the end they brake the battle of the MACEDONIAN footmen: and having put them to flight, followed them so lively, that they slew a great number of them, and took five thousand prisoners. This overthrow did not so much fill the hearts of the MACEDONIANS with anger, for the loss they had received, nor with the hate conceived against Pyrrus: as it wan Pyrrus great fame and honour, making his courage and valiantness to be wondred at of all fuch as were present at the battle that saw him fight, and how he laid about him. For they thought that they faw in his face the very life and agility of Alexander the Great, and the Prerus likened right shaddow as it were, shewing the force and sury of Alexander himself in that fight. And to Alexander where other Kings did but onely counterfeit Alexander the Great in his purple garments, and the Great: in numbers of Souldiers and Guards about their persons, and in a certain fashion and bowing of their necks a little, and in uttering their speech with an high voice: Pyrrus onely was like unto him, and followed him in his Martial deeds and valiant Acts. Furthermore, for his experience and skill Pyrrus skill in Warlike Discipline, the books he wrote himself thereof, do amply prove and makemanises; warlick disci-Furthermore, they report, that King Antigonus being asked, whom he thought to be the greatest pline. But Hannibal generally faid, Pyrrus was the greatest Captain of experience Hannibals and skill in Wars of all other, Scipio the second, and himself the third : as we have written in the judgment of Life of Scipio. So it seemeth that Pyrrus gave his whole life and study to the Discipline of Wars, Captains. as that which indeed was Princely and meet for a King, making no reckoning of all other knowledge. And furthermore touching this matter, they report that he being at a feast one day, a queftion was asked him, whom he thought to be the best player of the Flute, Python or Cephesia: whereunto he answered, that Polyperchon in his opinion was the best Captain, as if he would have Pyrrus wife faid, that was the onely thing a Prince should feek for, and which he ought chiefly to learn and answer. know. He was very gentle and familiar with his friends, easie to forgive when any had offended Pyrrai good him, and marvellous defirous to requite and acknowledg any courteste or pleasure by him receites ved. And that was the cause why he did very unpatiently take the death of Eropus, not so much for his death (which he knew was a common thing to every living creature) as for that he was angry with himself he had deferred the time to long, that time it felf had cut him off from all occasion and means to require the courtefies he had received of him. Pyrrus kindred, and beginning of the Kingdom of Epirus.

T is written, that fince Noahs floud, the first King of the THES PROTIANS, and of the Molossians, was Phaeton, one of those who came with Pelafgus into the Realm of Epirus. But fome fay otherwise, that Deucalion, and his Wife Pyrra remained there, after they had built and founded the Temple of Dodone, in the Countrey of the MOLDSSIANS. But howfoever it was, a great while after that, Neoptolemus the Son of Achilles, bringing thither a great number of people with him, conquered the Conntrey, and after him left a Succession of Kings, which were called after his name, the PYRRIDES: because that from his infancy he was furnamed Pyrrus, as much to fay, as red : and one of his legitimate Sons whom he had by Lanassa, the Daughter of Cleodes the Son of Hillus, was also named by him Pyrrus. And this is the cause why Achilles is honoured as a god in Epirus, being called in their language, Aspetos, that is to fay, mighty, or very great. But from the first Kings of that race until the time of Tharry us, there is no memory nor mention made of them: nor of their Power that Raigned in the mean time, because they all became very Barbarous, and utterly void of civility. Tharry as was indeed the first that beautified the Cities of his Countrey with the GRECIAN tongue, brought in civil Laws and Cuftoms, and made his name famous to the posterity that followed. This Tharrytas left a Son called Alectus; of Alectus came Arymbus, of Arymbus and Troinde his Wife came Ancides, who married Phithia the Daughter of Menon THESSALIAN, a famous man in the time of the wars, furnamed LA-MIAN, and one that had far greater authority than any other of the Confederates, after Leofthens. This Lucides had two Daughters by his Wire Phithia, to fay, Deidamea and Troiade, and one Son called Fyrrus. In his time the MOLOSSIANS rebelled, drave him out of his Kingdom, and put the Crown into the hands of the Sons of Neoprolemus. Whereupon all the friends of Aucides that could be taken, were generally murthered and flain ourright. Androclides and Angelus in the mean time flole away Pyrrus, being but a fucking babe, (whom his enemies nevertheles eagerly fought for to have detion 1) train troyed) and fled away with him as fast as possible they might, with few servants, his Nurses and necellary women only to look to the Child and give it fuck: by reason whereof their flight was much hindred, to as they could go no great journeys, but that they might eafily be overtaken by them that followcd. For which cause they put the child into the hands of Androction, Hippias, and Neander, three lastry young men whom they trufted with him, and commanded them to run for life to a certain City EGGING & CI- of MACEDON, Called MEGARES, and they themselves in the mean time, parely by entreaty, and partto of Macelon. It by force made flay of those that followed them till night. So as with much ado having driven them back, they can after them that carried the child Pyrru; whose they overtook, at Sun-fet. And now, weening they had been fife, and our of all danger, that found it clean contrary. For when they came to the River under the Town Walls of MEGARES, they faw it fo rough and fwift, that it made them afraid to behold it; and when they gaged the foord, they found it unpossible to wade through, it was so high rifen and troubled with the fall of the rain, besides that the darkness of the night made every thing seem searfull unto them. So as they now that carried the Child, thought it not good to venture the paffage over of themselves alone, with the women that tended the child: but hearing certain Countrey men on the other fide, they prayed and befought them in the name of the gods, that they would help them to pals over the Child, shewing Pyrrus unto them afar off. But the Countrey menby reason of the roaring of the River. understood them not. Thus they continued a long space, the one crying, the other listning, yet could they not understand one another, till at the last one of the Company bethought hunself to pill off the Bark of an Oak, and upon that he wrought with the tongue of a buckle, the hard fortune and necessity of the Child. And furthermore, remembring the pleasures he had received of Ptolomy and Berenice, he named his first Son by his Wife Antigona, Ptolomy, and having built a City in the PRES-Ecrenicilia, a Que, an Isle of Epirus, did name it Berenicida. When he had done that, imagining City of Epiras great matters in his head, but more in his hope, he first determined with himself how to win that which lay nearest unto him: and so took occasion by this means, first to set foot into the Empire of MACEDON. The eldest Son of Cassander, called Antipater, put his own Mother The flutonica to death, and drave his Brother Alexander out of his own Countrey, who fent to Demetrius for help, and called in Pyrrus also to his aid. Demetrius being troubled with other matters could not fo quickly go thither. And Pyrrus being arrived there, demanded for his charge fustained, the City of NYMPHEA, with all the Sea coasts of MACEDON: and besides all that, certain Lands also that were not belonging to the ancient Crown and Revenues of the Kings of MA-CEDON, but were added unto it by force of Arms, as Ambracia, Acarnania, and Amphilochia. All these, the young King Alexander leaving unto him, he took possession thereof, and put good Garrisons into the same in his own name: and conquering the rest of MACEDON in the name of Alexander, put his Brother Antipater to great diffress. In the mean time King Lysimachus lacking no good will to help Antipater with his force, but being busied in other matters, had not the mean to do it. Howbeit knowing very well that Pyrrus in acknowledging the great pleafures he had received of Ptolony, would deny him nothing: he determined to write counterfeit Letters to him in Ptolomy's name, and thereby instantly to pray and require him to leave off the Wars begun against Antipater, and to take of him towards the defraying of his charges, the sum of three hunchus craft to de dred Talents. Pyrrus opening the Letters, knew straight that this was but a fetch and device of Lystmachus. For King Prolomy's common manner of greeting of him, which he used at the beginning of his Letters, was not in them observed: To my Son Pyrrus, health. But in those counterfeit was,

333 King Ptolomy, unto King Pyrus health. Whereupon he prefently pronounced Lysimachus for a naughty man: nevertheless, afterwards he made Peace with Antipater, and they met together at a day appointed, to be sworn upon the Sacrifices unto the Articles of peace. There were three beafts brought to be sacrificed, a Goat, a Bull, and a Ram: of the which, the Ram fell down dead of himlelf before he was touched, whereat all the standers by fell a laughing. But there was Theology a Soothfayer, one Theodorus, that perfivaded Pyrrus not to fivear: faying that this fign and to-judgem.n. a ken of the gods did threaten one of the three Kings with fudden death. For which cause Pyrrus Southlayer. concluded no peace. Now Alexanders Wars being ended, Demerrius notwithstanding came to him, knowing well enough at his coming that Alexander had no more need of his aid, and that hedid it onely but to fear him. They had not been many days together, but the one began to militrust the other, and to spy all the ways they could to intrap each other; but Demotring embracing the first occasion offered, prevented Alexander, and sew him being a young man, and proclaimed hinself King of Macedon in his room. Now Demetrius had certain quarrels Pyrous quartel before against Pyrrus, because he had over-run the Country of THESSALY: and furthermore, and war with greedy coverounces to have the more (which is a common vice with Princes and Noble men) Demetriar. made, that being so near neighbours, the one stood in sear and mistrust of the other, and yet nuch more after the death of Deidamia. But now that they both occupied all MACEDON between them, and were to make division of one self Kingdom: now I say began the matter and occasion of quarrel to grow the greater between them. Whereupon Demetrius went with his Army to fet upon the ATOLIANS, and having conquered the Countrey, left Pantauchus his Lieu- Pantauchus, tenant there with a great Army: and himself in person in the mean time marched against Pyrrus, Demeritar and Pyrrus on the other fide against him. They both missed of meeting, and Demetrius going on Licutenna in further on the one fide, entred into the Realm of Epirus, and brought a great spoil away Etolia. with him: Pyrrus on the other fide marched on, till he came to the place where Pantauchus was. To whom he gave battle, and it was valiantly fought out between the Souldiers of either party, but specially between the two Generals. For doubtless Pantauchus was the valiantest Captain, the Pyrnis fights fourest man, and of the greatest experience in Arms, of all the Captains and Souldiers Demerriar with Pantalhad. Whereupon Pantauchus trusting in his strength and courage, advanced himself forwards, charand luftily challenged the combat of Pyrrus. Pyrrus on the other fide being inferiour to no King in valiantness, nor in desire to win honour, as he that would ascribe unto himself the glory of Achilles, more for the invitation of his valiancy, then for that he was descended or his blood; passed through the midst of the battle unto the first rank, to buckle with Pantauchus. Thus they began to charge one another, first with their darts, and then coming nearer, fought with their fwords, not onely artificially, but also with great force and fury: untill such time as Pyrrus was hurt in one place, and he hurt Pantauchus in two, the one near unto his throat, and the other in his leg : so as in the end Pyrrus made him turn his back, and threw him to the ground, but neverthelels killed him not. For, so soon as he was down, his men took him up, and carried Pyrrus vistory him away. But the EPIROTS encouraged by the victory of their King, and the admiration of of Pannachui his valiantness, stook to it so lustily, that in the end they brake the battle of the MACEDONIAN footmen: and having put them to flight, followed them so lively, that they slew a great number of them, and took five thousand prisoners. This overthrow did not so much fill the hearts of the MACEDONIANS with anger, for the loss they had received, nor with the hate conceived against Pyrrus: as it wan Pyrrus great fame and honour, making his courage and valiantness to be wondred at of all such as were present at the battle that saw him fight, and how he laid about him. For they thought that they faw in his face the very life and agility of Alexander the Great, and the Pyrras likened right shaddow as it were, shewing the force and sury of Alexander himself in that fight. And to Alexander where other Kings did but onely counterfeit Alexander the Great in his purple garments, and the Great. in numbers of Souldiers and Guards about their persons, and in a certain fashion and bowing of their necks a little, and in uttering their speech with an high voice: Pyrrus onely was like unto him, and followed him in his Martial deeds and valiant Acts. Forthermore, for his experience and skill private skill in Warlike Difcipline, the books he wrote himself thereof, do amply prove and make manifest, waitiek difeituremore, they report, that King Antigonus being asked, whom he thought to be the greatest pline. Captain: made answer, Pyrrus, so far forth as he might live to be old, speaking onely of the Captains of his time. But Hannibal generally faid, Pyrras was the greatest Captain of experience Hannibals and skill in Wars of all other, Scipio the second, and himself the third: as we have written in the judgment of Life of Scipio. So it feemeth that Pyrrus gave his whole life and study to the Discipline of Wars, Capains. as that which indeed was Princely and meet for a King, making no reckoning of all other knowledge. And furthermore touching this matter, they report that he being at a feaft one day, a queftion was asked him, whom he thought to be the best player of the Flute, Python or Cephesia: whereunto he answered, that Polyperchon in his opinion was the best Captain, as if he would have Pyrrus wife faid, that was the onely thing a Prince should feek for, and which he ought chiefly to learn and answer. know. He was very gentle and familiar with his friends, easie to forgive when any had offended Print good him, and marvellous defirous to requite and acknowledg any courtefte or pleasure by him receineds and courted. And that was the canfe who he did nev unnationally take the death of Academy not for myst teste. ved. And that was the cause why he did very unpatiently take the death of Fropus, not so much for his death (which he knew was a common thing to every living creature) as for that he was angry with himself he had deferred the time to long, that time it felf had cut him off from all occasion and means to requite the courtesies he had received of him. True it is, that money lent may be repaid again unto the heirs of the lender: but yet it grieveth an honest nature, when he Certain witry cannot recompence the good will of the lender, of whom he hath received the good turn. Another fayings of Pyr- time Pyrrus being in the City of Ambracia, there were certain of his friends that gave him counfel to put a naughty man out of the City, that did nothing but speak ill of him. But he answered : It is better (quoth he) to keep him here still, speaking ill of us but to a few, then driving him away, to make him speak ill of us every where. Certain youths were brought before him on a time, who making merry together, drinking freely, were bold with the King to speak their pleasure of him in very undutifull fort. So, Pyrru asking them whether it was true they faid fo, or no: It is true, and it please your grace, faid one of them, we faid it indeed, and had not our wine failed us, we had spoken a great deal more. The King laughed at it, and pardoned them. After the death of Antigona, he married and children, many Wives to encreale his power withall, and to get more friends. For he married the Daughter of Autoleon King of PEONIA, and Bircenna the Daughter of Bardillis King of ILLYRIA, and Lanaffa the Daughter of Agathocles, Tyrant of Syracusa, that brought him for her dower the Isle of CORPHUE, which her Father had taken. By Antigona his first wife, he had a Son called Ptolomy: by Lanaffa another called Alexander ; and by Bircenna, another (the youngest of all) called Heleniss: all which though they were martial men by race and natural inclination, yet were they brought up by him in Wars, and therein trained as it were even from their cradle. They write, that one of his fons being but a boy, asked him one day, to which of them he would leave his Kingdom: Pyrrus anfwered the boy, To him that hath the sharpest sword. That was much like the tragical curse wherewith Ocdipus cursed his children:

Let them (for me) divide, both goods, yearents and land, With trenchant sword, and bloody blows, by force of mighty hand.

Pyrrus called an Eagle.

Presue invadeth Maccion.

my both by land and fea.

So cruell, hatefull, and beaftly is the nature of ambition and defire of rule. But after this battle, Pyr-THE returned home again to his Countrey full of honour and glory, his heart highly exalted, and his mind throughly contented. And as at his return the EPIROTS his subjects called him an Eagle, he answered them, If I be an Eagle, it is through you that I am so, for your weapons are the Kings wings that raifed meup. Shortly after, being advertised that Demetrius was faln fick, and in great danger of death, he fuddenly went into MACEDON, onely to invade it, and to make prey thereof: howbeit he had indeed almost taken the whole Realm, and made himself Lord of all without stroak stricken. For he came as far as the City of EDESSA, and found no refiftance; but rather to the contrary : many of the countrey willingly came to this Camp, and submitted themselves. The danger Demetrius was in to lofe his Realm, did move him more, then the disease and the sickness of his body. And on the other fide, his friends, fervants, and Captains, having gathered a great number of men of War together in a marvellous short time, marched with great speed towards Pyrrus, being earnestly bent to do some exploit against him: who being come into MACEDON but to make a road onely upon them, would not tarry them, but fled, and flying loft part of his men, because the MACEDONIANS followed him hard, and fet upon him by the way. But now, though they had driven Pyrrus thus eafily out of MACEDON. Demetrius for all that did not make light account of him : but pretending greater things (as to recover Demetrius Ar- the Lands and Dominions of his father, with an Army of an hundred thousand fighting men, and of five hundred fail which he put to the Sea) would not stand to make wars against Pyrrus, neither yet leave the MACEDONIANS (whilft he was absent) so dangerous a neighbour, and so ill to deal withall. But lacking leifure to make wars with Pyrrus, concluded a peace with him, to the end he might with the more liberty fet upon the other Kings. Thus now, the peace concluded betwixt Demetrius and Pyrus, the other Kings and Princes began to find out Demetrius intent, and why he had made fo great preparation: and being afraid thereof, wrote unto Pyrrus by their Ambassadors, that they wondered how he could let go such opportunity and occasion, and to tarry till Demetrius might with bester leisure make wars upon him. And why he chose rather to tarry and fight with him for the Altars, Temples, Sepulchers of the MOLLOSSIANS, when he should be of greater power, and have no wars elsewhere to trouble him: then now that he might eafily drive him out of MACEDON, having so many things in hand, and being troubled as he was in other places. And confidering also that very lately he had taken one of his Wives from him, with the City of Co R PHUE. For Lanaffa milliking that Pyrrus loved his other wives better than her (they being of a barbarous nation) got her unto CORPHUE: and defimatried Lang. ring to marry fome other King; fent for Demetrius, knowing that he of all other Kings would found fa Pyrna wife, be won thereunto. Whereupon Demetrius went thither and married her, and left a garrifon in his City of CORPHUE. Now these other Kings that did advertise Pyrrus in this sort, themselves did srouble Demetrius in the mean while: who tracted time, and yet went on with his preparation notwithstanding. For on the one side Ptolomy entered GREECE with a great Army by Sea, where he caused the Cities to revolt against him : and Lysimachus on the other side also, entring into high MA-CEDON by the countrey of THRACIA, burnt and spoiled all as he went. Pyrrus also arming himfelf with them, went unto the City of BEROEA, imagining (as afterwards it fell out) that Demetrins going against Lysimachus, would leave all the low countrey of MACEDON naked without any garrison or desence. And the self same night that Pyrrus departed, he imagined that King Alexander Pyrrus dream, the Great did call him, and also that he went unto him, and found him fick in his bed, of whom he had very good words and entertainment: in to much as he promited to help him throughly. And Pyrrus imagined also that he was so bold to demand of him again : How (my Lord) can you help me, that lie fick in your bed? and that Alexander made answer : With my name onely. And that moreover he fuddenly therewithall got up on his horse Wisen, and rode before Pyrrus to guide him the way. This vision he had in his dream, which made him bold, and furthermore encouraged him to go on with his enterprize. By which occasion, marching forward with all speed, in sew days he ended his intended enterprize. By which occation, matching to tweet what an appear are the most part of his pyrran fecond gourney to the City of Beroen, which fuddenly he took at his first coming to it: the most part of his pyrran fecond Army he layed in Garrison there, the refidue he sent away under the conduct of his Captains, here and journey into there, to conquer the Cities thereabouts, Demetrius having intelligence hereof, and hearing also an Maccion. ill rumour that ran in his Camp amongst the Macedo NIAN's, durst not lead any surther, for sear left (when he should come near to Lyssmachus, being a MACEDONIAN King by nation, and a Prince efteemed for a famous Captain) they should shrink from him, and take Lysmachus part: for this cause therefore he turned again upon the sudden against Pyrrus, as against a strange Prince, and illbeloved of the MACEDONIANS. But when he came to encamp near him, many coming from BEperoved of the MACEDONIANS. Date which he came to change that he was a noble Prince, invincible in wars, and one that courteoully intreated all those he took to his party: and amongst those, there were other that were no natural MACEDONIANS born, but fet on by Pyrru, and fained themselves to be MACEDONIANS, who gave out, that now occasion was offered to fet them at liberty from \mathcal{D}_{e^-} metrius proud and stately rule, and to take King Pyrrus part, that was a courteous Prince, and one that loved Souldiers and men of War. These words made the most part of Demetrius Army very doubtfull, in so much as the MACEDONIANS looked about, to see if they could find out Fyrrus to yield themselves unto him. He had at that present lest off his head-piece : by means whereof, perceiving he was not known, he put it on again, and then they knew him afar off, by the fight of his goodly How Pyrtas ng ne was not known, ne put te ou again, and the top of his creft. Whereupon there came a piece. great number of MACEDONIANS to his part, as unto their Soveraign Lord and King, and required the watchword of him. Other put garlands of Oaken boughs about their heads, because they saw his men crowned after that fort. And some were so bold also, as to go to Demetrius himself, and tell him, that in their opinions he should do very well and wisely to give place to fortune, and refer all unto Pyrrus. Demetrius hereupon, seeing his Camp in such uproar, was so amazed, that he knew not what way to take, but stole away secretly, disguised in a threadbare cloak and a hood on his head to keep him from knowledge. Pyrrus forthwith feiled upon his Camp, took all that he found, and was prefently proclaimed in the field, King of MACEDON. Lysmachus on the other fide, came ftraight this Pyrrus protentry procraimed in the neith, rang of man cape is.

Privation of the Realm, and therefore claim-claimed King ther after him, and faid that he had holpen to chafe Demorring out of his Realm, and therefore claim-claimed King there after him, and therefore claim-claimed King there after him. ed half the Kingdom with him. Wherefore Pyrrus not trufting the MACEDO NIA NS too far as yet, but of Macedon. rather standing in doubt of their faith : granted Lysimachus his desire, and thereupon divided all the Cities and Provinces of the Realm of MACEDON between them. This partition was profitable for Macedon divi-Chies and Provinces of the realin of MACEDON Detween them. This partition was promable for macedon utra-them both at that prefent, and frood then to good purpose to pacific the war, that otherwise might fud-ded between dealy have risen between them. But shortly after, they found that this partition was no end of their en-priss and Ly-mity, but rather a beginning of guarrel and differnion between them. For they whose graving and unsamity, but rather a beginning of quarrel and diffention between them. For they whole avarice and unfaCoverounes tiable greedy appetite, neither the fea, the mountains, nor the unhabitable deferts could contain, nor yet hath no end. the confines that separate ASIA from Euro PE determine : how should they be content with their own, without usurping others, when their frontiers joyn so near together, that nothing divides them? Sure it is not possible. For to say truly, they are willingly together by the ears, having these two cursed things rooted in them: that they continually feek occasion how to surprize each other, and either of them envies his neighbors well doing. Howbeit in appearance they use these two terms of peace and wars, as Peace andwars, they do money : using it as they think good, not according to right and justice, but for their private profit. And truly they are men of far greater honefty, that make open war, and avow it, then those that diguife and colour the delay of their wicked purpole, by the holy name of justice or friendship : which Pyrrus did truly then verifie. For desiring to keep Demetrius down from rising another time, and Pyrrus sided that he should revive again, as escaped from a long dangerous disease: he went to aid the GRECI- the Grecinst ANS against him, and was at ATHENS, where they suffered him to come into the castle, and to do sa against him. crifice unto the goddes Minerva. But coming our of the castle again the same day, he told the wine. ATHENIANS he was greatly beholding unto them for their courteste, and the great trust they had reposed in him: wherefore to require them again, he gave them counsell, never to suffer Prince nor King from thenceforth to enter into their City, if they were wife, nor once open their gates unto them. So after that he had made Peace with Demetrius, who within short time being gone to make wars in Asia, Pyrus yet once again (perfwaded thereunto by Lysmachus) caused all Thessaly to rife against him, and went himself to set upon those Garrisons which Demetring had left in the Cities of GREECE, liking better to continue the MACEDONIANS in War, then to leave them in Peace: befides that, himself also was of such a nature, as could not long continue in peace. Demetrius thus in the end being utterly overthrown in Syria, Lysimachus seeing himself free from fear on that side, Lysimachus machanish and being at good leifure, as having nothing to trouble him otherways, went straight to make war keth war with upon Fyrras, who then remained near unto the City of EDESSA, and meeting by the way with the Private convoy of victuals coming towards him, fet upon the conducters, and rifled them wholly. By this means, first he distressed Pyrrus for want of victuals: then he corrupted the Princes of Mace-DON with Letters and Meffengers; declaring unto them, what shame they sustained to have made a ftranger their King (whose ancestors had ever been their vassals and subjects) and to have turned all those out of MACEDON, that had been familiar friends of King Alexander the Great. Many of the MACEDONIANS were won by these perswasions: which sact so seared Pyrrus, that he departed out of Macedon with his men of War, the Epinors, and other his confederates: and so lost

MACEDON by the felf fame means he wan it. Kings and Princes therefore must not blame private men, though they change and alter some time for their profit; for therein they do but follow the example of Princes, who teach them all difloyalty, treason, and infidelity, judging him most worthy of gain, that least observeth justice and equity. So Pyrrus being come home again to his Kingdom of E-PIRUS, forfaking Mac EDO N altogether, Fortune made him happy enough, and indeed he had good means to live peaceably at home, without any trouble, if he could have contented himself onely with the foveraignty over his own natural fubjects. But thinking, that if he did neither hurt other, nor that other did hurt him, he could not tell how to spend his time, and by peace he should pine away for forrow, as Homer faid of Achilles :

He languished and pin'd by taking ease andrest: And in the wars where travell was, he lived ever beft.

The Tarentines vife how to pacifie the fame, by reason of the rathnels, folly, and wickednels of their governours, he was less troubled at that time, then any of the other Kings about them, and was esteemed of every with the Roman also to be a noble Souldier, and famous Captain. The Elders and wise men of the City, utterly mine to make their General, who cryed for wars. Some other feeing them checked, and taken up by the multitude in this manner, Meton counter would no more repair to their common Assemblies. Among the rest there was one Meton, an honest ter, this Meton put an old withered Garland of flowers upon his head, and carrying a Torch in his fend for Pyrrus hand as though he had been drunk, and having a woman Minstrel before him playing on a pipe, City in Italy. to the Taren- merry that are fo disposed, whilst they may lawfully do it: and if you be wife every of you also (as dors to Pyrrus. from other GRECIANS also that dwelt in ITALY, faying that they stood in need of a wife and skiland threehundred thousand footmen being all Assembled together. These words of the Ambassadors did not onely lift up Pyrrus heart, but made the EPIROTS also marvellous desirous to go this jour-Cines the O. ney. There was in King Pyrrus Court one Ciness THE SALIAN, a man of great understanding, Traces and that had been Demostheres the Orators Scholer, who feemed to be the onely man of all other in his lian born, and time in common reputation, to be most Eloquent, following the lively image and shadow of Demostheartending in nes passing Eloquence. This Cineas, Pyrrus ever entertained about him, and sent him Ambassador to the People and Cities thereabouts: where he verrified Euripides words:

As much as trenchant blades, in mighty hand may do, So much can skill of Eloquence, atchieve and conquer to.

And therefore Pyrrus would often fay, that Cineas had won him more Towns with his Eloquence, than he himself had done by the Sword : for which he did greatly honour and employ him in all his chief affairs. Cineas perceiving that Pyrrus was marvelloully bent to thefe Wars of ITALY, findtalk with Pyr- ing him one day at leisure, discoursed with him in this sort : It is reported, and it please your Marittomoderate jefty, that the ROMANS are very good men of War, and that they command many valiant and warlick Nations: if it please the gods we do overcome them, what benefit shall we have of that Victory? Pyrrus answered him again, Thou dost ask me a question that is manifest of it felf: for when we have once overcome the ROMANS, there can neither GRECIAN nor barbarous City in all the Countrey withftand us, but we shall straight Conquer all the rest of ITALY with ease, whose Greatness, Wealth, and Power, no man knoweth better than my self. Cineas pausing a while, replied : And when we have taken ITALY, what shall we do then ? Pyrrus not finding his meaning yet, said unto him: SICILIA, as thou knowest, is hard joyning to it, and doth as it were offer it felf unto us, and is a marvellous popullos and rich Land, and caffe to be taken: for all the

And thus feeking matter of new trouble, Fortune presented him this occasion. About this time the Ro-MANS by chance made war with he TARENTINES, who could neither bear their force, nor yet dewho perswaded them to make Pyrrus General, and to send for him for to conduct these wars : because milliked that council; but fome of them were put to filence, through the noise and fury of the people, feiting the fool worshipfull Citizen, who when the day was come that the people should conclude in Council the Dewifely perlwa- cree for the calling in of Pyrrus: all the people of TARENTUM being affembled, and fet in the Theaded the Tura- cree for the calling in of Pyrrus: went dancing in this goodly aray through the midft of the whole Affembly. And there (as it happeneth commonly in every hurly burly of people that will be Mafters themselves, and where no good order is kept) some of them clapped their hands, other burst out in a laughter, and every man suffered him to do what he lift : but they all cryed out to the woman Minstrel, to play and spare not, and to Meton himself, that he should fing and come forward. So Meton made shew as though he prepared himfelf unto it: and when they had given filence to hear him fing, he spake unto them with a loud voice Metons counted in this manner: My Lords of TARENTUM, ye do wellfure, not to forbid them to play and to be many as you be) will take your liberty whilft you may enjoy it. For when King Pyrrus shall be in this City, you shall live I warrant you after another fort, and not as ye now do. These words of Meton moved many of the TARENTINES, and fuddenly there ran a rumour through all the Affembly, that he had faid truly. But they that had offended the ROMANS, fearing if peace were made, that they should be delivered into their hands, they checked the people, asking them if they were such fools, as would abide to be mocked and played withall to their teeth ; and with those words all ran upon Meton The Tarentines and drave him out of the Theatre. The Decree thus confirmed by voices of the people they fent Ambaffend Ambaña. fadors into Epirus, to carry prefents unto King Pyrrus, not onely from the TARENTINES, but full Captain, that was reputed famous in Martial Discipline. And as to the reft, for numbers of good Souldiers, they had men enough in ITALY, and were able to bring an Army into the Field, of the LUCANIANS, the MESSAPIANS, the SAMNITES, and TARENTINES, of twenty thousand horse, warstake end? If the gods were pleased, said Pyrrus, that the Victory were atchieved, the way tors corruption werethen broad open for us to attain great conquests. For who would not afterwards go into A-FRICK, and so to CARTHAGE, which also will be an easie conquest, since Agarboeles secretly flying from Syracusa, and having passed the Seas with a few Ships, had almost taken it? And that once conquered, it is most certain there durst not one of all our enemies that now do daily vex and trouble us, lift up their heads or hands against us. No furely, said Cineas; for it is a clear case, that with to great a power we may eafily recover the Realm of MACEDON again, and command all GREECE besides, without let of any. But when we have all in our hands, what shall we do in the end? Then Pyrrul laughing, told him again: We will then (good Cineas) be quiet, and take our eafe, and make feaffsevery day, and be as merry one with another as we can possible. Cineds having brought him to that point, faid aagin to him: My Lord, what letteth us now to be quiet and merry together, fith we enjoy that prefently without further travell and trouble, which we will now go feek for abroad, with fuch shedding of blood, and so manifest danger? and yet we know not whether ever we shall attain unto it, after we have both suffered, and caused others to suffer infinite forrows and trouble. These last unto it, after we have both innered, and cannot others to inner him mind: for he was not ignorant words of Cineas, did rather offend Pyrrus, then make him to alter his mind: for he was not ignorant has he did to much A dangerous. words of circas, and rather official ryrras, then make that to after an animal; for the was not ignorant. A dangerous of the happy flate he should thereby forgo, yet could he not leave off the hope of that he did to much thing to withdefire. So he sent Circas before unto the TARENTINES, with three thousand footmen: and stand the Principle. afterwards the TARENTINES having sent him great store of stat-bottoms, Galleys, and of all ces mindforts of paffengers, he shipped into them twenty Elephants, three thousand horsemen, and two and twenty thousand soutnen, with five hundred bowmen and slings. All which thus ready, he weighed Pyrrus journey Anchors, and hoifed fails, and was no fooner in the main fea, but the North wind blew very roughly, out of feafon, and dravehim to Leeward. Notwithstanding the ship which he was in himself, by temest on the Pilots and Marriners turning to windward, and with much ado, and gravaline to the state of the pilots and Marriners turning to windward, and with much ado, and gravaline to the state of the pilots and Marriners turning to windward. by great toil of the Pilots and Marriners turning to windward, and with much ado, and marvellous the fea. dangers recovered the coast of ITALY. Howbeit the rest of his Fleet were violently dispersed here and there, whereof some of them failing in their course to ITALY, were cast into the Seas of LYRIA and SICILIA. The other not able to recover the point of APULIA, were benighted, and the Sea being high wrought, by violence cast them upon the shore, and against the rocks, and made ship-wracks of them, the Admiral onely referved, which through her strength, and the greatness of her burthen, resisted the force of the Sea that most violently beat against her. But afterwards, the wind turning and coming from the land, the Sea cruelly raging over the height of her fore-castle, in fine brought her in manifest perill of opening, and splitting, and in danger to be driven from the Coast, putting her out again to the mercy of the winds, which changed every hour. Wherefore Pyrrus caffing the perill every way, thought best to leap into the Sea. After him forthwith leapt his Guard, his Servants, and other his familiar Friends, venturing their lives to lave him. But the darkness of the night, and rage of the waves (which the shorebreaking, forced fo to rebound back upon them) with the great notife also, did so hinder their swimming, that it was even day before they could recover any Land, and yet was it by means that the wind fell. As for Pyrrus, he was so Sea-beaten, and wearied with the waves, that he was able to

Moreover, the Messapians (upon whose Coast the storm had cast him) ran Pyrrus cast on out to help him, and diligently laboured in all they could possible to save him, and received those upon the also certain of his Ships that had scaped, in which were a few horsemen, about two thousand country of the footmen, and two Elephants. With small force, Pyrrus marched on his journey to go by Mc Pyrus. Industry and Line Tarentum; and Cineas being advertised of his coming, went with his men to meet received of the him. understand of them, if (before they entred into this war) they could be content the controversies they had with all the GRECIANS dwelling in ITALY, might be decided by juffice, and therein to refer themselves to his arbitrement, who of himself would undertake the pacification of them. Whereunto the Conful Levinus made answer, that the ROMANS would never allow him for a Judge, neither did they fear him for an enemy. Wherefore Pyrrus going on still, came to lodge in the plain which is between the Cities of PANDOSIA, and of HERACLEA: and having news brought him that the ROMANS were encamped very near unto him on the other fide of the River of SIRIS, he inthe pain better took his horfe, and rode to the Rivers fide to view their Camp. So having throughly confidered the tween Panthia took his horfe, and rode to the Rivers fide to view their Camp. form, the fituation, and the order of the same, the manner of charging their watch, and all their falhions of doing, he wondred much thereat. And speaking to Megacles, one of his familiars about him, he faid, This order Megacles (quoth he) though it be of barbarous people, yet it is not barbaroully done, but we shall shortly prove their force. After he had thus taken his view, he began to be more carefull then he was before, and purposed to tarry till the whole aid of their Confederates were come together, leaving men at the Rivers fide of SIRIS, to keep the passage, if the enemies ventured to pals over, as they did indeed. For they made half to prevent the aid that Pyrrus looked for, and passed their footmen over upon a Bridge, and their horsemen had divers Fords of the River: infomuch as the GRECIANS fearing left they should be compassed in behind, drew back. Pyrrus advertifed thereof, and being a little troubled therewithall, commanded the Captains of his footnen prefently to put their bands in battle ray, and not to ftir till they knew his pleasure : and he himself in the mean time marched on with three thouland horse, in hope to find the ROMANS by the River side, as yet out of order, and utterly unprovided. Bur, when he saw afar off a great number of footmen with their Targets ranged in battle, on this fide the River, and their horfemen marching towards him in very good order: he caused his men to joyn close together, and himself first began the charge being easie to be known from other, if it had been no more but his passing rich gliftering Armour and Furniture, and withall, for that his valiant deeds gave manifest proof of his well deferving time and renown. For, though he valiantly bestirred his hands and body both, repulsing them he encountered withall in fight, yet he forgat not himself, nor neglected the judgment and forefight which should never be wanting in a General of an Army: but as though he had not fought at all, quietly and discreetly gave order for every thing, riding to and fro, to defend and encourage his men in those places, where he saw them in most diffress. But even in the hottest of the battle, Leonatus MACEDONIAN fpied an Italian a man of Arms, that followed Pyrrus up and down where he went, and ever kept in manner of even hand with him, to fet upon him. Wherefore he faid to Pyrrus: My Lord, do you not feethat barbarous man there upon a Bay horfe with white feet? Sure he looketh as though he meant to do fome notable feat and mischief with his own hands: for his eye is never off you, but waiteth onely upon you, being sharp set to deal with your self and none other, and therefore take heed of him. Pyrrus answered him, It is impossible Leonatus, for a man to avoid his defliny: but neither he nor any other ITALIAN whatfoever, shall have any joyto deal with me. And asthey were talking thus of the matter, the ITALIAN taking his Spear in the raiddest, and setting spurs to his horse, charged upon Pyrrus, and ran his horse through and through with the same, Leonatus at the self same instant served the ITALIANS horse in the like manner, fo as both their horfes fell dead to the ground. Howbeit Pyrrus men that were about him, faved him prefently, and flew the ITALIAN in the field, although he fought it out right valiantly. The ITALIANS name was Oplacus, born in the City of FERENTUM, and was Captain of a band of men of Arms. This mischance made King Pyrrus look the better to himself afterwards, and seeing his horfemen give back, fent prefently to hasten his footmen forward, whom he straight set in or-Pyrrar change der of battle: and delivering his Armour and cloak to one of his familiars called Megacles, and beed his Armour ing hidden as it were in Megacles Armour, returned again to the battle against the ROMANS, who valiantly refifted him, to that the victory depended long in doubt: for it is faid, that both the one fide and the other did chase, and was chased, above seven times in that conflict. The changing of the Kings Armour ferved very well for the farety of his own person, howbeit it was like to have marred all, and to have made him lofe the field. For many of his enemies fet upon Megacles, that wore the Kings Armour: and the party that flew him dead, and threw him stark to the ground, was one Dexins by name, who quickly fnatched off his head-piece, took away his cloak, and ran to Levinus the Conful, crying out aloud, that he had flain Pyrrus, and withall shewed forth the spoils he supposed to have taken from him. Which being carried about through all the Bands, and openly shewed from hand to hand, made the ROMANS marvellous joyfull, and the GRECIANS on the contrary, both afear'd and right forrowfull: untill fuch time as Pyrrus hearing of it, went and paffed along all his Bands bare headed, and bare faced, holding up his hand to his fouldiers, and giving them to understand with his own voice, that it was himself. The Elephants in the end were they indeed that won the battle, and did most distress the ROMANS: for, their horses seeing them ajar off, were fore afraid, and durst not abide them, but carried their masters back in despate of them. Pyrrus at the fight thereof, made his THESSALIAN horfemen to give charge upon Fyrus viceory them whilft they were in this diforder, and that fo luftily, as they made the ROMANS By, and fustain great flaughter. fide, Dionyfus writeth, there were flan betteen thousand. But Hieronymus faith, less then four thousand: howbeit they were all of the best men of his Army, and those whom he most trusted.

King Pyrrus presently hereupon also took the ROMANS Camp, which they forsook, and wan many of their Cities from their alliance, spoiled and overcame much of their Countrey. In so much as he came within fix and thirty miles of Rome, whither came to his aid, as confederates of the TARENTINES, the Lucanians, and Samnites, whom he rebuked because they came too late to the battle. Howbeit a man might easily see in his face, that he was not a little glad and proud to have overthrown fo great an Army of the ROMAN'S with his own men, and the aid of the TARENTINES onely. On the other side, the ROMANS hearts were so great, that they would not depose Levinus from his Consulfhip, notwithstanding the loss he had received: and Caius Fabricius faid openly, that they were not the Epirots that had overcome the ROMANS. but Pyrrus had overcome Levinus: meaning thereby, that this overthrow chanced unto them, more through the fubrilry and wife conduction of the General, then through the valiant feats and worthiness of his Army. And hereupon they speedily supplied their Legions again that were diminished, with other new souldiers in the dead mens place, and Levied a fresh force besides, speaking bravely and fiercely of this War, like men whose hearts were nothing appalled. Whereat Pyrrus marvelling much, thought good first to send to the Romans, to prove if they would give any ear to an offer of peace, knowing right well that the winning of the City of Rome was no easie matter to compass or attain, with that ilrength he presently had a and also that it would be greatly to his glory, if he could bring them to peace after this valiant Victory. And hereupon he fent Ciness fent Cineas to ROME, who spake with the chiefest of the City, and offered Presents to them and their Ambassador to Wives, in the behalf of the King his Mafter. Howbeit, neither man nor woman would receive any The Noble at his lands, but answered all with one voice, That if the peace might be general to all, they all primind of the vately would be at the Kings commandment, and would be glad of his friendthip. Moreover, when Roman, Cineas had talked in open Audience before the Senate, of many courteous offers, and had delivered them profitable capitulations of peace: they accepted none, nor shewed any affection to give ear unto them, although he offered to deliver them their Prifoners home again without ranfom, that had been taken at the battle, and promifed also to aid them in the conquest of ITALY, requiring no other recompence at their hands, faving their good wills onely to his Mafter, and afficrance for the TARENTINES, that they should not be annoyed for any thing past, without demand of other matter. Nevertheless in the end, when they had heard these offers, many of the Senators yielded, and were willing to make peace : alledging that they had already loft a great battle, and now they looked for a greater, when the force of the Confederates of ITALY, frould joyn together with King Pyrrus Power. But Appius Claudius, a famous man, who Appius Claudicame no more to the Senate, nor dealt in matters of State at all by reason of his age, and partly us difference because he was blind, when he understood of King Pyrrus offers, and of the common bruit that the Romans ran through the City, how the Senate were in mind to agree to the capitulations of peace from making propounded by Cinese, he could not abide, but caused his servants to carry him in his Chair upon Perce with Pytrus. their arms unto the Senate door, his Sons, and Sons in Law taking him in their arms, carried him into the Senate house. The Senate made silence to honour the coming in of so notable and worthy a personage: and he so soon as they had set him in his seat, began to speak in this fort : "Hitherunto with great impatience (my Lords of Rome) have I bourn the lofs "of my fight, but now, I would I were also deaf as I am blind, that I might not (as I do) hear Apput Classian "the report of your dishonourable consultations determined upon in Senate, which tend to sub- the Senate, "vert the glorious fame and reputation of ROME. What is now become of all your great and "mighty brags you blazed abroad through the whole world? That if Alexander the great him-"felf had come into ITALY, in the time that our Fathers had been in the flower of their age, and "we in the prime of our youth, they would not have faid every where that he was altogether in-"vincible, as now at this present they do : but either he should have leit his body slain here in "battle, or at the leaftwife have been driven to fly, and by his death or flying should greatly "have enlarged the renown and glory of ROME. You plainly shew it now, that all these words spoken then, were but vain and arrogant vaunts of soolish pride : considering that you "tremble for fear of the Molossians and Channians, who were ever a prey to the Ma-CEBONIANS: and that ye are afraid of Pyrrus also, who all his life time served and followed one "of the guard unto Alexander the Great, and now is come to make wars in these parts, not to aid "the GRECIANS inhabiting in ITALY, but to fly from his enemies there about his own Country, "offering you to conquer all the reft of 1TALY with an Army, wherewith he was nothing able to "keep a small part of MACEDON onely for himself. And therefore you must not perswade your "felves, that in making peace with him, you shall thereby be rid of him; but rather shall you draw others to come and fet upon you befides. For they will utterly delpife you, when they shall hear ye " are to early overcome, and that you have suffered Pyrrus to escape your hands, before you made "him feel the just reward of his bold prelumptuous attempt unto you: carrying with him for a "further hire, this advantage over you: that he hath given a great occasion both to the SAMNITES, "and TARENTINES, hereafter to mock and deride you. After that Appin had told this tale unto the Senate, every one through the whole Assembly, desired rather War then Peace. They dispatched Ciness away thereupon with this answer, that if Pyrrus fought the ROMANS friendthip, he first must depart out of ITALY, and then send unto them to treat of Peace : but so long as he remained there with his Army, the ROMANS would make War upon him; with all the force

ROMANS, and their Commonweal, discoursing thereof with the chiefest men of the City: and how afterwards he made ample report of the fame unto Pyrrus: and told him amongst other things. The Majefly of that the Senate appeared to him, a Council-house of many Kings. And furthermore (for the number of people) that he feared greatly they should fight against such a Serpent, as that which was in old time in the Marshes of LERNE, of which, when they had cut off onethead, seven other came up in the place: because the Consul Levinus had now levied another Army, twice as great as the first was. and had left at ROME also, many times as many good able men to carry Armour. After this, there Citias Fabrici- were fent Ambaffadors from ROME unto Pyrrus, and amongst other, Caius Fabricius, touching the emar ranning the state of Prisoners. Cineas told the King his Master, that this Fabricius was one of the greatest up Ambassisdor state of Prisoners. men of account in ROME, a right honest man, a good Captain, and a very valiant man of his hands, Caint Fabricia. yet poor indeed he was notwithstanding. Pyrrus taking him secretly aside, made very much of him, usa nobe Cap, and amongft other things, offered him both Gold and Silver, praying him to take it, not for any difhonest respect he meant towards him, but onely for a pledge of good will and friendship that should be between them. Fabricius would have none of his gift : fo Pyrrus left him for that time. Notwithstanding the next morning, thinking to fear him, because he had never seen Elephant before, Pyrrus commanded his men, that when they faw Fabricius and him talking together, they should bring one of his greatest Elephants, and set him hard by them, behind a hanging : which being done, at a certain fign by Pyrrus given, fuddenly the hanging was pulled back, and the Elephant with his Trunk was over Fabricius head, and gave a terrible and fearfull cry. Fabricius foftly giving back, nothing afraid, laughed, and faid to Pyrrus fmiling: Neither did your Gold (Oh King) yesterday move me, nor your Elephant to day fear me. Furthermore, whilst they were at Supper, falling in talk of divers matters, specially touching the State of GREECE, and the Philosophers there: Ciness The opinion of by chance spake of EPICURUS, and rehearsed the opinions of the EPICUREANS touching the the Epicarean gods and Government of the Commonwealth, how they placed mans chief felicity in pleasure, how they fled from all Office and Publick charge, as from a thing that hindereth the fruition of true felicity: how they maintained that the gods were immortal, neither moved with pity nor anger, and led an idle life full of all pleasures and delights, without taking any regard of mens doings. But as he still continued this discourse, Fabricius cryed out aloud, and said: The gods grant that Pyrrus and the SAMNITES were of fuch opinions, as long as they had Wars against us. Pyrrus marvelling much at the constancy and magnanimity of this man, was more defirous a great deal to have Peace with the ROMANS, than before. And privately prayed Fabricius very earnestly, that he would Treat for Peace, whereby he might atterwards come and remain with him: faying, that he would give him the chief place of honour about him, amongst all his friends. Whereunto Fabricius answered him softly : That were not good (Oh King) for your felf, quoth he: for your men that prefently do honour and esteem you, by experience if they once knew me, would rather chuse me for their King, then your felf. Such was Fabricius talk, whose words Pyrrus took not in ill part, neither was offended with them at all, as a Tyrant would have been: but did himself report to his friends and familiars the noble mind he found in him, and delivered him upon his faith onely, all the ROMAN prisoners: to the end that if the Senate would not agree unto Peace, they might yet fee their friends and keep the feaft of Saturn with them, and then to fend them back again unto him. Which the Senate established by decree, upon pain of death to all fuch as should not perform the same accordingly. Afterwards Fabricius was chosen Consul, and Phylician wit. as he was in his Camp, there came a man to him that brought him a Letter from King Pyrrus Phylicia reprocued with the Fabrian, written with his own hands: in which the Phyfician offered to poison his Matter, so he would cim, and offer promise him a good reward, for ending the wars without further danger. Fabricim detesting the witkedness of the Physician, and having made Q. Amylim his Colleague and fellow Consul also to abhor n's matter. Fabricius Letter to Pyrrus, him. The Contents of his Letter were thefe: Caius Fabricius, and Quintus Amylius Confuls of ROME, unto King Pyrrus, Greeting, You have (O King) made unfortunate choice, both of your friends him of his phy- and of your enemies, as shall appear unto you by reading of this Letter which one of yours hath writficians treason, ten unto us: for you make wars with just and honest men, and do your self trust altogether the wicked and unfaithful. Hereof therefore we have thought good to advertife you, not in respect to pleasure you, but for fear left the misfortune of your death might make us unjuftly to be accused: imagining that by treachery or treaton, we have fought to end this war, as though by valiantness we could not otherwise atchieve it. Pyrrus having read this Letter, and proved the contents thereof true, executed the Phylis cian as he had delerved: and to requite the advertisement of the Confuls, he sent Fabricius and the Pyrrufendeth Romans their prisoners, without paying of ransom, and sent Cinear again unto them, to prove if the Romans, he could obtain peace. Howbeit the Romans, because they would neither receive pleasure of their enemies, and leaft of all reward, for that they confented not unto fo wicked a deed : did not onely refule to take their pritoners of free gift, but they fent him again fo many SAMNITES, and TAREN-TINES. And furthermore, for peace and his friendship, they would give no ear to it, before thewars Pyrus fecond were ended, and that he had fent away his Army again by fea into his Kingdom of Epirus. Wherefore Tyrrus teeing no remedy, but that he must needs fight another battle, after he had somewhat refreshthe Royalnt, but to dhis Army, drew towards the City of Asculum, where he fought the fecond time with the Ro-MANS: and was brought into a marvellous ill ground for horsemen, by a very swift running River, from whence came many Brooks and deep Marshes, informuch as his Elephants could have no space nor ground to joyn with the Battell of the Footmen, by reason whereof there was a great number of men hurt and flain on both fides. And in the end, the Battell being fought out all day long, the dark night did fever them: but the next morning, Prrm to win the advantage to fight in the plain upon the naughty ground they had fought on the day before. And by this policy having brought the ROMANS into the plain Field, he thrust in amongst his Elephants, store of shot and sling men, and then made his Army march (being very well fet in order) with great fury against his I nemies. They milling the other days turnings and places of retire, were now compelled to fight, all on a front in the plain Field: and ftriving to break into the Battell of Pyrim Footmen before the Elephants came, they desperately pressed in upon the Enemies Pikes with their Swords, not caring for their own persons what became of them, but onely looked to kill and destroy their Enemies. In the end notwithstanding, after the Battell had holden out very long, the ROMANS loft it, and they first began to break and Pyrrae victory flie on that fide that Pyrns was , by reason of the great force and fury of his Charge, and much more of the Romans. through the violence of the Elephants : against which, the ROMANS valiantness nor courage could ought prevail, but that they were driven to give them place (much like the rage of furging waves, or terrible trembling of the earth) rather then tarry to be troden underfeet, and overthrown by them, whom they were not able to hurt again, but be by them most grievoully martyred, and their troubles thereby yet nothing eafed. The chafe was not long, because they fled but into their Camp: and Hierangemente Historiographer writeth, that there died fix thousand men of the ROMANS, and of Pyrrm part about three thouland five hundred and five, as the Kings own Chronicles do witness, Ne-The Witters ym part about three incomme to mention of two Battels given near unto the City of Asculum, Pyrnu Battell, Dionyjum makes no mention of two Battels given near unto the City of Asculum, Pyrnu Battell, nor that the ROMANS were certainly overthrown : howbeit he affirment that there was one Battell onely that continued unto Sun-fet, and that they scarcely severed also when night was come on, Pyyrue being hurt on the arm with a Spear, and his carriage robbed and spoiled by the SAMNITES befides. And further, that there died in this Battell, above fitteen thousand men, as well of Fyrrus fide, as of the ROMANS part: and that at the last, both the one and the other did retire. And some say, that it was at that time Pyrrus answered one, who rejoyced with him for the Victory they had won: If we win another of the price, quoth he, we are utterly undone. For indeed then had he loft the most part of his Army he brought with him out of his Realm, and all his friends and Captains in manner every one, or at the leaft there lacked little of it : and befides that , he had no means to supply them with other from thence, and perceived also that the Confederates he had in ITALY, began to wax cold. Where the ROMA NS to the contrary, did easily renew their Army with fresh Souldiers, which they caused to come from ROME as need required (much like unto a lively Spring, the head whereof they had at home in their Countrey) and they fainted not at all for any loffes they received, but rather were they fo much the more horly bent, floutly determining to abide out the Wars, whatever betide. And thus whilest Pyrru was troubled in this fort, new hopes and new enterprifes were offered unto him, that made him doubtfull what to do. For even at a clap came Ambaffadours unto him out of Sicilia, offering to pur into his hands, the Cities of Syracusa, of Ambaffadours AGRIGENTUM, and of the LEONTINES, befeeching him to aid them to drive the CARTHA- out of Stitlita, GINIANS out of the Isle, thereby to deliver them from all the Tyranis. And on the other fide to pray aid of allo, news was brought him from Greece, how Prolomie furnamed the Lightning, was flain, and Prins. all his Army overthrown in Battell against the GAULS, and that now he should come in good hour for the MACEDONIANS, who lacked but a King. Then he curfed his hard fortune, that prefented him all at once, such fundry occasions to do great things: and as if both enterprises had been already in his hand, he made his account that of necessity he must lose one of them. So, long debating the matter with himself, which of the two ways he should conclude upon : in the end he resolved, that by the Wars of Sicilia, there was good mean to attain to the greater matters, confidering that AFRICK was not far from them. Wherefore, disposing himself that way, he sent Cineas thither immediately to make his way, and to speak to the Towns and Cities of the Countrey, as he was wont to do : and in the mean time left a strong Garrison in the City of TARENTUM, to keep it at his devotion, wherewith the TARENTINES were very angry. For they made request unto him, either to remain in their Countrey to maintain Wars with them against the ROMANS (which was their meaning why they fent for him) or else if he would needs go, at the least wife to leave their City in as good state as he found it. But he answered them again very roughly, that they should speak no more to him in it and that they should not choose but tarry his occasion. And with this Pyrras Journey answer he took Ship, and sailed towards Sicilia: where so soon as he was arrived, he found into Skilla. all that he hoped for, for the Cities did willingly put themselves into his hands. And where necesfity of Battell was offered him to imploy his Army, nothing at the beginning could fland before him. For , with thirty thousand Footmen , two thousand five hundred Horsemen, and two hundred Sail which he brought with him, he drave the CARTHAGINIANS before him, and conquered all the Countrey under their obedience. But fuddenly being alreed from a popular Prince, unto a violent Tyrant, he was not onely noming. Dut mouerny being but that worft of all is, unfaithfull and ungratefull : nevertheles, though thought cruell and rigorous, thought cruen and figures, our they fuffered it, and granted him any needfull thing he did dethey received great name by mine,) and softratus, the two chief Captains of mand. But when they faw he began to militrust Thanon and Softratus, the two chief Captains of SYRACUSA, and they who first caused him to come into SICILIA, who also at his first arrivall SYRACUSA, and they who have caused man of command of the chief aiders in helping him to delivered the City of Syracusa into his hands, and had been his chief aiders in helping him to compais that he had done in Sicilia : when, I fay, they faw he would no more carry them with him, nor leave them behind him for the miftruft he had of them, and that Softration fled from him, nin, nor leave their octima min for the limit of the limi and aniented minicit, rearing the 2 1/100 had been also have done him fome harm, then all things had put Thanon to death, miftrufting that he would also have done him some harm, then all things riau put 1 nanon to utatit, illittating that it would little, but all together at one inflant, fell out against Pyrrus: not one after another, nor by little and little, but all together at one inflant, and all the Cities generally hated him to the death, and did again some of them confederate with the The Samilter Carthaginians, and others with the Mamertines, to fet upon him. But when all Siand Tarentines CILIA was thus bent against him, he received Letters from the SAMNITES and TARENTINES, font for Pyring by which they advertised him, how they had much ado to defend themselves within their Cities and ftrong Holds, and that they were wholly driven out of the Field: wherefore they earneftly befought him (peedily to come to their aid. This news came happily to him, to cloak his flying, thathe might fay it was not for despair of good success in Sicilia that he went his way: but true it was indeed, that when he faw he could no longer keep it, then a Ship could frand frill among the waves, he fought fome honelt shadow to colour his departing. And that furely was the cause why he returnne tought tome moment madow to cool management out of Sicile, they fay that looking ed again into ITALY. Nevertheleis, at his departure out of Sicile, they fay that looking back upon the Isle, he said to those that were about him: O what a goodly Field for a Battell (my friends) do we leave to the ROMANS and CARTHAGINIANS, to fight the one with the other? And verily fo it fell out shortly after, as he had spoken. But the barbarous People conspiring together against Pyrru, the Carthaginians on the one fide watching his passage, gave him Battell on the Sea, in the very ftraight it felf of Messina, where he loft many of his Ships, and fled with the reft, and took the Coaft of ITALY. And there the MA MERTINES on the other fide, being gone thither before, to the number of eighteen thouland fighting men, durst not prefent him Battell in open Field, but tarried for him in certain Straights of the Mountains, and in very hard places, and fo fet upon his Rereward, and difordered all his Army. They flew two of his Elephants, and cut off a great number of his Rereward, fo as he was compelled himself in persons come from his Vant guard, to help them against the barbarous People, which were lusty valuant Pyrrus hurt on men, and old trained Souldiers. And there Pyrrus caught a blow on his head with a Sword, and tyrus nort on the was in great danger: infomuch as he was forced to retire out of the preafe and Fight: which did to much the more encourage his Enemies: amongst which there was one more adventureus then the reft, a goodly man of personage, fair armed in white Armour, who advancing himself far before his Company, cried out to the King with a bold fierce voyce, and challenged him to fight with him if hewere alive. Pyrrus being mad as it were with this bravery, turned again with his guard, in fpight of his men, hurt as he was. And befides that, he was all on a fire with choler, and his face all bloudy and terrible to behold, he went through his men, and came at the length to this barbarous Villain that had challenged him: and gave him fuch a blow on his head with all his force and power.

that what by the strength of his arm, and through the goodness of the temper and metall of the Pirras with a that what by the integral of his man, in the middelt, down to the shoulders: fo that his head being bow of his Sword, the blow clave his head right in the middelt, down to the shoulders and the other part on the other. This matter, Sword, clove Sword, the now trave its mean right and the one fhoulder, and the other part on the other. This matter this thus divided, the one part fell on the one fhoulder, and the other part on the other. This matter his themses fuddenly flayed the barbarous People, and kept them from going any further, they were fo airaid and head in the amazed, to fee fo great a blow with ones hand, and it made them think indeed, that Pyrane was middelt, and more then a man. After that, they let him go, and troubled him no more. Pyrrus holding on his faid at on his. lourney, arrived at the length in the City of TARENTUM, with twenty thouland Footmen, and thenders. three thousand Horse. And with these (joyning thereto the choilest men of the TARENTINES) he went incontinently into the Field to feek out the ROMANS, who had their Camp within the Territories of the Samnites, which were then in very hard state: for their hearts were killed, because that in many Battels and encounters with the ROMANS, they were ever overthrown. They werevery angry befides with Pyrym, for that he had forfaken them, to go his Voyage into Sici-LIA, by reason whereof there came no great number of Souldiers into his Camp. But notwithflanding, he divided all his strength into two parts, whereof he sent the one part into Lucania, to occupie one of the ROMAN Confuls that was there, to the end he should not come to aid his companion : and with the other part he went himself against Maning Curius , who lay in a very Maning Curius ftrange place of advantage, near to the City of BENEVENTO, attending the aid that should come Conful. to him out of Lucania, besides also that the Soothsayers (by the signs and tokens of the Birds and Sacrifices) did counsell him not to flir from thence. Pyrrus to the contrary, defiring to fight with Manins before his aid came unto him, which he looked for out of Lucania, took with himthe best Souldiers he had in all his Army, and the warlikest Elephants, and marched away in the night, supposing to steal upon Manins on the sudden, and give an assault unto his Camp. Now Pyrrus having a long way to go, and through a woody Countrey, his Lights and Torches failed him, by reason whereof many of his Souldiers loft their way, and they loft a great deal of time also, before they could again be gathered together: fo as in this space the night was spent, and the day once broken, the Enemies perceived plainly how he came down the hills. This at the first fight made them muse a while, and put them in a little fear: nevertheless Manius having had the signes of the Sacrifices favourable, and feeing that occasion did press him to it, went our into the Field, and fee upon the Vaward of his Enemies, and made them turn their backs. The which feared all the reft in fuch Pyrous third wife, that there were flain a great number of them in the Field, and certain Elephants also taken, Battell with This Victory made Manius Curius leave his strength and come into the plain Field, where he fet his the Romans. men in Battell ray, and overthrew his Enemies by plain force on the one fide: but on the other he Pyrrus overmen in Datten ray, and overtune and an accompanied to draw back into his own Camp, where thrown by Manine Curiar in he had left a great number of men to guard it. So when he faw them upon the Rampiers of his in Battell, Camp all armed, ready to fight, he called them out, and they coming fresh out of the places of advantage, to charge upon the Elephants, compelled them in a very short time to turn their backs. and flie through their own men, whom they put to great trouble and disorder : so as in the end, the whole Victory fell upon the ROMANS fide, and confequently by means of that Victory, followed the greatness and power of their Empire. For the ROMANS being grown more couragious by this Battell, and having increased their force, and won the reputation of men unconquerable, immediately after conquered all ITALY besides, and soon after that, all SICILIA. To this end (asyousee) came King Pyrrus vain hope he had to conquer ITALY and SICILIA, after he had fpent fix years continually in Wars, during which time his good fortune decayed, and his Army confumed. Notwithstanding, his noble courage remained always invincible, what losses foever he had fultained : and moreover whilest he lived , he was ever esteemed the chiefest of all the Kings and Princes in his time, as well for his experience and fufficiency in Wars, as also for his valiantness and hardiness of his person. But what he wan by famous deeds, he lost by vain hopes: desiring so earnefly that which he had not, as he forgot to keep that which he had. Wherefore An-player. tigonus compared him unto a Dice-player, that cafteth well, and cannot use his luck. Now having Perrus return brought back again with him into Epirus, eight thousand Footmen, and five hundred Horse. into Epirus out men, and being without Money to pay them, he devised with himself to seek out some new of truly, War to entertain those Souldiers, and keep them together. Wherefore upon a new aid of certain GAULS being come unto him, he entred into the Realm of MACEDON (which Antigenus, Demetrius Son held at that time) with intent onely to make a Forrey, and to get some spoil in the Countrey. But when he saw that he had taken divers Holds, and moreover, that two thousand men of War of the Countrey came and yeelded themselves unto him, he began to hope of better fuccess, then at the first he looked for. For upon that hope he marched against King Antizonus self, whom he met in a very straight Valley, and at his first coming, gave such a lufty Charge upon his Rereward, that he put all Antigonus Army in great disorder. For An- Pyrrus victory tigonus had placed the GAULS in the Rereward of his Army to close it in , which were a conve- of Anticonus ment number, and did valiantly defend the first Charge: and the Skirmish was so hot, that the most King of Maco of them were flain. After them the leaders of the Elephants perceiving they were environed on every fide, yeelded themselves and their Beasts. Pyrrus seeing his power to be now increased, with such a supply, trusting more to his good fortune, then any good reason might move him: thrust further into the Battell of the MACEDONIANS, who were all afraid, and troubled for the overall the Footmen of Antigonus turn wholly to his fide: who flying faved himfelf with a few Horfe-Antigonus thy men, and kept certain of the Cities in his Realm upon the Sea Coast. But Pyrrus in all his prospeeth from King rity judging nothing more to redound to his honour and glory, then the overthrow of the GAULS, layed ailde their goodlieft and richeft Spoils, and offered up the same in the Temple of Minerva Itenida, with this Inscription:

When Pyrrus had subdu'd, the puissant Gauls in fields, He caused of their Spoils to make, these Targets, Arms and Shields: The which he hanged up , in Temple all on high, Before Minerva (goddess here) in signe of victory: When he had overcome, the whole and hugie Hoaft, The which Antigonus did bring , into his Countries Coaft. Ne marvell should it feem , though victory he won, Since valianiness brings victory, and evermore hash done: And valianiness always, bath constantly kept place, From age to age, and time to time, in Alacus his race.

Immediately after this Battell, all the Cities of the Realm of MACEDON yeelded unto him : but when he had the City of ÆGES in his power, he used the Inhabitants thereof very hardly, and specially because he lest a great Garrison of the GAULS there, which he had in pay. This Nation is extream covetous, as then they shewed themselves: for they spared not to break up the Tombs wherein the The coretous. Kings of MACEDON lay buried, and took away all the Gold and Silver they could find: and afterwards with great infolency cast out their bones into the open wind. Pyrrus was told it, but he lightly passed it over, and made no reckoning of it: either because he deferred it till another time, by reason of the Wars he had then in hand:or elle for that he durft not meddle with punishing of these barbarous People at that time. But whatfoever the matter was, the MACEDONIANS were very angry with Pyrrus, and blamed him greatly for it. Furthermore, having not yet made all things fure in MACE-DON, not being fully polleft of the fame: new toys and hopes came in his head, and (mocking Anigonus) faid he was a mad man to go apparelled in Purple like a King, when a poor Cloak might become him like a private man. Now, Cleonymus King of SPARTA being come to procure him to bring his Army into the Countrey of Lacedemon, Pyrrus was very willing to it. This Cleonymus was of the Bloud-royall of Sparta: but because he was a cruell man, and would do all things by authority, they loved him not at SPARTA, nor trusted him at all: and therefore did they put him out, and made Areus King, a very quiet man. And this was the oldest quarrell Cleonymus had against the Common-King of Sparts, wealth of Sparts; but befides that , he had another private quarrell, which grew upon this cause, and Chenymus In his old years, Cleonymus had married a fair young Lady called Chelidonida, which was also of the Bloud-royall, and the Daughter of Leotychidet. This Lady being fallen extreamely in love with Acrotating, King Areus Son, a goodly young Gentleman, and in his lufty youth, the greatly vexed and dithonoured her Husband Ciconymus, who was over head and ears in love and jealoufie with her; for there was not one in all SPARTA, but plainly knew that his Wife made none account of him. And thus his home forrows, being joyned with his outward common griefs, even for fpight, defiring a revenge, in choler he went to procure Pyrrus to come unto SPARTA, to reftore him again to his Kingdom. Hereupon he brought him into LACEDÆNONIA forthwith, with five and twenty thousand Footmen, two thousand Horse, and sour and twenty Elephants: by which preparation, though by nothing elie, the World might plainly fee, that Pyrrus came with a mind not to reftore Cleanymus again unto Sparta, but of intent to conquer for himself (if he could) all the Countrey of Pero-Pyrrus firsts PONNESUS. For in words he denied it to the LACED. EMONIANS themselves, who sent Ambalfadours unto him, when he was in the City of MEGALLPOLIS, where he told them that he was come into Peloponnesus, to fet the Towns and Cities at liberty, which Antigenus kept in bondage:

one of the Ambassadours called Mondricians, replied again unto him in the LACONIAN Tongue: flost answer to If thou be a god, thou wilt dous no hurt, because we have not offended thee: and if thou be a man, King Pyrras, thou shalt meet with another that shall be better then thy self. Then he marched directly to Spar-TA, where Cleanyours gave him counfell even at the first, to affault it. But he would not so do, fearing (as they faid) that if he did it by night, his Souldiers would fack the City: and faid it should be Pyrras befere time enough to affault it the next day at broad day light, because there were but few men within the Town , and belide they were very ill provided. And furthermore , King Arens himfelf was not there, but gone into CRETA to aid the GORTINIANS, who had Wars in his own Country. And doubtless that onely was the faving of Sparta from taking, that they made no reckoning to affault it hotly: because they thought it was not able to make relistance. For Pyrrus camped before the Town, throughly periwaded with himfelf, that he should find none to fight with him :

and Cleenymus friends and Servants also did prepare his lodging there, as if Pyrrus should have come and that his true intent and meaning was to fend his young Sons into SPARTA (to they would be contented) to the end they might be trained after the LACONIAN manner, and from their youth have this advantage above all other Kings , to have been well brought up. But feigning these things, and abusing those that came to meet him on his way, they took no heed of him, till he came within the Coaft of Laconia, into the which he was no fooner entred, but he began to wafte and fpoil the whole Country. And when the Amhassadours of SPARTA reproved and found fault with him, for that he made Wars upon them in fuch fort, before he had openly proclaimed it: he made them an-

to supper to him, and lodged with him. When night was come, the LACEDEMONIANS counselto upper to thin a same to age. The period of the control of the c But the Women themselves were against it, and there was one among them called Archidamia, who The courage But the women into the Senate-houle with a Sword in her hand, to fpeak unto them in the name of all the reft, of the women and faid: That they did their Wives great wrong, if they thought them to faint-hearted, as to live after et Sparta. SPARTA was destroyed. Afterwards it was agreed in Councill, that they should cast a Trench before the Enemies Camp, and that at both ends of the fame they should bury Carts in the ground unto the middeft of the wheels, to the end that being faft fer in the ground, they should stay the Elephanes, and keep them from passing further. And when they began to go in hand withall, there came Wives Women and Maids unto them, fome of them their clothes girtup round about them, and others all in their wrought in the fmocks, to work at this Trench with the old men, advising the young men that should fight the next morning, to reft themselves in the mean while. So the Women took the third part of the Trench to task, which was fix cubits broad, four cubits deep, and eight hundred foot long, as Philareus faith, or little less as Hieronymus writeth. Then when the break of day appeared, and the Enemies removed to come to the affault: the Women themselves letched the Weapons, which they put into the young mens hands, and delivered them the task of the Trench ready made, which they before had undertaken, praying them valiantly to keep and defend it, telling them withall, how great a pleasure it Women endertaken, praying them values, fighting in view and fight of their native Countrey, and what great felicity and honour it is to die in the arms of his Mother and Wife, after he had fought valiantly like an men to fight. honest man, and worthy of the magnanimity of Sparta, But Chelidonida being gone afide, had tied a halter with a riding knot about her neck, ready to ftrangle and hang her felf, rather then to fall into the hands of Clerymus, if by change the City should come to be taken. Now Pyrrus mar Pyrrus Battell. the internal of Circulum, against the front of the Spartans, who being a great number also, did tarry his coming on the other side of the Trench: the which, besides that it was very ill to pass over, did lett the Souldiers to fight steadily in order of Battell, because the earth bevery in to pais over, and return comments of the Wherefore Trolomie, King Tyrru Son, passing newly cast up, did yeeld under their feet. Wherefore Trolomie, King Tyrru Son, passing all along the Trench fide with two thousand GAULS, and all the choice men of the CHAONIANS, affayed if he could get over to the other fide at one of the ends of the Trench where the Carts were: which being fet very deep into the ground, and one joyned unto another, they did not onely hinder the affaylants, but the defendants also. Howbeit in the end, the Gauss began to pluck off the wheels of these Carts, and to draw them into the River. But Acrosatus, King Arem Son, a young man, feeing the danger, ran through the City with a Troup of three hundred lufty Youths young man, the parties are the period of the low way till he came even to give the Charge upon them: whereby they were enforced to turn their faces towards him, one running in anothers neck, and fo in great diforder were thruft into the Trenches, and under the Carts: infomuch as at the last, with much ado, and great bloudshed, Acrosatus and his Company drave them back, and repulfed them. Now the Women and old men, that were on the other fide of the Trench, faw plainly before their face, how valiantly Acrotain had repulfed the Gauls. Wherefore after Acrotatin had done this Exploit, he returned again through the Acrotatus vali-City unto the place from whence he came, all on a goar bloud: couragious and lively, for the Vi. annets. droy he came newly from. The women of Sparta thought Account far more noble and fairer to behold, then ever he was: fo that they all thought Chelidonida happy to have fuch a friend and lover. And there were certain old men, that followed him crying after him, Go thy way, Acreratus, and enjoy thy Love Chelidonida, beget noble Children of her unto Sparta. The Fight was cruell on that fide where Pyrrus was, and many of the SPARTAN'S fought very valiantly. Howbeit, amongst other, there was one named Phillius, who after he had fought long, and slain many of his Enemies with his own hands, that forced to passover the Trench, perceiving that his heart fainted for the great number of wounds he had upon him, called one of them that were in the rank next behind him, and giving him his place, fell down dead in the arms of his friends, because his Enenies should not have his body. In the end, the Battell having continued all the day long, the night did feparace them: and Pyrrus, being laid in his bed, had this Vision in his sleep. He thought he stroke Pyrrus dream, the City of LACED. MON with lightning, that he utterly confumed it: whereat he was so passing glad, that even with the very joy he awaked: and thereupon forthwith commanded his Captains to make their men ready to the affault, and told his Dream unto his familiars, supposing that our of doubt it did betoken he should in that approach take the City. All that heard it, believed it was so, faving one Lysimachus, who to the contrary said, that this Vision liked him not, because the places finitten with lightning are holy, and it is not lawfull to enter into them: by reason whereof he was also asraid, that the gods did fignific unto him, that he should not enter into the City of Sparta. Pyrrus answered him: That, faid he, is a matter disputable to and fro in an open Assembly of People, for there is no manner of certainty in it. But furthermore, every man must take his Weapon in his hand, and fet this Sentence before his eyes:

A right good thing it is, that he would hazard life, In just defence of Masters Cause, with Spear and blondy Knife.

Alluding unto Homers Verses, which he wrote for the defence of his Countrey. And saying thus, he role, and at the break of day led his Army unto the affault. On the other fide also, the LACE-DEMONIANS with a marvellous courage and magnanimity, far greater then their force, bestirred themselves wonderfully to make resistance, having their Wives by them, that gave them their Gg3

Weapons wherewith they fought, and were ready at hand to give meat and drink to them that needed, and did also withdraw those that were hurt to cure them. The MACEDONIANS likewise for their part, endeavoured themselves with all their might to fill up the Trench with Wood and other things, which they caft upon the dead Bodies and Armours lying in the bottom of the Ditch : and the LACEDEMONIANS again, laboured all they could possible to lett them. But in this great broil, one perceived Pyrrus on horfeback to have leaprthe Trench, paft over the ftrength of the Carts, and made force to enter into the City. Wherefore those that were appointed to defend that part of the Trench, cried out straight, and the women fell a shrieking, and running as if all had been lost. And as Pyrru passed surther, striking down with his own hands all that stood before him, a CRETAN fhot at him, and stroke his Horse through both sides: who leaping out of the prease for pain of his wound, dying, carried Pyrrm away, and threw him upon the hanging of a fteep hill, where he was in Pyrrus in dan- great danger to fall from the top. This put all his servants and friends about him in a marvellous fear, of his life, at and therewithall the LACEDEMONIANS feeing them in this fear and trouble, ran immediately unto that place, and with force of thos drave them all out of the Trench. After this retire, Tyrus caufed all affault to ceafe, hoping the LACEDEMONIANS in the end would yeeld, confidering there were many of them slain in the two days past, and all the rest in a manner hurt. Howbeit, the good fortune of the City (whether it were to prove the valiantness of the Inhabitants themselves, or at the leaft to shew what power they were of , even in their greatest need and diffres, when the LACE-D.EMONIANS had small hope left) brought one Aminias Phocian from CORINTH, one of King Antigonia Captains, with a great Band of men, and put them into the City to aid them : and ftraight after him, as foon as he was entred, King Arem arrived also on the other fide from CRE-King Areurat- TA, and two thouland Souldiers with him. So the women went home to their Houles, making their rived in Sparts reckoning that they should not need any more to trouble themselves with Wars. They gave the old men liberty also to go and rest themselves, who being past all age to fight, for necessity sake yet were driven to arm themselves, and take Weapon in hand : and in order of Battell placed the newcome Souldiers in their rooms, Pyrrus understanding that new Supplies were come, grew to greater Romach then before, and enforced all that he could to win the Town by affault. But in the end, when to his cost he found that he wan nothing but blows, he gave over the Siege, and went to spoil all the Country about, determining to lie there in Garrison all the Winter. He could not for all this Sedition in the avoid his deftiny: for there rose a sedition in the City of Argos between two of the chiefest Ci-City of Arges, tizens, Aristess and Aristipps: and because Aristess thought that King Antigonss did favour his Enemy Arifippus, he made hafte to fend first unto Pyrrus, whose nature and disposition was such that he did continually heap hope upon hope, ever taking the prefent prosperity, for an occasion to hope after greater to come. And if it fell outhe was a loler, then he fought to recover himself, and to reftore his loss by some other new attempts. So that neither for being Conquerour, nor overcome, he would ever be quiet, but always troubled some, and himself also: by reason whereof, he suddenly Pyrrurrepulfed departed towards Arcos. But King Arem having laid Ambushes for him in divers places, and or cupied also the straightest and hardest passages, by the which he was to pass, gave a Charge upon goethunto Ar- the Gaules and Molossians, which were in the tail of his Army. Now, the felf-same day Pyrru was warned by a Soothfayer, who facrificing had found the Liver of the facrificed Beaft intercted : that it betokened the lofs of some most near unto him. But when he heard the noise of the charge given, he thought not on the warning of the Soothfayer, but commanded his Son to take his houlhold Servants with him, and to go thinher; and he himfelf in the mean time with as great hafte as he could, made the reft of his Army to march, to get them quickly out of this dangerous way. The Fray was very hot about Prolomit, Pyrrus Son, for they were all the chiefmen of the Lacedemonians with whom he had to do, led by a valiant Captain, called Engless. But Prolomic King as he fought valiantly against those that stood before him, there was a Souldier of CRETA called Crafus, born in the City of APTERA, a man very ready of his hand, and light of foot, who fain by Gra- running along by him, ftroke him fuch a blow on his fide, that he fell down dead in the place. This Prince Prolomie being flain, his Company began straight to flie: and the LACEDEMONIANS followed the chase so horly, that they took no heed of themselves, untill they saw they were in the plain Field far from their Footmen. Wherefore , Pyrrus unto whom the death of his Son was newly reported, being on fire with forrow and pallion, turned fuddenly upon them with the men of Arms of the MOLOSSIANS, and being the first that came unto them, made a marvellous slaughter among them. For, notwithstanding that every where before that time he was terrible and invincible, having his Sword in hishand; yet then he did shew more proof of his valiantness, strength, and courage, then he had ever done before. And when he had fet spurs to his Horse against Exalcm to close with him: Enalem turned on the one fide, and gave Pyrrm fuch a blow with his Sword, that he miffed little the cutting off his bridle hand : for he cut indeed all the rains of the bridle afunder. But Pyrrus ftraight ran him through the body with his Spear, and lighting off from his Horse, he put all the Troup of the LACEDEMONIANS to the Sword that were about the body of Enalem, being all chofen men. Thus the ambition of the Captains was cause of that loss unto their Eualeus. Countrey for nothing, confidering that the Wars against them were ended. But Pyrrus having now as it were made Sacrifice of these poor bodies of the LACEDAMONIANS, for the soul of his dead Son, and fought thus wonderfully also, to honour his Funerals, converting a great part of his forrow for his death, into anger and wrath against the Enemies : he afterwards held on his way directly towards ARGOS. And norwithflanding that King Antigonus had already feized the Hills that were over the Valley, he lodged near unto the City of NAUPLIA: and the next morning following fent an Herauld unto Antigonm, and gave him defiance, calling him wicked man, and challenged him to come down into the Valley to fight with him, to try which of them two should be King. Antigoniu made him answer, that he made Wars as much with time as with Weapon: and turther-dinigrams snmore, that if Pyrrus were weary of his life, he had ways enough open to put himfelf to death. The five to Pyrrus change of August also fent Ambassadours unto them both to pray them to denote the hour both to pray the hour both to pray the hour both to be a second to be a s Citizens of Argos also fent Ambassadours unto them both, to pray them to depart, fith they knew that there was nothing for them to fee in the City of ARGOS, and that they would let it be a neuter, and friend unto them both. King Anisgonus agreed unto it, and gave them his Son for Hostage. Pyrrus also made them fair promise to do so too, but because he gave no caution nor sufficient pledge to perform it, they mistrusted him the more. Then there fell out many great and wonderfull to kens, as well unto Pyrrm, as unto the ARGIVES. For Pyrrm having facrificed Oxen, their heads Tokens of being stricken off from their bodies, they thrust out their tongues, and licked up their own bloud, Prival death. And within the City of Arcos, a Sifter of the Temple of Apollo Lycias, called Apollonide, ran through the streets, crying out that she saw the City sull of murther, and bloud running all about, and an Eagle that came unto the fray, howbeit she vanished away suddenly, and no body knew what became of her. Pyrru then coming hard to the Walls of Argos in the night, and finding one of the Gates called Diamperes, opened by Arifleas, he put in his GAULES: who possessed the Market-place before the Citizens knew any thing of it. But because the Gate was too low to pass the Pyrrus Fight Elephants through with their Towers upon their backs, they were driven to take them off, and af- in the City of terwards when they were within, to put them on in the dark, and in tumult: by reason whereof Argon. they loft much time, so that the Citizens in the end perceived it, and ran incontinently unto the they loft much time, to that the Chizens make end perceived it, and ran incontinently unto the Caffle of Afpides, and into other strong places of the City. And therewithall, they sent with pre-Asile in Arginetic and the base of the Castle in Arginetic and the strong places of the City and the strong places of the City. fent speed unto Antigonsa, to pray him to come and help them, and so he did: and after he was got. come hard to the Walls, he remained without with the Scouts, and in the mean time fent his Son with his chiefeft Captains into the Town, who brought a great number of good Souldiers, and men of War with him. At the same time also arrived Arem King of SPARTA, with a thousand of the CRETANS, and most lusty SPARTANS: all which joyning together, came to give a Charge upon the GAULES that were in the Market-place, who put them in a marvellous fear and hazard, Pyrrus entring on that fide also of the City called Cylabaris with terrible noyse and cries, when he understood that the GAULES answered him not lustily and couragiously, he doubted straight that it was the voyce of men diftreffed, and that had their hands full. Wherefore, he came on with speed to relieve them, thrusting the Horsemen forward that marched before him with great danger and pain, by reason of the holes and finks, and water conduits, whereof the City was full. By this mean there was a wonderfull confusion amongst them, as may be thought fighting by night, where no man faw what he had to do, nor could hear what was commanded, by reafon of the great noise they made, straying here and there up and down the streets, the one feattered from the other : neither could the Captains fet their men in order , as well for the darkness of the night, as also for the confused tumult that was all the City over, and for that the ftreets also were very narrow. And therefore they remained on both fides without doing any thing looking for day light: at the drawing whereof, Fyrrm perceived the Castle of Aspides, full of his armed Enemies. And furthermore, fuddenly as he was come into the Market-place, amongst many other goodly common Works set out to beautifie the same, he spied the Images of a Bull and a Wolf in Copper, the which fought one with another. This fight made him afraid, because at that A Boll and present he remembred a Prophecie that had been told him, that his end and death should be when Wolfin cophe saw a Wolf and Bull fight together. The Arg 1 years report, that these Images were fet up in the Market-place for the remembrance of a certain chance that hand handened in the City of the Market-place, for the remembrance of a certain chance that had happened in their Country. Argo fighting For when Danam came thither first, by the way called Pyramia (as one would fay, Land fown with regether. The Wolf in the end obtained the victory: wherefore Danam Apollo Lycin. making his Prayer unto Apollo Lycias, followed on his Enterprife, and had fo good fuccels, that he drave Gelanor out of ARCOS, who at that time was King of the ARGIVES. And thus you Gelanor King hear the cause why they say these Images of the Wolf and Bull were set up in the Market-place of of the Argives. Argos. Pyrru being half discouraged with the fight of them, and also because nothing tell out well according to his expectation, thought best to retire: but fearing the straightness of the Gates of the City, he fent unto his Son Heleniu, whom he had left without the City with the greatest Heleniu, Pyrpart of his force and Army, commanding him to overthrow a piece of the Wall, that his men might 744, $00. the more readily get out, and that he might receive them, if their Enemies by chance did hinder their coming out. But the Meffenger whom he fent, was so hasty and fearfull, with the tumult that troubled him in going out, that he did not well understand what Fyrrus said unto him, but reported his Mesfage quite contrary. Whereupon the young Prince Helenss taking the best Souldiers he had with him, and the rest of his Elephants, entred into the City to help his Father, who was now giving back: and so long as he had room to fight at ease, retiring still, he valiantly repulsed those that set upon him, turning his face oft unto them. But when he was driven unto the ftreet that went from the Marketplace to the Gate of the City, he was kept in with his own men that entred at the same Gate to help him. But they could not hear when Pyrru cried out, and bade them go back, the noise was so great :

and though the first had heard him, and would have gone back, yet they that were behind, and did fill thrult forward into the preafe, did not permit them. Befides this moreover, the biggeft of all the Elephants by misfortune fell down overthwart the Gate, where he grinding his teeth, did hinder thole also, that would have come out and given back. Furthermore, another of the Elephants that were entred before into the City, called Nicon (as much to say, as conquering) feeking his Government of the city of the cit nour that was firicken down to the ground from his back with terrible blows, ran upon them that came back upon him, overthrowing friends and foes one in anothers neck, till at the length having found the body of his Mafter flain, he lift him up from the ground with his tronk, and carrying him upon his two tushes, returned back with great fury, treading all under feet he found in his way. Thus every man being thronged and crowded up together in this fort, there was not one that could help himself; for it feemed to be a mass and heap of a multitude, and one whole body thut together, which fometime thrust forward, and fometime gave back, as the fway went. They fought not fo much against their Enemies , who set upon them behind : but they did themselves more hurt then their Enemies did. For if any drew out his Sword, or based his Pike, he could neither feabard the one again, nor lift up the other, but thruft it full upon his own fellows that came in to help them, and so killed themselves one trusting upon another. Wherefore Pyrius seeing his People thus troubled and harried to and fro, took his Crown from his head which he wore upon his Helmet, that made him known of his men afar off, and gave it unto one of his familiars that was next unto him: and trufting then to the goodness of his Horse, flew upon his Enemies that followed him. It fortuned that one hurt him with a Pike, but the wound was neither dangerous nor great: wherefore Pyrrm fet upon him that had hurt him, who was an Argian born, a man of mean coadition, and a poor old Womans Son, whose Mother at that present time was gotten up to the top of the tiles of a House, as all other Women of the City were, to see the Fight. And the perceiving that it was her Son whom Pyrrus came upon, was so atrighted to see him in that danger, that she took a tile, and with both her hands caft it upon Pyrrm. The tile falling off from his head by reason of his Head-piece, lighted till in the nape of his neck, and brake his neck-bone afunder: wherewith he was fuddenly fo benummed, that he loft his fight with the blow, the rains of his bridle fell out of his hand, and himfelf fell from his Horse to the ground, by Liejmmias Tomb, before any manknew what he was, at the leaft the common People. Untill at the last there came one Zopyrus that was in pay with Antigenus, and two or threeother Souldiers also that ran straight to the place, and knowing him, dragged his body into a Gate, even as he was coming again to himself out of this trance. This Zopyrus drew out a SLAVON Sword he wore by his fide, to strike off his head. But Pyrrus cast such a grim countenance on him between his eyes, that made him to afraid, and his hand to to shake therewith, that being thus amazed, he did not strike him right in the place where he should have cut off his head, but killed him under his mouth about his chin, fo that he was a great while ere he could ftrike off his head. The matter was straight blown abroad amongst divers : whereupon Alejonens running King Antiso- thither, asked for the head that he might know it again. But when he had it, he ran prefently unto his Father withall, and found him talking with his familiar friends, and caft Pyrrus head before him. Antigonus looking uponit, when he knew it, laid upon his Son with his staff, and called him cruell murderer and unnaturall barbarous beaft: and so hiding his eyes with his Cloak, wept for pity (remembring the fortune of his Grandfather Anigona;, and of his Father Demetrius) and then caused Pyrns head and body to be honourably burnt and buried. Afterwards Alegoneus meeting Heleuss (King Pyrrus Son) in very poor efface, mufled up with a poor short Cloak, used him very courteoutly with gentle words, and brought him to his Father. Antigonus feeing his Son bringing of him, faid unto him : This part now (my Son) is better then the first, and pleaseth me a great deal more. But yet thou haft not done all thou shouldest : for thou shouldest have taken from him his beggarly Cloak he weareth, which doth more fhame us that are the gainers, then him that is the lofer. After he had spoken these words, Antigonus embraced Helinus, and having apparelled him in good fort, fent him home with honourable Convoy into the Realm of EPIRUS. Furthermore, feizing all Pyrrus Camp and Army, he courteoutly used all his friends and Servants.

THE LIFE OF CAIUS MARIUS.

Anno Mundi. 3862.

Ant. Christ.

is not known what was the third name of Cains Marius, no more then of Quinius Sertorius, who had all SPAIN in his hands at one time: nor of Lucius Mammius, he that destroyed the City of CORINTH. For this Name of Achaitus that was given unto Mummius, of Africanus unto Scipio, and of Numidicus unto Metelliss: were all Surnames given them, The names of by reason of the Conquests they wan. By this reason Posiaonius think- the Romanes. eth to overcome them that fay, that the third Name the ROMANS have, is their proper Name : as Camillus, Marcellus, Cato. For if it fell out fo, faid he, then it must needs follow, that they which have two Names, should have no proper Name. But on the other side also, he doth not confider that by the like reason he should say, that women have no Names: for there is not a woman in ROME that is called by her first Name, which Posidonius judgeth to be the proper Name of the Ro-NANS. And that of the other two, the one is the common Name of all the House or Family, as of the POMPEIANS, of the MANLIANS, and of the CORNELIANS, like as the HERACLI-DES and the PELOPIDES are amongst the GRECIANS: and the other is a Surname taken of the deeds, or of the nature, form, or shape of the body, or of some other like accident, as are these Surnames, Macrimus, Torquatus, and Sylla. Even as amongst the GRECIANS likewife, Mnemon, which fignifieth having good memory: Grypos, having a crooked note: Callinices, conquering. But as for that, the dwerfity of cuftom would deliver objection sufficient to the contrary, to him that lifted. And furthermore, as touching the favour of Marius face, we have feen an Image of his in Marble at RA- Marius favour, VENNA, a City of the GAULS, which doth lively represent that rough severity of nature and manners, which they say was in him. For being born a rough man by nature, and given to the Wars, and having followed the same altogether from his youth, more then the civil life: when he came to Authority, he could not bridle his anger and cholerick nature. And they fay furthermore, that he never learned the Greek Tongue, nor used it in any matters of weight: as though it had been a norskill of the mockery to fludy to learn the Tongue, the Mafters whereof lived in bondage under others. After Greek Tongue, his fecond Triumph, in the dedication of a certain Temple, he made Greek Playes to shew the ROMANS pastime : and came into the Theater , howbeit he did but fit down onely , and went his way straight. Wherefore methinks, that as Plato was wont to say oft unto Xenocrates the Philosopher, who was of a currish nature, had his head ever occupied, and too severe: * *Xenocrates, my friend, I pray thee do Sacrifice to the Graces. So if any man could have perfusaded Marins to have facility to the Acceptance of ced to the Maris, and to the GRECIAN Graces: (that is to fay, that he had known the Greek to Xenterstee, Tongue) to fo many famous and glorious deeds as he did, both in Peace and Wars, he had not joyned so unfortunate and miserable an end as he made, through his choler and extream ambition, make (hipwrack of all, in a most cruell, bloudy, and unnaturall rage. The which is easily known in ty, and to learn the civility and manners of Rome, having been brought up always before in a little poor Village called Cirrofaton, within the Territory of the City of Arros: where he led a hard Countrey life, in respect of those that lived pleasantly and finely in the Cities, but otherwise well reformed, and nearest unto the manners of the ancient ROMANS. The first Journeyhe made unto the Wars, was against the Celtiberians in Spain, under Scipio African, when he went to befiege the City of Numantia: where his Captains in short time found that he was a better Souldier then any other of his companions. For he did marvellous eafily receive the reformation of manners, and the Discipline of Wars which Scipio advanced amongst his Souldiers, that were conjecturing the end, by feeing of the beginning. Well, it fortuned to, that these words of Scipio and therewithall prefently to call Marius before them to yeeld a reason of his doing. So was it agreed upon in Senate. Now Marius coming into the Senate, was not abashed at any thing, as some other young man would have been, that had but newly begun to enter into the World as he did, and having no other notable calling or quality in him, faving his vertue onely to commend him; but taking boldness of himself (as the noble acts he afterwards did , gave shew of his valour) he openly threatned the Confull Cotts to fend him to Prison, if he did not presently withdraw the conclusion he had caused to be resolved upon. The Consult then turning himself unto Cacilius Merellus, asked how he liked it? Metellus standing up, spake in the behalf of the Consull: and then Marius calling a Serjeant out, commanded him to take Metellin felf, and to carry him to Prison. Metal-

Its appealed to the other Tribunes, but never a one would take his matter in hand : fo that the Senate when all was done, were compelled to call back the conclusion that before was taken. Then judgement of to flew from his youth that one day he should come to be a great man, and the other also for wisely ill trained before, and given over to all pleasure. And they say, that in the sight of his Generall he fought hand to hand with one of his Enemies, and flew him: upon which occasion, Scipio to make him love him, did offer him many courtefies and pleafures. But specially one day above the rest, having made him sup with him at his Table, some one after Supper falling in talk of Captains that were in ROME at that time : one that flood by Scipio, asked him (either because indeed he flood in doubt, or else for that he would curry favour with Scipio) what other Captain the ROMANS Thould have after his death, like unto him. Scipio having Marins by him, gently clapped him upon scipio Africas the shoulders, and said: Peradventure this shall be he. Thus happily were they both born, the one

(by report) above all things elie put Marius in a good hope, as if they had been spoken by the Oracle of fome god, and made him bold to deal in matters of State and Common-wealth: where by means of the favour and countenance Cacilius Mesellus gave him (whose house his Father and he had always followed and honoured) he obtained the office of Tribuneship. In this Office he preferred Martar Tria Law touching the manner how to give the voyces in election of the Magistrates, which did seem to take from the Nobility the Authority they had in Judgement, And therefore the Confull Cotta Repped up against it, and perswaded the Senate to resist that Law, and not suffer it to be authorised, bune of the Costa Confull.

Marim returning with great honour into the Market-place among the Assembly of the People, caufed this Law to pass and be authorized: and every man held opinion of him that he would prove a ftout man, and such a one, as would not stoop for any fear, nor shrink for bashfulness, but would beard the Senate in favour of the People. Notwithstanding he shortly after changed opinion, and altered the first, by another act he made: for when another went about to have a Law made, to distribute Corn unto every Citizen without payment of any penny, he was vehemently against it, and overthrew it! fo that thereby he came to be alike honoured and efteened of either party, as he that would neither pleasure the one, nor the other, to the prejudice of the Common-wealth. After he had been Tribune, he fued for the chiefest Office of Ædilis. Of the Ædilis there are two forts : the first is called Lealitas Curulu, so named, because of certain Chairs that have croo-Filing Cu- ked feet, upon which they fit when they give audience. The other is of lefs dignity, and that is called Malitas Popularis. And when they have chosen the first and greater Ædilis at ROME, they presently proceed the same day also in the Market-place unto election of the lesser. Marius see-Fairer. Marian denied ing plainly that he was put by the chiefeft of the Ædiles, turned again straight yet to demand the to be Ædilis. Second: but this was milliked in him, and they took him for too bold, too fhameless, and too prefumptuous a man. So that in one felt-day he had two denials and repulses, which never man Maria chosen but himself before had. And nevertheless, all this could not cut his comb, but shortly after he fued also for the Pratorship, and he lacked but a little of the denial of that; yet in the end, being last of all chosen, he was accused to have bribed the People, and bought their voyces for Money. And furely amongst many other, this prefumption was very great: that they saw a man of Coffins S.Ab.100 within the Bars where the election is made, running to and fro among them that gave their voyces, because this Sabacon was Morim very great friend. The matter came before the Judges, and Sabacon was examined upon it: whereunto he answered, that for the great extream hear he felt, he was very dry, and asked for cold water to drink, and that his man had brought him some and your put off in a pot where he was, howbeit that he went his way as foon as ever he had drunk. This Subacon was afterwards put out of the Senate by the next Cenfors, and many judge that he was worthy of this infamy, for that he was perjured in judgement, or because he was so subject and given to his pleasure. Caim Herennim was also called for a winness against Marins: but he did alledge for his Csins Herennie excuse, that the Law and custome did dispense with the Patron, to be a witness against his follower in pleaced in and Client; and he was quit by the Judges. For the ROMANS always call those Fatrons, who Marins behalf rake the protection of meaner then themselves into their hands: saving that Marins indeed with the saving in the saving the decided with the saving th take the protection of meaner then themselves into their hands: saying, that Marius redecessors, Patron and and Marius himself, had ever been followers of the House of the HERENNIANS. The Judges Client. received his answer, and allowed thereof. But Marin spake against it, alledging that since he had received this honour to bear Office in the Common-wealth, he was now grown from this base condition, to be any more a follower of any man: the which is not true in all. For every Office of a Magistrate doth not exempt him that hath the Office nor yet his Posterity to be under the Patronage of another, nor doth discharge him from the duty of honouring them; but of necessity he must be a Magistrate, which the Law doth permit to sit in the crooked Chair called Curulis, that is to say, carried upon a Chariot through the City. But notwithstanding that at the first hearing of this Cause, Marius had but ill fuccels, and that the Judges were against him all they could: yet in the end for all that, at the laft hearing of this matter, Marius, contrary to all mens opinions, was discharged because the Judges opinions with and against him fell to be of like number. He used himself very orderly in his Office of Pratorship, and after his year was out, when it came to divide the Provinces Maring Sts in by lot , SPAIN fell unto him , which is beyond the River of Batis: where it is reported , that he Spain. fowred all the Countrey thereabours of Theeves and Robbers, which notwithstanding was yet very The opinion cruell and savage, for the rude, barbarous, and uncivil manner and fashion of life of the Inhabitures of Symiats in cruell and favage, for the rude, barbarous, and uncivill manner and fashion of life of the Inhabitants of Spaniar old time. there. For the Spaniards were of opinion even at that time, that it was a goodly thing to live Hoquence and upon theft and robbery. At his return to ROME out of SPAIN, defiring to deal in matters of riches raifed the Common-wealth, he faw that he had neither eloquence nor riches, which were the two means, by men to authority the commonwealth, are law that a man and a company the state of the state of the state of the which those that were at that time in credit and authority, did carry the People even as they would.

How Marine Credit and ethic credit and authority of the law found in him, of his credit and ethic c great pains and travell he took continually, and of the simplicity of his life: which were causes matten grew. to bring him to honour and preferment, infomuch as he married very highly. For he married Julia, Marins Inlia, that was of the noblest House of the Cafars, and Aunt unto Julius Cafar: who afterwards Wife. came to be the chiefest man of all the ROMANS, and who by reason of that alliance between Marins temper them feemed in somethings to follow Marins as we have written in his I if. them, feemed in somethings to follow Marius, as we have written in his Life. Marius was a man ence. of great temperance and patience, as may be judged by an act he did, putting himself into the hands of thyrurgions. For his shanks and legs were full of great swollen veins, and being angry because it was no pleasant thing to behold, he determined to put himself into the hands of Chyrurgions to be cured. And first, laying out one of his legs to the Chyrurgion to work upon, he would not be bound as others are in like case: but patiently abode all the extream pains a man must of necessity feel being cue, without stirring, groaning, or fighing, still keeping his countenance, and faid never a word. But when the Chyrurgion had done with his first leg, and would have gone to the other, he would not give it him: Nay, faid he, I fee the Cure is not worth the pain I must abide. Afterwards Cecil. 18 Metellus the Consult, being appointed to go into Africk Cacillus Metel. to make War with King Jugurth, took Marius with him for one of his Lieutenants. Marius lus Confide. being there, feeing notable good fervice to be done, and occasion to shew his manhood, was Marins Metelnot of mind in this Voyage to increase Metellas honour and reputation, as other Lieutenants did: lus Lieutenants not of mind in this voyage to metalis that called him forth for his Lieutenant, but Fortune her man the war and thought that it was not Metalis that called him forth for his Lieutenant, but Fortune her gaing #ganto felf that presented him a fit occasion to raise him to greatness, and (as it were) did lead him by the hand into a goodly Field, to put him to the proof of that he could do. And for this cause therefore, he endeavoured himself to shew all the possible proofs of valiantness and honour he could. For the Wars being great continually there, he never for fear refused any attempt or fervice, how dangerous or painfull foever it were, neither disdained to take any fervice in hand, were it never to little: but exceeding all other his fellows and companions in wildom and forefight in that which was to be done, and striving with the meanest Souldiers in living hardly and painfully, he wan the good-will and favour of every man. For to fay truly, it is a great comfort and refreshing to Souldiers that labour, to have companions that labour willingly with them. For that they think, that their company labouring with them, doth in manner take away the compulfion and The labour necessity. Furthermore, it pleaseth the ROMAN Souldier marvellously to see the Generall eat and presence of the Generall openly of the same bread he eateth, or that he lieth on a hard bed as he doth, or that himself is the maketh the first man to set his hand to any work when a Trench is to be cast, or their Camp to be fortified. For Souldiers work they do not fo much efteem the Captains that honour and reward them, as they do those that in willinglydangerous attempts, labour and venture their lives with them. And further, they do far better love them that take pains with them, then those that suffer them to live idlely by them. Marine performing all this, and winning thereby the love and good-wills of his Souldiers: he straight filled all LYBIA and the City of ROME with his glory, so that he was in every mans mouth. For they that were in the Camp in Africk, wrote unto them that were at Rome, that they should never see the end of those Wars against this barbarous King, if they gave not the charge unto Marins, and chose him Marins the au-

Confull. These things milliked Metellin very much, but specially the misfortune that came upon Tur-thour of Turpipilius did marvelloully trouble him : which fell out in this fort : Turpilius was Metellus friend, yea lius falle accuhe and all his Parents had followed Metellin in this War, being Mafter of the Works in his Camp, fation and Metelliss made him Governour over the City of VACCA, a goodly great City : and he using death.

the inhabitants of the same very gently and courteously, miltrusted nothing till he was fallen into the hands of his Enemies through their Treason. For they had brought King Jugueth into their City unknown to him, howbeit they did him no hurt, but onely begged him of the King, and let him go his way fafe. And this was the cause why they actured Turpiliu of Treason: Marius being one of the supposed this Judges in the Councill, was not contented to be bitter to him himself, but moved many of the treaton against his Judges in the Councill, was not contented to be bitter to him himself, but moved many of the Council besides to be against him : so that Metellus by the voyces of the People, was driven against his will to condemn him to fuffer as a Traytor: and (horrly after it was found and proved, that Turpiliu was wrongfully condemned and pur 10. death. To fay truly, there was not one of the Councill but were very forry with Metellus, who marvelloully impatiently took the death of the poor innocent. But Marim contrarily rejoyced, and took it upon him that he pursued his death, and was not afhamed to make open vaunts, that he had hanged a fury about Metellus neck, to revenge his friends bloud, whom he guiltlefs had caufed to be put to death. After that time they became mortall enemies. And they say, that one day Metellus to mock him withall, faid unto him: O good man, thou wilt leave us then, and return to ROME to fue for the Confulfhip: and canft thou not be Displeasure contented to tarry to be Consull with my Son? Now his Son at that time was but a boy. But betwitt Metel-howfoever the matter went, Marina left him not fo, but laboured for leave all he could possible. And Metellus after he had used many delays and excuses, at the length gave him leave, twelve days onely before the day of election of the Confuls. Wherefore Marine made hafte, and in two days and a night came from the Camp to UTICA upon the Sea fide, which is a marvellous way from it: and there before he took Ship, did Sacrifices unto the gods, and the Soothfayer told him, that the gods by the figns of his Sacrifices, did promife him uncredibile prosperity, and so great, as he himself durft not hope after. These words made Marius heart greater: whereupon hehoited Sail, and having a passing good gale of wind in the poop of the Ship, passed the Seas in four days, and being landed, rode poste to ROME. When he was arrived, he went to shew himself unto the People; who were marvellous defirous to fee him. And being brought by one of the Tribunes of the People unto the Pulpit for Orations, after many acculations which he objected against Mitelim, in the end he befought the People to choose him Confull, promising that within sew days he would either kill, or take King Jugarib Prisoner. Whereupon he was chosen Consull without any contradiction, And fo foon as he was proclaimed, he began immediately to leaviemen of War, causing many poor men that had nothing, and many Slaves also, to be enrolled against the order of ancient custom: where other Captains before him did receive no fuch manner of men, and did no more fuffer unworthy men to be Souldiers, then they did allow of unworthy Officers in the Common-wealth: indoing the which every one of them that were enrolled, left their Goods behind them, as a pledge of their good service abroad in the Wars. Yet this was not the matter that made Marius to be most hated, but they were his front proud words full of contempt of others, that did chiefly offend the No-Maries offend-blemen in the City. For he proclaimed it every where abroad as it were, that his Confulfhip was a ed the Nobili- spoil he had gotten of the effeminate rich Noblemen through his valiantness, and that the wounds which he had upon his body for the fervice of the Common-weal, were those that recommended him to the People, and were his strength, and not the Monuments of the dead, nor the Images and Statues of others. And off times naming Albinus, and otherwhile Beffix, both Noblemen, and of great Houses, who having been Generals of the ROMAN Army, had very ill fortune in the Countrey of LyBIA: he called them cowards and simple Souldiers, asking them that were about him , if they did not think that their Ancestors would rather have wished to have left their Children that came of them like unto himfelf, then such as they had been: considering that they themselves had won honour and glory, not for that they were defeended of noble bloud, but through their deferved vertue and valiant deeds. Now Marine spake not these words in a toolish bravery, and for vain glory onely, to purchase the ill will of the Nobility for nothing : but the common People being very glad to fee him shame and despight the Senate, and measuring always the greatness of his courage with his haughty fierce words, they egged him forward still not to spare the Nobility, and to reprove the great men; so that he ever held with the Commonalty. And furthermore, when he was passed over again into Africk, it spighted Metellus to the heart, because that he having ended all the War, that there remained almost no more to take or win, Marius should come in that fortto take away the Glory and Triumph out of his hands, having fought to rife and increase by unthankfulness towards him. He would not come to him therefore, but went another way, conquering of and left the Army with Rutilius one of his Lieutenants, to deliver the fame unto him. Howbeit, the revenge of this ingratitude, lighted in the end upon Marius own neck : for Sylls took out of Marini hands the honour of ending this War, even as Marini had taken it from Metellia. But how , and after what fort , I will repeat it in few words , because we have written the particula-Bocchie King rities more at large in the life of Sylla. Bocchies King of high NUMIDIA, was Father-in-lawumo of Numities, King Jugarth, unto whom he gave no great aid, whilest he made Wars with the ROMANS, bedelivered 3a cause he hated his unfaithfulnes, and feared left he would make himself greater then he was: but in the garbinato 51- end, after 7 nearth had fled, and wandred up and down in every place, he was constrained of very nearth. ceffiry to cast his last hope and anker upon him, as his finall refuge, and so repair unto him. King Bocchus received him rather for shame, because he durst not punish him, then for any love or good will he bare him: and having him in his hands, feemed openly to intreat Marins for him, and fecretly to write the contrary unto him. But in the mean time, he practifed Treason under-hand, and fent privily for Lucius Sylla , who then was Quartor (to say , high Treasurer) under Marins, and of whom he had received certain pleasures in those Wars, Sylla trusting to this Burbarous King, went at his fending for to him: But when he was come, King Bocchus repented him of his Laring S/Ka promife, and altered his mind, flanding many daies in doubt with himself how to reforc, whe Cartles under ther he should deliver King Jugareth, or keep Sylla himself: yet at the last he went on with his Sacion purpose and intended treaton, and delivered King Jugarth alive into Sylla's hands. And this was the first original cause of the pestilent and mortall enmity that grew afterwards betwitt Marin and Sylla, and was like to have utterly overthrown the City of ROME, and to have razed the foundation of the Empire unto the ground. For many envying the glory of Marin, gave it out The critical every where, that this Act of the taking of King Jugarth, appertained onely unto Sylla: and Sylla caule of the chimlelf caused a Ring to be made, which he wore commonly, and had graven upon the Space via Wars behimself caused a Ring to be made, which he wore commonly, and had graven upon the Stone of with Wars be the fame, how Bocchus delivered Jugurib into his hands. And afterwards he made it alwaies his and splia. Seal to dispice Marin withall, who was an ambitious and proud man, and could abide no companion to be partaker of the glory of his doings : and Sylla did it especially at the procurement of Enemies and ill willers, who gave the glory of the beginning and chief exploits of this War, unto Merellus; and the last and finall conclusion unto Sylla, to the end that the People should not have Marius in lo great eftimation and good opinion, as they had before. But all this envy, detraction and hatred against Marius, was soon after extinguished and troden under foot, by reafon of the great danger that fell upon all ITALY out of the West: and they never spake of it afterwards, knowing that the Commonwealth stood in need of a good (aptain, and that they began to look about, and confider who should be that great Wise Pilot, that might fave and preferre it from fo great and dangerous a storm of War. For there was not a Noble man of all the ancient Houses of Rome, that durst undertake to offer himself to demand the Consulship: but Marius being ablent, was chofen Confull the second time. 1 or Jugurib was no sooner taken, but news came to Rome of the coming down of the Teurons, and of the Cimeres, the which would not be beleeved at the first, by reason of the infinite number of the fighting men which was faid to be in their company, and for the uncredible force and Power of the Arinies which was justified to come: but afterwards they knew plainly, that the rumour that ran abroad was The coming less then the truth fell our indeed. For they were three hundred thousand fighting men all Ar- into truth med, who brought with them also another multitude as great (or more) of Women and Children; the Tentons which wandred up and down feeking Countries and Towns to dwell and live in, as they heard and combret, fed the heft part of ITALY, which they had taken away from the Thuscane, Now to Gyrodie the Tectors fed the best part of ITALY, which they had taken away from the Thuscans. Now to say truly, and Cimbres no man knew of what Nation they were, nor from whence they came: as well for that they had Three hadno friendship with any other People, as also because they came out of a far (ountrey, as a Cloud dred thouland of People that was spread all over GAUL and ITALY. It was doubted much they were a People men. of Germany, dwelling about the Northfide: and this they conjectured by view of the greatness of their Bodies, and also for that they had dark blew eyes and red, besides that the GRECIANS in their Tongue do call Theeves and Robbers, Cimbres. Other fay, Celtica, for the great length and largness of the Countrey, ftretching it self from the Coast of the great Ocean Sea, and Cimbri. from the North parts, drawing towards the Marifhes MOEOTIDES, and the East, runneth into SCYTHIA, OF TARTAREA PONTICA: and that for neighbourhood these two Nations joyned together, and went out of their Country, not that they made this great voyage all at one time, but at many fundry times, marching yearly in the Spring further and further into the Countrey. And thus by continuance of time, they passed by force of Arms through all the firm Land of Europe: and that for this cause, although they had many particular Names according to the diversity of their Nations , yet all this Mass and multitude of People gathered together , were called notwithstanding, the Army of the Celtoscythes, as who would fay, the Celtotartares. Other hold opinion that the Nation of the CIMMERIANS, who were known in old time for ancient GRECI- Cimmerii. ANS, the one part of them were not very great in respect of the whole, the which being sled (or driven out of their Country for some civill diffention) were compelled by the TARTARES to pass beyond the Marishes MOEOTIDES, into the Countries of ASIA, under the conduction of a Captain called Ligdamis. But the refidue of them, which were a far greater number, and more Warlike men, they dwelt in the furtheft parts of the Earth, adjoyning to the great Ocean Sea, in a dark shadowed Countrey covered with wonderfull Forrests, of fuch length, and so great and thick, and the Trees so high, that the Sun can have no Power upon the ground, and they joyn hard upon the great Forrest of HERCYNIA. And furthermore, they are under fuch a climate, where the Pole is of such a height by the inclination of the Circles equidiftant, which they call Parallels, that it is not far from the Point that answereth directly to the plummet upon the head of the Inhabitants: and where the daies are Equinoctiall. They do divide all their time in two parts, the which giveth Homer occafion to fame, that when Ulyffer would call upon the dead, he went into the Countrey of the CIM-MERIANS, as into the Countrey of Hell. And this is the cause why they fay these Barbarous People left their own Countries to come into ITALY, which from the beginning were called CIMMERIANS, and afterwards they fay (and not without great likelihood) that they were furnamed CIMBRES: howbeit that is spoken rather by a likely conjecture, then by any affured troth of History. And as for the multitude of men, the most part of Historiographers do Write, that they were rather more then less, then we have spoken of : and that they were so hardy and Valiant, that nothing could frand before them, they did to great things by the strength of their hands, where Mariar cholen they had defroyed ROME, and facked all ITALY. The ROMANS hearing of this out of all parts, Considire to they man dentroyed notice, and the conduction and leading of these Wars, and chose him Consult the Condition and leading of these Wars, and chose him Consult the cond time acainst the Law.

fions by the which they choic Scippo Confull, against the course and time appointed by the Law, not for any fear they stood in to lose their own Countrey, but for the defire they had to destroy the Countrey of the CARTHAGINIANS, by reason whereof the People proceeded to Election. And Marins bringing home his Army again out of Lybia into lTALY, took possession of his Rome for King Confulflip the first day of January (on which day the ROMANS begin their year) and therewithall made his Triumph into the City of ROME, thewing that to the ROMANS, which they thought never to have feen : and that was, King Juneth Priloner, who was fo fibrill a man, and could to well frame himfelt unto his fortune, and with his craft and fubtilty was of fo great courage besides, that none of his knemics ever hoped to have had him alive. But it is said, that after he was led in this Triumph, he fell mad straight upon it : and the Pomp of Triumph being ended, he was carried into Prilon, where the Sergeants for haft to have the spoil of him, tore his apparel by force from off his back: and because they would take away his rich Gold Ear-rings that hung at his Ears, they pulled away with them the tip of his Ear, and then cast him naked to the bortom of a deep Dungeon, his wits being altogether troubled. Yet when they did throw him down, laughing he laid : O Hercules, how cold are your Stoves? He lived there yet fix daies, fighting withhunger, and defiring alwaies to prolong his miferable Life unto the laft hour the which was a just deferved punishment for his wicked Life. In this Triumph were carried (as they fay) three thousand and seven hundred Pound weight in Gold, and of Silver Niggors, five thoufand feven hundred and feventy five Pound weight : and more in Gold and ready Coin, eight and twenty thouland and feven hundred Crowns. After this Triumph Marius cauled the Senate to Affemble within the Capitoll, where he entred into the company with his Triumphing Robe, either because he forgot it, or elfe of too gross and uncivill arrogancy : but perceiving that all the Askanbly milliked or it, he rofe fuddenly, and took his long Confulls Gown, and then returned quickly again into his place. Furthermore, Marius departing to go to the Wars, thought to train his Army by the way, and to harden his Souldiers unto labour, caufing them to run every way, making great long journeys, compelling each Souldier to carry his own Furniture, and to prepare him accessary Victuals to find himself withall : so that ever after they made a Proverb of it, and called Marins Moils. fuch as were painfull and willing to do that which they were commanded without grudging, Marins Moils. Other notwithstanding do shew another cause and beginning of this Proverb : for they fay, that Scipio lying at the fiege of the City of Numantia, would not onely takeview of the Armour and Horsesof Service that were in his Army, but also of the Moils and other Beasts of burden , because he would iee how they were kept and jurnished. So Marius brought his Horse and Moil to the Muster which he kept himself, far, fair, and very well dreft; and his Moils bair fo flick and fmooth, and therewithall to lufty and trim, as none of the reft were like unto them. Scipio took great pleafure to fee thefe Beafts fo well kept, and in fo good plight : infomuch as he fp.ke of it afterwards many a time and oft. And upon his words , this manner of talk was taken up ever after, and became a common Proverb: when they mean to mock any man that is painfull, and given to fore labour, making as though they would praise him, they call him Marian Moil. Furthermore, it was a happy turn for Marins (in mine opinion) that these Barbarous People (like in force to the beating back of the raging Seas) turned their first fury towards SPAIN: and that he in the mean space had time and leasure to train and exercise his Souldiers to make them bold, and withall, himself to be throughly known amongst them. For when by little and little they had learned not to offend, nor difobey, then they found his rough commanding, and sharp severity in punishing such as slacked their duty, both profitable and very necessary, besides that it was also just and reasonable. Again his great jury, his sharp words, and his serce looks, after they had a while been used to them, by little and little they seemed nothing so fearfull to them, as to their Enemies. But the thing that pleafed the Souldiers more then all the reft, was his juffice and upright dealing : whereof they report such an example : Marine had a Nephew of his in his Camp, called Caim Lucius, who had charge of men in the Army. This Lucius was taken for a marvellous honeft man, faving that he had this foul Vice in him, that he would be suddenly in love with fair young Boys: and as at that time he fell in love with a trim young stripling, called Tre-

they fought with any, so violently and so suddenly that they seemed to be like a Lightning Fire all about where they came. By means whereof, they met with no man that durft reinft them, but feraped together and carried away all that they found, hand over head : and there were many Ro-MAN Captains appointed Covernours to keep that which the ROMANS held in GAUL Ec-yond the Mountains, who with great Armies were fhamefully overthrown by them. The co-wardliness of thosewhom they had overcome, was the chiefest cause that moved them to direct their journey to Rome. For when they had vanquished the first they had fought withall, and got-fecond time: notwithflanding that it was directly against the Law, that did exprelly forbid any man to be chosen being absent, and untill also a certain time appointed had past between the vacation and Election, before they could chuie him Officer twice in one Office. Some alledged this Law, of intent to hinder the Election : but the People repulled them, objecting to the contrary, that this was not the first time the Law had given place to the benefit of the Commonwealth, bonius, that ferved under him, and having many times lewdly entired him, and never could obrain his purpose, at the last fent for him one night by his Servant. The young man might not difobey his Captain being fent for, but prefently went unto him. When he was come into his Tent and that his Captain did strive with all his force to do him villany : he drew out his Sword, and killed him in the place. And this was done when Marins was out of his Camp : who fo foon as he returned, caused the Marshall to bring the young man before him. Many stepped forth straight to accuse him, but no man to desend him. Wherefore he boldly began to tell his tale himself. and to Name many Witneffes, who had both feen and known how his dead Captain had of tentimes offered him dishonour, and how that he had continually refifted his abominable motion, and would never yeeld himself unto him, for any Gift or Prefent he could offer him. Wherefore Marius commending him greatly, and being very glad of it, caused presently one of those Crowns to be brought unto him, which are used to be given to them, that in a day of Battell have done fome Valiant deed, and he himself did Crown Trebonius withall, as one that had done a Noble Act, and at such a time, as good and honest examples were requisite. This judgement of Marius being carried to ROME, flood him to great good purpose towards the obtaining of his third Condulthip: beside also that they looked for the coming back of these Barbarous People about the Spring, with whom the ROMAN Souldiers would not fight under any other Captain then Marius. Howbeit they came not fo foon again as they looked for them, but Ma-Marius third rins passed over also the year of his third Consulsiip. So time coming about again for the Consulsiio. Election of the new Confulls and his companion also being dead, he was driven to go himself Manias Acilius Election of the new Confulls and his companion and being ucau, he was utiven to go mained unto Rome, leaving the charge of his Camp in his ablence unto Manins Acidius. At that time Lieuceanat of unto Rome, leaving the charge of his Camp in his ablence unto Manins Acidius. At that time Lieuceanat of the Tri. there were many Noble men that fued for the Confulfhip: but Lucius Saturninus one of the Tri- der Maria. bunes, who had the Communalty under his Girdle as he would himfelf, more then any of the Lucius summiother Tribunes, and being won under hand by Marius, made many Orations, in the which must Tribune, he perswaded the People to chuse Marius Consult the fourth time. Marius to the contrary, seemed to refuse it, saying, that he would none of it, though the People chose him. Whereupon Saturninus called him Traitor, crying out, That his refutall in fuch a danger and time of necessity, was an apparent part to betray the Commonwealth, It was found straight that this was a gross pack betwixt Saturninus and Marius, by such as could fee day at a little hole. Nevertheless, the People confidering that their Prefent troubles required Marius skill and good Fortune in the Wars, they made him Confull the fourth time, and joyned Canulus Lucturius Confull with him, a man Marine fourth that was greatly honoured of the Nobility, and not missisked also of the common People. Marius controlling having News of the approaching of the Barbarous People, passed over the Alpes with great speed, with Candus and fortifying his Camp by the River of RHONE, he brought great provision of all kinds of Victu-Ludatine. als thither with him, left being straighted by lack thereof, he should be forced to come to Battell at any other time but even as he would himself, and as it should seem good unto him. And where before that time the transporting of Victualls unto his Camp by Sea was very long, and dangerous. and a marvellous great charge befides : he made it very flort and easie by this means. The mouth of the River of RHONE had gathered together fo much Mud, and fuch store of Sand, which the waves of the Sea had cast on heaps together, that the same was become very high and deep : fo as the banks made the entry into it very narrow, hard, and dangerous for great Ships of burden that came from the Sea. Marius confidering this matter, fet his men on work while they had nothing to do, and made them dig a large Trench and deep Channell, into the which he turned a great part of the River, and carried it to a convenientiplace of the Coast, where the Water fell into the Sea by an open gulf, whereby he made it able to carry the greatest Ships that were : and besides that, it was in a very fill quiet place, not being troubled with winds nor waves. The Channell carrieth yet Marine Chanhis Name, and is called Marius Channell or Trench. These Barbarous People divided themselves in-nell, to two Armies to pass into ITALY, so that it sell out to the one part which were the CIMERES, to The Cimbres go through high GERMANIE, and to force that passage which Catulus kept : and unto the other went through part, which were the Teutons and Ambrons, to pass through the Countrey of the Geno. Germany into VESIANS by the Sea side against Marius. Now the CIMBRES having the greater compass to The Teuton The Teuton of the Country of the Geno. fetch about, flayed longer, and remained behind: but the TEUTONS and the AMERONS going and dustrant their way first, had in few daies dispatched their journey they had to go, to bring them to the Camp fell upon Mawhere the ROMANS lay, unto whom they presented themselves by infinite numbers, with ter- rias to pass rible faces to behold, and their cries and voices far contrary unto other mens. They took in a imo Italy, marvellous deal of Ground in length to Companion and for come forth to define Maring and the though the marvellous deal of Ground in length to Camp upon , and fo came forth to defie Marius , and proterriory of voke him to Battell in open Field. Marius made no reckoning of all their bragging defiances, but Genus. kept his men together within his Camp, taking on terribly with them that would rashly take upon them to move ought to the contrary, and which through impatience of choler would needs go forth to fight, calling them Traitors to their Countrey. For faid he, we are not come to fight for our private glory, neither to win Triumphs nor Victories for our selves : but we must feek by all means to divert and pur by this great shower of Wars from us, and this Lightning and Tempest, that it overcome not all ITALY. These words he spake unto the private Captains which were under him, as unto men of behaviour and quality: but as for the common Souldiers, he made them fland upon the Trenches of his Camp, one after another to behold the Enemies, and to acquaint themselves with fight of their faces, their countenance, and marching, and not to be abraid of their voices, and the manner of their speech, which was wonderfull strange and beastly : and also that gods.

CAIUS MARIUS. they might know the fashion of their Weapons, and how they handled them. And by this order and ordinary viewing of them, in time he made the things that feemed fearfull unto his men at the first fight, to be afterwards very familiar: fo that they made no more wondering at them. For he judged the thing which indeed is true, that a rare and new matter never feen before, for lack of judgement and understanding maketh things unknown to us, more horrible and fearfull then they a c : and to the contrary, that cultom taketh away a great deal of fear and terror of those things, which by nature are indeed fearfull. The which was feen then by experience. For they being daily acquainted to look upon these Barbarous People, it did not onely diminish some part of the former year of the ROMAN Souldiers: but furthermore, they whetting their choller with the fierce untollerable threats and brags of these Barbarous brutish People, did set their hearts afire to fight with them, because they did not onely waste and destroy all the Countrey about them, but besides that, came to give affault even unto their Camp, with fuch a boldness, that the ROMAN Souldiers could no longer fuffer them, and they letted not to speak words that came to Marius ears himself. What cowardliness hath Marius ever known in us, that he keeps us thus from fighting, and under lock and Key as it were, in the guard of Porters, as if we were Women? Let us therefore shew our selves like Men; and go ask him if he look for any other Souldiers, besides our selves to defend ITALY: and it he have determined to employ us as Pioners onely, when he would caft a trench to rid away the mud, or to turn a River contrary. For therein hath he onely hitherto employed us in great labour, and they are the notable works he hash done in his two Confulfhips, whereof he maketh his boast unto them at ROME. Is he asraid they should take him as they did Carba and Capio, whom the Enemies have overthrown? He must not be afraid of that : for he is a Captain of another manner of valour and reputation then they were, and his Army much better then theirs was. But howfover it be, yet were it much better (in proving) to lofe fomething, then to be idle, and to fuffer our friends and confederates to be destroyed and sacked before our eyes. Marius was marvellous glad to hear his men complain thus, and did comfort them, and told them that he did nothing miftruft their courage and valiantness: howbeit that through the Counsell of certain Prophecies and Oracles of the gods, Martha a Wile he did expect time and place fit for Victory. For he ever carried a Syrian Woman in a Litter about with him, called Martha, with great reverence, whom they faid had the fpirit of Prophecy in her : and that he did ever Sacrifice unto the gods by her order, and at fuch time as fhe willed him to do it. This SYRIAN Woman went first to speak with the Senate about these matters, and did Prophetefs. foretell and Prognosticate what should follow : but the Senate would not hear her, and made her to be driven away. Whereupon the went unto the Women, and made them fee proof of fome things the vaunted of, and specially Marim Wife, at whose feet the was set one day in Assembly of the common Plays, to fee the Sword Players fight for Life and death : for the told her certainly which of them should overcome. Whereupon this Lady sent her unto her Husband Marius, who made great reckoning of her, and carried her ever in a Litter with him wherefoever he went. She was althe attire of Marius Sacrifices, apparelled in a Gown of Purple in grain, clasped to her with Claspes, and held a Spear in her hand wound all about with Nofegays and Garlands of flowers tied on with Laces. This manner of geft made many doubt whether Marim shewed this Woman openly , beof Sacrifice. leeving indeed that the had the gift of Prophecy : or elfe that knowing the contarry, he made as though he did beleeve it, to help her faining. But that which Alexander the MINDIAN wrote the varieties touching Vultures, is a thing greatly to be wondered at : For he faid, there were two of them follows the Vultures ed Marius in his Wars, and that they ever shewed themselves, and missed not, when he should win any great Battell, and that they did know them by Lattin collars they ware about their necks, which the Souldiers had tied about them, and afterwards let them go where they would: by reason whereof, they did know the Souldiers again, and it feemed also that they faluted them, and were very glad when they saw them, and perswaded themselves, that it was a sign and token of good luck to follow. Many figns and tokens were feen before the Battell : howbeit all the reft were ordinary fights, fa-Wonders feen ving that which was reported to be feen at Tudertum, and Ameria, two Cities of Itali. For fay they, there were feen Spears and Targets in the night, burning like fire in the Element, which first were carried up and down here and there, and then met together even as men move and stir that fight one with another, untill at the length, the one giving back, and the other following after, they all vanished away, and consumed towards the West. About the self same time alio, there came from the City of PESSINUNTA, Barabaces, the chief Prieft of the great Mother of the gods, who brought News, that the goddess had spoken to him within her sanctuary, and told him that Mether of the the Victory of this War should iall out on the ROMANS side. The Senate beleeved it, and ordained that they should build a Temple unto the godders, to give her thanks for the Victory which she did promise them. Rarabaces also would have presented himself unto the People in open Assembly, to tell them as much. But there was one Aulus Pompeins a Tribune, that would not fuffer him to doit, cal-Addar Position Ing him tumbler or jugler, and violently thrust him behind the Pulpit for Orations: but the mischance that fell upon Pompeins afterwards, made them the more to beleeve Barabuces words. For Pompeins the Tribune no fooner came home to his Houle, but a great vehement Ague took him, whereof he died the feventh day after, as all the world could witness. Now the TEUTONS perceiving that Marius ftirred not at all out of his Camp, they proved to affault him : howbeit they were fo well received with Shor and flings, that after they had loft certain of their men, they gave it over, and determined to go further, perfuading themselves that they might eatily pass the Alpes without danger. Wherefore trussing up all their baggage, they passed by Marius Camp: at which time it appeared more certainly then before, that they were a marvellous great multitude of People, by the length of time which they took to pass their way. For it is faid, they were passing by his Camp fix daies continually together. And as they came raking by the ROMANS Camp, they asked them in mockery, If they would write to fend home any thing to their Wives; for they would be with them ere it were long. When they were all paffed and gone, and continued on their journey ftill, Marius also raised his Camp, and followed them fair and softly foot by foot, and ever kept hard at their tail as near as he could, alwaies fortifying his Camp very well, and ever chufing ftrong places of fituation and advantage to lodge in, that they might be fafe in the night time. So they marched on in this fort, untill they came unto the City of Aix, from whence they had not far to go, but they entred straight into the Mountains of the Alpes: wherefore Marius prepared now to fight with them, and chose out a place that was very strong of situation to lodge his Camp in. to fight with ment, and those some property to the end to quicken his mens howbeit there lacked Water. And they fay he did it of purpose, to the end to quicken his mens Marias book courage the more thereby. Many repined at it, and told him that they should stand in great dan-words to his ger to abide marvellous thirst if they lodged there. Whereunto he made answer: shewing them Souldiers, and the River that ran hard by the Enemies Camp; faying withall, That they must go thither and buy their answer. Drink with their Blood. The Souldiers replied again : And why then do ye not lead us thither, whileft our Blood is yet moift? He gently answered them again : Because the first thing we do, we must fortific our Camp. The Souldiers though they were angry with him, yet they obeyed him : but the flaves having neither Drink for themtelves , nor for their Cattell , gathered together a Troop of them, and went towards the giver: fome of them carrying Axes, other Hatchets. other Swords and Spears, with their Pots to carry Water, determining to fight with the Barbarous People, if otherwise they could not come by it. A few of the Barbarous People at the first fought with them, because the most part of their company were at Dinner; after they had bathed, and others were still in the Bathe washing themselves, finding in that place many Springs of hot natural Bathes. Thus the ROMANS found many of the Barbarous People making merry, and taking their pleasure about these Bathes, for the great delight they took to confider the pleasantness of the place : when they heard the noise of them that tought, they began to run one after another unto the place from whence the noise came. Wherefore it was a hard thing for Marius any longer to keep the ROMAN Souldiers in from going to their help, for that they feared their flaves should have been slain of the Barbarous People : and moreover, because the valiantest Souldiers of their Enemies, called the Ambrons (who before had overcome Manlius and Capio, two ROMAN Captains with their Armies, and that made of themselves Thirty thousand fighting men) ran to Arms, being very heavy of their Bodies, as having filled their bellies well, but otherwife Valiant and couragious fellows, and more lively then they had wont to be, by reason of the Wine they had drunk; they ran not juriously to fight out of order, neither did they cry out confusedly, but marching all together in good array, making a noise with their harnels all after one fort, they oft rehearfed their own Name, AMBRONS, AMBRONS : which was, either to call one another of them, or else to lear the ROMANS with their Name onely. The ITALIANS also on the other side, being the first that came down to fight with them, were the LIGURIANS, dwelling upon the coast of GENUA, who hearing this noise and cry of theirs, plainly understanding them : answered them again with the like noise and cry , LIGURIANS , LIGURI-ANS, LIGURIANS, faying, that it was the true furname of all their Nation. And so before they joyned together, this cry was redoubled many a time on either fide : and the Captains of both parts made their Souldiers cry out all together, contending for envy one against another, who should cry it loudest. This contention of crying, inflamed the Souldiers courages the more. Now the AM-RRONS having the River to pass, were by this means put out of order, and before they could put RRONS having the fever to pais, were by this means par out the Ligurians ran with great themselves in Battell ray again, after they had passed the River, the Ligurians ran with great Battell betwite fury to fet upon the foremost: and after them, (to aid the LIGURIANS that had begun the Battell betwing the fury to fet upon the foremost: and after them, and the furnishment of the fu charge) the ROMANS themselves sell also upon the AMERONS, coming down from the places of and Marine. advantage upon these Barbarous People, and compelled them by this means to turn their backs, and flie. So the greatest slaughter they made, fortuned upon the bank of the River, whereinto they Marius overthrust one another in such sort, that all the River ran blood, being filled with dead Bodies. And they come the Antthat could get over the River again, and were on the other fide, durft not gather together any more brons. to fland to delence : fo as the ROMANS flew them, and drave them into their Camp, even unto to trank to defence; no as the NORLANS new mean, them with Swords and Axes in their hands, their carriage. Then their Women came out against them with Swords and Axes in their hands, grinding their teeth : and crying out for forrow and anger, they charged afwell upon their own nels of the People that fled, as upon them that chaled them : the one as Traitors, and the other as Enemies: Women, Furthermore, they thrust themselves amongst them that fought, and strove by force to pluck the ROMANS Targets out of their hands, and took hold of their naked Swords bare handed, abiding with an invincible courage to be hacked and mangled with their Swords. And thus was the fust Battell given (as they fay) by the River fide , rather by chance unlooked for , then by any fer purpole, or through the Generalls counsell. Now the ROMANS after they had overcome the most part of the Ambrons, retiring back by reason the night had overtaken them, did not (asthey were wont after they had given fuch an overthrow) fing Songs of Victory and Triumph, nor make good chear in their Tents one with another, and least of all sleep : (which is the best and sweetest refreshing for men that have fought happily) but contrarily, they watched all that night with great fear and trouble, because their Camp was not trenched and fortified, and because they knew also that there remained almost innumerable Thousands of Barbarous People, that had not yet fought: befides also, that the AMBRONS that lad fled and escaped from the overthrow, did howl out all night with loud cries, which were nothing like mens lamentations and fighs, but rather like wild Beafts bellowing and roaring. So that the Bellowing of fuch a great multitude of beaftly People, mingled together with threats and wailings, made the Mountains thereabouts and the running Riverto rebound again of the found and eccho of their cries marvelloully: by reason whereof, all the valley that lay between both, thundred to hear the horrible and fearfull trembling. This made the ROMAN Souldiers afraid, and Marius himself in some doubt: because they looked to have been fought withall the fame night, being altogether troubled and out of order. Notwithftanding, the Barbarous People did not affault them that night, nor the next day following, but onely prepared themselves unto Battell. And in the mean time Marius knowing that there were above the place where they were camped, certain Caves and little Valleys covered with Wood: he fecretly fent Claudius Marcellus thither with Three thousand Footmen well Armed, and commanded him to keep close in ambush, untill he saw that the Barbarous People were fighting with him, and that then he should come and set upon their rereward. The residue of his Army, they supped when time came, and after supper reposed themselves. The next morning at the break of day, Marius brought his men into the Field out of his Fort : where he put them in order of Battell, fend-Mariat fecond ing his Horfemen before to draw the Enemies out to skirmish. The Teurons seeing them come, had not the patience to tarry till the ROMANS were come down into the plain to fight without advantage, but Arming themselves in haste, and in a rage, ran up the Hill to the ROMANS, where they stood in Battell ray. Marius taking good regard to that they did, sent here and there unto the private Captains, charging them they fhould not ftir, and onely to temporize and torbear, until the Enemies came within a stones cast of them : and that they should then throw their Darts at them, and afterwards draw their Swords, and repulse the Barbarous People with their Shields. For he did foresee, that when they should climb up against the Hill (upon the hanging whereof the Ro-MANS had fet their Battell) that their blows would not be of great force, nor their order and ranks could frand close together to any effect or purpose: because they could not have sure footing, nor marchaffuredly, but would eafily be thrown backward if they were never fo little repulfed : by reason of the hanging of the Hill. Marius gave this order unto his folk, and therewithall was himself the first man that put it in execution : for he was as trim a Warrier, and as valiant a Souldier, as any man in all his Army: befides, not one amongst them all would venture further, and be more bold then himself. So when the ROMANS had refisted them, and staid them suddenly, going with fury to have won the Hill, perceiving themselves to be repulsed, they gave back by little and little, until they came into the Field, and then began the foremost of them to gather together, and to put themselves in Battell ray upon the plain, when suddenly they heard the notife and charging of them that were in the tail of their Army. For Claudius Marcellus failed not to take the occasion when it was offered him, because that the noise of the first charge coming up against the Hills thereabouts, under the which he lay in ambush, gave him advertisement thereof: whereupon he caufed his men prefently to shew; and running with great cries, came to give a charge upon those which were in the tail of the Barbarous People, putting the hindmost to the Sword. They made their fellows whose backs were next unto them, to turn their faces, and so from man to man, till at the length in short time all their Battell began to waver in disorder : and they made no great resistance, Marian Victor when they faw they were so charged before and behind, but began straight to slie for lite. The Ro-NANS following them hard at the heels, killed and took Prisoners above a Hundred thousand of ry of the Teuthem , and took moreover their Carts , their Tents , and all their carriage. Which the whole Army tons and Amby confent agreed to prefentunto Marius, excepting nothing, faving that which was imbezeiled and conveighed away under hand. Now, though this was a marvellous Honourable and right Noble Present, yet they thought it not a recompence sufficient for that he had deserved, for the valour he had shewed of a famous Captain, in leading of his Army, and for the good order he kept in this War: fo happy thought they themselves to have elcaped fo great a danger. Notwithstanding, fome Writers do not agree, that the spoil of the Barbarous People was given unto Marius : ror that there were also so great a number of men slain as we have spoken of. But they say, that after this Battell, the MARSILIANS did inclose their Vines, with hedges made of dead mens bones; and that the bodies being rotten and confumed upon the Fields through the great rain that fell upon them the winter following, the ground waxed to fat, and did foak the greate to deep in the fame, that the fummer following, they did bear an incredible quantity of all forts of Fruits. And by this means were Archilocus words proved true, that the arable Land doth wax fat with fuch rottenness or putrifaction. And it is faid also, that ordinarily after great Battells, there falleth great store of wash, and cleanle the ground, defiled and polluted with mans bloud: or else it happeneth by naturall cause: tor that the overthrow of fo many dead bodies, and of the bloud spilt, ingendreth a moil, grofs, and heavy vapour, which doth thicken the Air (that by nature is changeable, and casie to alter) from a very small or little beginning, unto an exceeding great change. After this Battell, Marius caused the harness and spoils of the Barbarous People to be laid aside, that were left whole and fair to fight, to beautifie and enrich the Pomp of his Triumph. Then he caused the rest to be gathered together on a great heap, and laid upon a flack of Wood, to make a Noble Sacrifice unto the gods, all his Army being armed about him, crowned with Garlands of Triumph, and himself and holding a Torch burning in both his hands, which he first listed up unto Heaven. And as he was turning down the Torch to put fire to the flack of Wood, they faw some of his friends a good way off on Horfe-back, coming post unto him: then suddenly there was a great filence made of all the Assembly, every man definous to hear what good News they had brought. When they were come And lighted off their Horfes, they ran straight to embrace Marius, and brought him News that he Marius the life was chosen Confull the fifth time: and presented him the Letters sent him from ROME confirming time Consul. the fame. And thus, this new joy falling out befides the Victory, the private Souldiers did fhew the great joy and pleasure they took in both, with great shours and Beating upon their harness: and the Captains also crowned Marin again with new Garlands of Lawrell which they put about his head : and that done, he put fire under the flack of Wood, and ended his Sacrifice. But that which never fuffered men quietly to enjoy the good hap of any Victory clearly, but in this mortall Life doth ever mingle the ill with the good, be it either Fortune or spite of fatall deftiny, or else the necessity of the natural causes of earthly things: did shortly after this great joy bring News unto Marius, of his companion Carulus Luctarius the other Confull, who was like a Cloud in a fair bright day, and brought the City of ROME again into a new fear and trouble. For Catulus that went against the CIMBRES, thought it was not for him to keep the straights of the Mountains, in hope to let the Barbarous People for passing : because that in so doing, he had been compelled to divide his Army into many parts, and had weakened himself very much it he had taken that course. Wherefore coming a little on this side the Alpes towards ITALY, he planted himself upon Athesis sha the River of ATHES1S, and built a Bridge upon it, to pass and repass over his men when he would, and fet up at either end of the Bridge two ftrong Forts well fortified, that he might more commodioully help the places on the other fide of the River, if the Barbarous People by chance would offer to force them, after they had gotten out of the straights of the Mountains. Now, these Barbarous People had fuch a glory in themselves, and disdamed their Enemies so much, that more to thew their force and boldness, then of any necessity that compelled them, or for any benefit they got by it: they suffered it to snow upon them being stark naked, and did climb up to the top of the Mountains, through great heaps of Ice and Snow. And when they were at the very top of all, they laid their long broad Targets under their Bodies, and lay along upon them, fliding down the free p high Rocks, that had certain hangings over of an infinite height. In the end, they came to the Camp near unto the ROMANS by the Rivers fide, and confidered how they might pass it over: and began to fill it up, tearing down (like Giants) great Hills of earth which they found thereabouts, brought thither great Trees which they pulled up whole by the roots, threw in great pieces of Rocks which they brake, and whole Towers of earth after them to stop and break the course of the River. But besides all this, they threw great Timber into the River, which being carried down the aream, came with fuch a force, and hit against the posts of the Bridge so violently, that they shaked the Ro-MANS Bridge marvelloufly. Whereupon many of the Souldiers of the great Camp were afraid, Canha Ludis. and forfaking it, began to retire. But then did Catulus, like a perfect good Captain flow, that five Confull he made lefs account of his own private Honour and efficient in then he did of the generall Honour fliethfrom the and forfaking it, pegan to fetife. Don internal Columns, then he did of the generall Honour fliethfon in made lefs account of his own private Honour and efficiently, then he did of the generall Honour Cimbres. of all his Souldiers. For, feeing that he could not perfivade his men by any reason to tarry, and that in this fear they dislodged, in disorder against his will : he himself commanded the standard bearer of the Eagle to march on, and ran to the foremost that went their way, and marched himfelf before them all, to the intent that the shame of this retire should altogether light upon him, and not upon his Countrey: and that it might appear the ROMANS did follow their Captain, and not flie away. The Barbarous People therefore affaulting the Fort at the end of the Bridge of the River of Athesis, took it, and all the men that were in it. And because the ROMANS defended it like valiant men, and had luftily ventured their lives to the death for defence of their Countrey: the Barbarous Pecple let them go upon composition, which they sware to keep faithfully, by their Bull of Copper. This Bull afterwards was taken when they loft the Battell, and carried (as they fay) into Carulus Luttatius House, as the chiefest thing of the Victory. 1 urthermore, the Barbarous People finding the Countrey open without any detence, feattered here and there, and deftroyedall where they came. Whereupon the ROMANS lent for Marins to ROME to go against Marins refused tuem : and after he was arrived, every man thought he should have entered in Triumph, because to enter in Triumph also the Senate did grant it him very willingly. But he would not do it, either because he would not deprive his Souldiers and the Captains that had fought under him, of any part of the Honour that was due unto them, they being absent : or because that he would warrant the People from the present danger they were in, by laying afide the glory of his former Victories, into the hands of the good Fortune of ROME, in certain hope to take it again afterwards, by a more honourable and perfect confirmation of the fecond. Wherefore after he had made an Oration to the People and Senate, according to the time, he went his way immediately towards Canulus Luitarius, whose coming according to the time, he went his way immediately considered in Gaul beyond the Moundid comfort himmuch: and fent also for his Army that was yet in Gaul beyond the Moundid comfort himmuch: tains. And after his Army was come, he passed the River of Po, to keep the Barbarous People towards Citafrom hurring ITALY on this fide the Po. their Brethren. Marins asked their Ambaffadours what Brethren they meant. They answered that they were the TEUTONS. Whereat the standers by began to laugh: and Marins finely mocked Martin mock they will be a fixed to the for those Brethren, said he, for we have given them ground enough, to the simbres. them, faying: Care not for those Brethren, said he, for we have given them ground enough, which they will keep for ever. These Ambassadours found his mock straight, and began to revise and threaten him, that the CIMBRES thould prefently make him repent it, and the TEUTONS fo foon as they arrived. Why, faid Marim unto them again, they are come already: and there were no honefly in you, if you should go your way and not salute them, fince they are your Brethren. And as he fpake these words, he commanded his men to bring him the Kings of the Teurons bound and chained, that had been taken within the Mountains of the Alpes by the SE LUANI. The CIMBRES understanding this by report of their Ambassadours, presently marched towards Marius, who stirred not at all, but onely fortified and kept his Camp. They say, that it was for this Battell that Marius first invented the new device he brought in for the Dart which the Maries device ROMANS were wont alwaies to throw against the Lucmies at the first charge. For, before the for altering the faff of the Dart was faftened unto the Iron, and the Iron unto the ftaff, with two little Iron Pins that passed through the Wood: and then Marins left one of the Iron Pins as it was before, and taking away the other, put a little thin Pin of Wood easie to be broken, in place of the same; making it craftily, to the end that when the Dart was thrown, and fluck in the Enemies Target, it should not stand right forward, but bow downwards towards the Iron, that the woodden Pin being broken, the staff of the Dart should hang downwards, holding yet by the Iron Pin running quite through at the point. So Baorix King of the CIMBRES, coming near to Marius Camp with a Bauerix King into Brain Composition of the Cimbrer. finall number of Horfemen, fent him defiance, and willed him to appoint a day and place for Battell, that they might try it out, who should be owners of the Country. Whereunto Marius made answer, that it was not the manner of the ROMANS to counfell with their Enemies, of the time and place when they should give Battell : but neverthelefs, he would not flick to pleasure the CIMERES fo much. And thus they agreed between them, that it should be the third day following, in the plain of Verfelles, which was very commodious for the Horsemen of the Ro-MANS; and also for the Barbarous People to put out at will their great number of fighting men. So both Armies failed not to meet according to appointment, but appeared ranged in Battell, the one before the other. Caralus Lucturius the other Confull, had in his Camp Twenty thousand and Three hundred Souldiers : and Marins had in his Camp Two and thirty thousand fighting men, thoutand and which he placed in the two wings of the Battell , flutting in Catulus with his men in the midft ; 2s Sylla writeth it, who was prefent at the same : faying, that Marius did it of malice, for the hope he had to overthrow his Enemies with the two wings of the Battell, to the end that the whole Victory should light upon his two wings, and that Carulus and his men in the midst should have no part thereof. For he could not fo much as front the Enemy, because that commonly when the front of a Battell is of fuch a breadth, the two wings are ever ftretched out before, and are made like the creffaut of a Moon, where the midft is thickest and farthest in. And it is written also in other Stories, that Cambus himself accusing the malice of Marius, becausehedd fo, spake it to excuse his own difhonour. As for the CIMBRES, the Troops of their Footmen coming out of their Forts leafurely, did put themfelves into a fquadron, as broad as long, for in every fide they occupied almost thirty Furlong : but their Horsemen , which were Fisteen thouland , marched before in sumpuous furniture. For they had Helmets on their heads fashioned like wild Beafts necks, and strange Bevers or Buffes to the lame, and ware on their Helmets great high blumes of Feathers, as they had been wings : which to fight made them appear taller and bigger men then they were. Furthermore, they had good Curaces on their backs, and carried great white Targets before them : and for weapons offensive, every man had two Darts in his hand to bestow afar off, and when they came to hand ftrokes, they had great heavy Swords, which they fought withall near hand. But at that time they did march directly in rank against the Army of the ROMANS, but turned a little on the right hand, meaning to inclose the ROMANS between them and their Footmen that were on the lett hand. The ROMAN Captains found their policy straight, but they could not keep their Souldiers back: for there was one that cried, The Enemies fled, and immediately all the reft began to run after. In the mean time, the Footmen of the Barbarous People that were like to a Sea before them, came forwards still: and then Marius, having washed his hands, and litting them to heaven, promited and vowed a folemn Sacrifice unto the gods of an hundred Oxen. Catulus also made a vow, lifting up his hands to Heaven in like manner, that he would build a Temple unto Fortune for that day : and it is reported, that Marius having Sacrificed, when they shewed him the intrails of the Bealts Sacrificed, he cried out aloud, The Victory is mine. But when they came to give the charge, Marius had a great misfortune happened him, powred upon him by Gods justice, who turned his craft against himself, as Sylla writeth : for there rose very credibly so great a dust, that both Armies loft the fight one of another. And hereupon Marins being the first that ran to be gin the charge, and having placed his men about him, miffed to meet with his Enemies : and being passed beyond their Battell, wandred a great while up and down the Field, whilest the Barbarous People fought against Catulus. So that the greatest fury of the Battell was against Catulus and his Army: in the which Sylla writeth he was himfelf, and faith, that the heat and the Sun, which was full in the CIMERES faces, did the ROMANS marvellous pleasure at that time. For the Barbarous People being very hard brought up to away with cold (because they were born and bred in a cold Countrey, thadowed altogether with Wood and Trees, as we have faid) were to the contrary very tender against the heat, and did melt sweating against the Sun, and gaped straight for breath, putting their Targets before their faces: for it was also in the heart of Sunmer, about The Field the feven and twentieth day of the moneth of July that this Battell was given; and this dust also made fought the 17. the ROMANS the bolder, and kept them that they could not fee the innumerable multitude of their of $\vec{\pi}{\pi} \vec{\pi}$. Enemies far from them. And every man running to fet upon them that came against him, they were joyned together in fight, before that the light of their Enemies could make them afraid. And furthermore, they were fo good Souldiers, and fo able to take pains, that how extream foever the heat was, no man was feen fiweat nor blow, though they ran at the first to fet upon them: and this hath Catulus Luctatius himself left in writing unto the praise of his Souldiers. So were the most part of the Barbarous People, and specially of the best Souldiers, slain in the Field. And because they should not open and break their ranks, the foremost ranks were all tied and bound together with Girdles, Leather thongs, and long Chains of Iron : and they that fled, were chafed and followed into their Camp by the ROMANS, where they met with horrible and fearfull things to behold. For, their Wives being upon the top of their Carts, apparelled all in black, full things to benoid. For, then writes being upon the opposite their Fathers, other their Husbands or flew all those that fled, without regard of Persons; some their Fathers, other their Husbands or Horrible crue. their Brethren, and strangling the little young Babes with their own hands, they cast them under the clay of Wetheir partners, and transferred the Horfe legs, and afterward flew themselves. And they say, that there was a Woman hanged at the end of a Cart Ladder, having hanged up two of her Children by the necks at her heels. And that the men also, for lack of a Tree to hang themselves on, tied slipping Halters about their necks, unto the horns and feet of the Oxen, and that they did prick them afterwards with goads to make them fling and leap fo long, that dragging them all about, them afterwards with goods to make them they killed them. Now though numbers were flain by Prifoners 60. this mean, yet were there Threefcore thousand of them taken Prisoners, and the number of them thousand that were slain, came to twice as many more. In this manner Marius Souldiers spoiled the Camp Men slain of the Cimbres: but the spoils of dead men that were were sain in the Field, with their Ensigns fixfore thouand Trumpets, were all brought (as it is faid) unto Catulas Camp, which was a plain Teftimo. fand. ny to shew that Catulus and his Souldiers had won the Field. Strife rifing thus between the Souldiers of both Comps about it : that the matter might be tried friendly between them, they made the Ambassadours of PARMA their Arbitratours , who were by chance at that time in the Army, Catalus Luccatius Souldiers led the Ambassadours to the place where the overthrow was given, thewing them the Enemies bodies pierced through with their Pikes, which were easie to be known, because Carulus had made them grave their Names upon their Pikes. For all this, Marius went away with the Honour of this great Victory, as well for the first Battell he wan alone, when he overthrew the TEUTONS and the AMERONS, as for his great calling, having been Confull five times. And completion furthermore, the common People at ROME, called him the third founder of the City of ROME, thinking themselves now delivered from as great a danger, as before time they had been from the ancient Gauls : And every man Feafting at home with his Wife and Children, offered the beft diffies of Meat they had to Supper, unto the gods and unto Marius: and would needs have him lone to Triumph for both Victories. But he would not in any case, but Triumphed into the City with Catalas Luctarius, meaning to shew himself courteous and moderate in so great prosperity: and peradventure also fearing Catulus Souldiers, who were in readiness and prepared (if Marius would have deprived their Captain of that Honour) to lett him also of his Triumph. And thus you see how he passed his fifth Consulship. After that, he made more earnest sure for the fixth Consulship then ever any other did for his first : feeking the Peoples good wills by all the fair means he could to please them, humbling himself unto them, not onely more then became his Estate and calling, but directly also against his own nature conterfeiting a courteous Popular manner, being clean contrary to his disposition. His ambition made him timorous to deal in matters of the State concerning the City. For that courage and boldness which he had in Battell against the Enemy, he lost it quite when he was in an Affembly of People in the City: and was eafily put out of his bias, with the first blame or praise he heard given him. And though they report, that on a time when he made a Thousand Camerines free of the City of Rome, because they had done Valiant service in the Wars, that there were some that did accuse him, faying, that it was a thing done against all Law : he answered them, that for the noise of the Armor, he could not hear the Law. Notwithstanding , it feemeth that indeed he was greatly afraid of the fury of the People in an Affembly of the City. For in time of Wars, he ever stood upon his reputation and Authority, knowing that they had need of him; but in Peace and civill Government, because he would rather be the chiefest man then the honestest man, he would creep into the Peoples bosomes to get their favour and good will. And thus through his evil behaviour, he brought all the Nobility generally to be his Enemies. But he seared nor mistrusted none so much, as he did Metellus, for the great unthankiull part he remembred he had plaid him: and the rather also, because he knew him to be a just and true dealing man, and one that was ever against these People-pleasers and flatterers. Marius therefore pra-Metellus a-Cifed all the waies he could, to get Metellus to be banished ROME. Wherefore, to compass his gainst People intent, he fell in friendship with Glaucia and one Staturninas, two of the most bold, most desperate, Pleasers. and most harebraind young men that were in all ROME, who had all the rabblement of Rogues and beggers, and fuch tumultuous People at their commandment: by whose means he made new Popular Laws, and caufed the Souldiers to be called home out of the Wars, and mingled them with the

an honest and true Writer, (howbeit an Enemy unto Marius) writeth, that he obtained his fixth Confulfhip by corruption of Money, which he caused to be distributed amongst the Tribes of the People : and that he bought it for ready Money to put by Metellus, and to have Valerius Flacens Flacing Flac not for his fellow and companion in the Contulfhip, but rather for a Minister of his Will. There was never ROMAN to whom the People granted the Confulfhip fix times, except it were unto Valerius Corvinus onely. But for him, they fay that there was Five and forty years between his the first Confullitip and the last. Where Marius since the first year of his Consulship, continued five years together by good Fortune one after another. But in his last Consulfhip, he wan himself great hate and malice, because he did many foul faults to please Saturninus withall: as amongst others, when he bare with Saturninus, who murdered Nonius his Competitor in the Tribunethip. Afterwards when Saurninus was cholen Tribune of the People, he perferred a Law for diffribution of the Lands among the common People, and unto that Law he had specially added one Article : that all the Lords of the Senate thould come openly to fwear, that they should keep and observe from point to point, that which the People by their voices should decree, and should not deny it in any jot. But Marius in open enate, made as though he would withfrand this Article, laying, that neither he nor any other Wife man of judgement would take this Oath: for faid he, if the Law beevil, then they should do the Senate open wrong to compell them by force to grant it, and not for their own good wills. But he spake not that, meaning to do as he said: for it was but a bait he had hid for Metellus onely, which he could hardly escape. For, imagintot it was out a battle had bate to? According that to tell a fine lie, was a piece of Vertue, and of a good wit: he was throughly refolved with himself, not to pass for any thing he had spoken in the Senate. And to the contrary also, knowing well enough that Metellus was a grave wife man, who efteemed that to be just and true (as To lie cunningly, Marias Pindarias (aid) is the beginning and foundation of great Vertue: he thought he would overreach him, making him affirm before the Senate that he would not swear, knowing also that the People would hate him deadly, if he would refuse afterwards to swear. And so indeed it happened, For Metellus having affured them then that he would not fwear, the Senate break up upon it. And thortly after, Saurnings the Tribune calling the Senators unto the Pulpir for Orations, to compell them to swear before the People: Marius went thither to offer himself to swear. Whereupon the People making filence, liftened attentively to hear what he would fay. But Marius not regarding his large promife and brags made before the Senate, faid then, his neck was not fo long that mg instange promine and prags made octobe and search, and then, an inche was not to long that he would be would prejudice the Commonwealth in a matter of fo great importance: but that he would fivear, and obey the Law, if it were a Law. This fhifting fubrilty he added to it, to cloke and fover is shame: and when he had faid so, he took his Oath. The People seeing him swear were marvellous glad, and praifed him with clapping of their hands: but the Nobility hanging down their heads, were ashamed of him, and were marvellous angry in their hearts with him, that he had so cowardly and shamefully gone from his word. Thereupon all the Senate took their Oaths, one after another against their wills, because they were afraid of the People: faving Metellus, whom, neither Parents, nor friends perswafton and intreasy could once move to swear, for any punishment that Saurnings had imposed upon them which refused to take the Oath, but continued one man Metallia conf. ftill according to his nature, and would never yeeld unto it, offering to abide any pain, rather then to be brought to confent to a dishonest matter unbeseeming his Estate. And thereupon went out of the Affembly, and talking with them that did accompany him, told them, that to do eril it was too easie a thing: and to do good without danger, it was also a common matter: but to do well with danger, that was the part of an honeft and Vertuous man. Saurninus then commanded the Confulls by Edict of the People, that they should banish Metellus by found of Trumpet, with speciall commandment, that no man should let him have Fire nor Water, nor lodge him prifaying touch with speciall commandment, that no man should let him have Fire nor Water, nor lodge him pring well doing, vately nor openly. The common People, they were ready to have fallen upon him, and to have killed him: but the Noble men being offended for the injury they had offered him, gathered together about him to fave him, if any would offer him violence. Metellus himself was so good a man, that he would not any civil diffention should rife for his sake : and therefore he absented himtelf trom ROME, wherein he did like a wife man. For faid he, either things will amend, and the People then repenting themselves of the wrong they have done me, will call me horse again; or ele things standing as they do now, it shall be best for me to be surthest off. But for his travell in his exile, how much he was beloved and honoured, and how fweetly he paffed his time studying Philosophy in the City of RHODES, shall be declared more at large in his Life. Now on the other fide, Marins to recompence the pleasure Saturninus had done him, being driven to let him have his will in all things, did not fortee what an intollerable plague he brought unto the Commonwealth, giving the bridle to a desperate man, who every way, by force, by Sword and murder, plainly fought to usurp Tyrannicall Power, with the utter deftruction and subversion of the whole Commonwealth. And so bearing reverence on the one fide unto the Nobility, and defiring on the other fide to gratifie the common People: he played a shamefull part, and shewed himself a double dealing man. For one night the Nobility and chiefest Citizens coming to his House, to perswade him to bridle Saturations infolency and boldness: at the self same time also Saturninus going thither to speak with him, he caused him to be let in at a back door, the Noble men not being privy to his coming. Andlo Marius procure Marius telling the Nobility, and then Saturninus, that he was troubled with a loofness of his Body, under this pretence whipped up and down, now to the one, then to the other, and did no thing elle but set them surther out one against another, then they were before. Nevertheless, the Senate being marvellous angry with his naughty double dealing, and the order of Knights taking part with the Senate, Marius in the end was compelled to Arm the People in the Market-place, to fuppress them that were up, and drave them into the Capitoll; where for lack of Water, they were compelled to yeeld themselves at the length, because he had cut off the Pipes and Conduits, by the which the Water ran unto the Capitoll. By reason whereof, they being unable to continue any longer, called Marius unto them, and yeelded themselves to him, under the affurance of the faith Natrol to of the common People. But although Marius did what he could possible to his uttermost Power the faith of the to fave them, he could not prevail, nor do them pleafure: for they were no fooner come down common into the Market-place, but they were all put to death. Whereupon he having nour purchased him. Poorle. into the Marker-place, but they were all put to death. Whereupon he having now purchased himfelf the ill will of the People and Nobility both, when time came about that new Cenfors should be chosen, every man looked that he would have been one of the suters : howbeit he sued not for it, for fear of repulse, but suffered others to be chosen of far less dignity and calling then himfelf. Wherein notwithstanding he gloried, faying, that he would not sue to be Censor, because he would not have the ill will of many, for examining too flraightly their lives and manners. Again, a decree being preferred to repeal Metellus banishment, Marius did what he could possible, Metellus return by word and deed to hinder it : howbeit, feeing in the end he could not have his will, he let it alone, from banish-The People having thus willingly revoked Metellus banithment, Marius heart would not ferve him ment. to fee Metellus return again, for the malice he bare him : wherefore he took the Seas to go into Cappadocia and Galatia, under colour to pay certain Sacrifices to the Mother of Marine jourthe gods, which he had vowed unto her. But this was not the very caufe that made him to under-ney into Garage take this journey, for he had another fecret meaning in it. For his nature not being framed to live passia and in Peace, and to govern civill matters, and having attained to his greatness by a many codes. in Peace, and to govern civill matters, and having attained to his greatness by Arms, and suppofing that his glory and Authority confumed and decreased altogether living idlely in Peace, he fought to device new occasion of Wars, hoping if he could fire up the Kings of Asia, and specially Atthridates, (who without his procurement was feared much, that one day he would make Wars against the ROMANS) that he should then undoubtedly without let of any man be chosen Generall to make Wars with him; and withall alfo, that by that means he should have occasion to fill the City of ROME with new Triumphs; and his House with the spoils of the great Kingdom of PONT, and with the riches of the King. Now Mithridates diffosing himself to entertain Marius, with all the Honour and courtefies he could possible shew him : Marius in the end notwithflanding would not once give him a good look, nor a courteous word again, but churlifhly find unto Misbridates at his departure from him : Thou must determine one of these two, King Mithridates: either to make thy felf stronger then the ROMANS, or else to look to do what words to Mis they command thee, without refiftance. These words amazed Mithridates, who had heard fay thridates before, that the ROMANS would speak their minds freely: howbeit he never saw nor proved it before, untill that time. After Marius was returned unto ROME, he built a House near unto the Market-place, because he would not (as he faid himself) that such as came unto him, should trouble themselves in going far to bring him home to his House : or elic for that he thought this would be an occasion that divers would come to falure him , as they did other Senators. Howbeit, that was not the cause indeed: but the onely cause was, for that he had no naturall grace nor civilhisy to entertain men courteoufly that came unto him, and that he lacked behaviour belides to rule a Commonwealth: and therefore in time of Peace they made no more reckoning of him then they did of an old rufty harnels or implement, that was good for nothing but for the Wars onely. And for all other that professed Arms as himself did, no man grieved him so much to be called forward to Office and State before himself, as Syna did. For he was ready to burst for spite, to see that the Noble men did all what they could to prefer Sylla, for the malice and ill will they barehim: and that Sylla's first rising and perferment grew, by the quarrells and contentions he had with him. And specially when Bocchus King of Numidia was Proclaimed by the Senate, a friend and confederate of the ROMAN People, he offered up Statues of Victories, carrying tokens of Triumph federate of the ROMAN People, he offered up Statues of Victories, carrying tokens of Triumph The capte of into the Temple of the Capitoll: and placed near unto them also, an Image of Gold of King f_{μ} the capitol the difference gurth, which, he delivered by his own hands unto Sylla. And this made Marius stark mad for brown hards pite and jealousie, who could not abide that another should take upon him the glory of his doings: us and 5,44. infomuch as he determined to pluck those Images down and to carry them away by force. Sylla on the other fide ftomached Marius, and would not fuffer him to take them out of the place where they were : fo that this civill fedition had taken present effect, had not the Wars of their confederates fallen out between , and restrained them for a time. For the best Souldiers and most Warlike People of all ITALY, and of greatest Power, they altogether role against the ROMANS, of the Confe, and had well near overthrown their whole Empire. For they were not onely of great force and detates. Power, and well Armed: but their Captains also, for Valiantness and Skill, did in manner equall the worthiness of the ROMANS. For this War fell out wonderfully, by reason of the calanity and misfortune that happened in it : but it wan Sylla as much fame and reputation, as it did Marius shame and dishonour. For he shewed himself very could and slow in all his enterprises, still delaying time, either because age had mortified his active heat, and killed that quick ready dispofition of body that was wont to be in him, being then above threefcore and five years old : or elfe as he faid himself, because he was waxen gowty, and had ach in his veins and finews, that he could not well stir his body, and that for shame: because he would not tarry behind in this War, be did more then his years could away withall. Notwithstanding, as he was, yet he wan a great Battell, wherein were flain fix thousand of their Enemies : and fo long as the Wars endured, he never gave them advantage of him, but patiently fuffered them fometime to intrench him, and to mock him, and gave him vile words, challenging him out to fight, and yet all this would not provoke him. It is faid also, that Pompedius Silo, who was the chiefest Captain of reputation and Authority the Enemies had, faid unto Marim on a time: If thou be Marim, fo great a Captain as they fav challenge, and thou art, leave thy Camp and come out to Battell. Nay, faid Mariu to him again: If thou be a great Captian, pluck me out by the Ears, and compell me to come to Battell. Another time when the Enemies gave them occasion to give a great charge upon them with advantage : the Ro-MANS were faint-hearted, and durft not fer upon them. Wherefore, after both the one and the other were retired, Marius cauled his men to Assemble, and spake unto them in this fort : I cannot tell which of the two I should reckon most cowards : you your felves, or your Enemies : for they durst not once see your backs, nor you them in the faces. In the end notwithstanding, he was compelled to refign his charge, being able to ferve no longer for the weakness and debility of his Body. Now all the Rebells of IT ALY being put down, many at ROME (by the Orators means) did tue to have the charge of the Wars against Mithridates : and among them, a Tribune of the People called Sulpitius, (a very bold and rafh man) beyond all mens hope and opinion preferred Marins, and perfwaded them to givehim the charge of these Wars, with title and Authority of Vice-confull. The People thereupon were divided in two parts : for the one fide food for Marins, and the other would have Sylla take the charge, faying, that Marins was to think now upon the hot Bathes at BAIES, to look to cure his old Body, brought low with rhewm Mons Milenan, and age, as himself said. For Marius had a goodly stately House in those parts near unto the Mount of MISENE, which was far more fine and curiously turnished then became a Captain that had been in so many foughten Battells and dangers. They say that Cornelia afterwards bought that fine House for the sum of seventhousand five hundred Crowns; and shortly after also, Lucullus bought it again for two hundred and frity thousand Crowns : to so great excess was vanity and curiofity grown in very fhort time at ROME. Notwithstanding all this, Marim too ambittoutly firring like a pallionate young man againft the weaknefs and debility of his age, never miffed day Marius ambut he would be in the Field of Mars to exercise himself among the young men, shewing his Body disposed and ready to handle all kind of Weapons, and to ride Horses: albeit that in his latter time, he had no great health of Body, because he was very heavy and sad. There were that liked that palling well in him, and went of purpole into the Field to fee what pains he took, ftriving to excell the reft. Howbeit those of the better fort were very forry to see his avarice and ambition, confidering specially, that being of a poor man become very rich, and of a right mean Person a great Estate, that he could not now contain his prosperity within reasonable bounds, nor yet content himfelt to be efteemed and honoured, quietly enjoying all he had won, and which at that prefent he did posses: but as if he had been very poor and needy, after he had received sulpiting guard and Minister to destroy the Commonwealth, which was the infolent and rash Sulpitins: who al-fuch great Honour and Triumphs, would yet carry out his age to floutly, even into Cap-PADOCIA, and unto the Realm of Pont, to go fight there against Archelam, and Neopolew.us., Lieutenants of King Mithridates. Indeed he alledged some reasons to excuse himseli, but they were altogether vain : for he faid that he defired in Person to bring up his Son in exercise of Arms, and to teach him the discipline of Wars. That discovered the secret hidden plague, which of long time had lurked in ROME, Marins specially having now met with a fit Instrument together followed Saturnium doings, faving that he was found too cowardly and fainthearted in all his enterprifes, and for that did Marim justly reprove him. But Sulpitim, because he would not dally nor delay time, had ever fix hundred young Gentlemen of the order of Knights, whom he uled as his guard about him, and called them the guard against the Senate. And one day as the Confulls kept their common Affembly in the Market-place , Sulpitins coming in Armed upon them, made them both take their heels, and get them packing : and as they fled, one of the Confulls Sons being taken tardy, was flain. Sylla being the other Confull, and perceiving that he was followed hard at hand unto Marius House, ran into the same against the opinion of all the world : whereof they that ran after him not being aware, passed by the House. And it is reported that Marius himself conveyed Sylla fafely out at a back door, and that he being scaped thus, went unto his Camp. Notwithflanding, Sylla himself in his Commentaries doth not say, that he was saved in Marius House when he fled : but that he was brought thither to give his confent unto a matter which Sulpius would have forced him unto against his will, presenting him naked Swords on every side. And he writeth also, that being thus forcibly brought unto Marins Houle, he was kept there in this fear, untill fuch time as returning into the Market-place, he was compelled to revoke again the Adjornment of justice, which he and his companion by Edict had commanded. This done, Sulpitius then being the stronger, caused the Commissions and sharge of this War against Mithridates to be a fligned unto Marius by the voice of the People. Therefore Marius giving order for his departure, fent two of his Colonels before to take the Army of Sylla: who having won his Souldiers heats before, and stirred them up against Marius, brought them on with him directly towards Rome, being no less then five and thirry thousand fighting men: who setting upon the Captains Marius had sent unto them, slew them in the Field. In revenge whereof Marius again in Rome put many of Sylla's friends and followers to death, and proclaimed open liberty by found of Trimpet , to all flaves and bondmen that would take Arms for him : but there were never but there onely that offered themselves. Whereupon, having made a little resistance unto Sylla when he came into ROME, he was foon after compelled to runhis way. Marius was no fooner out of the City, but Matini hyent they that were in his company for faking him, dispersed themselves here and there being dark night; and from Rome, Marius himself got to a house of his in the Countrey, called Salonium, and sent his Son to one of his Father in Law Mutim Farms, not far fromthence, to make fome provision for victuals. But Marins in the mean time, went before to Ostla, where one of his friends Numerim had prepared him a flip, in the which he imbarked immediately, not tarrying for his Son, and hoifed fail, having onely Grani-14 his Wives Son with him. In the mean time the younger Marius being at his Father in Law Mutim Farm, stayed so long in getting of provision, in truiling of it up, and carrying it away, that broad day light had like to have discovered him : for the enemies had advertisement whether he was gone, whereupon certain horfemen were fent thither fupposing to have found him. But the keeper of the house having an inckling of their coming, and preventing them also before they came, suddenly yoked his Oxen to the Cart, which he loaded with Beans and hid this younger Marius under the fame. And pricking the Oxen forward with his Goad, fet out, and met them as they went towards the City, and delivered Marius in this fort into his Wives house : and there taking such things as he needed, when the night following came, went towards the fea, and took ship, finding one cross-failed, bound towards Africk. Marius the Father failing on still, had a very good wind to point along the coast of ITALY: notwithstanding, being afraid of one Geminius, a chief man of TERRACINE, who hated Marins the fon him to the death he gave the Mariners warning increased between a different rates hand of the party hand of the many the hand of the ha him to the death, he gave the Mariners warning thereof betimes, and willed them to take heed of landing fride. at TERRACINE. The Mariners were very willing to obey him, but the wind stood full against them coming from the Main, which raifed a great storm, and they feared much that their Vessel which was but a Boat, would not brook the feas: besides that, he himself was very sick in his stomach, and sore sea-beaten: notwithstanding at the length with the greatest difficulty that might be, they recovered the coast over against the City of CIRCES. In the mean time, the storm increased still, and their victuals failed them: whereupon they were compelled to land, and went wandring up and down not knowing what to do, nor what way to take. But as it falleth out commonly in fuch like cases of extremity, they thought it always the best safety for them, to sly from the place where they were, and to hope of that which they saw not : for if the sea were there enemy, the land was so likewise. To meet with men they were afraid: and not to meet with them on the other fide lacking victuals, was indeed the greater danger. Nevertheless, in the end they met with heard-men that could give them nothing to eat, but knowing Marius, warned him to get out of the way as foon as he could possible, because it was not long fince that there passed by a great troop of Horsemen that sought him all about. And being brought unto such perplexity, that he knew not where to bestow himself, and specially for that the poor men he had in his company were almost starved for hunger : he got out of the high way notwithstanding, and fought out a very thick Wood, where he passed all that night in great forrow, and the next morning being compelled of necessiry, determined yet to employ his body before all his strength failed. Thus he wandred on along the sea coast, still comforting them that followed him the best he could, and praying them not to despair, but to refer themselves to him, even untill the last hope, trusting in certain Prophefies which the Soothfayers had told him of long time before. For when he was but very young, and dwelling in the Countrey, he gathered up in the lap of his Gown, the airy of an Eagle, in the Marius found and owening in the Country, in gameter of the South and Mother much wondring, asked the South an airy which were feven young Eagles: whereat his Father and Mother much wondring, asked the South Eagles. fayers what that meant. They answered, that their Son should one day be one of the greatest men in the world, and that out of doubt he should obtain seven times in his life the chiefest Office of dignity in his Countrey. And for that matter, it is faid, that fo in deed it came to pass. Other hold opinion, that fuch as were about Marius at that time, in that prefent place, and elfewhere, during the time of his flying: they hearing him tell this tale, believed it, and afterwards put it down in writing, as a true thing, although of troth it is both false and fained. For, they say that the Eagle never hath but two young ones: by reason whereof it is maintained also, that the Poet Musans hath lyed, in that which he hath written in these verses:

> The Eagle lays three eggs, and two she hatcheth forth: But yet she bringeth up but one that any thing is worth.

How many eggs the Eagle

How loever it was, it is certain that Marius many times during the time of his flying faid, that he was affured he should come unto the seventh Consulship. When they were come near now to the City of MINTURNES, about two miles and an half from it, they might perceive a Troop of horsemen coming by the fea fide, and two ships on the fea that fell upon the coast by good hap. Wherefore they all began to run (fo long as they had breath and strength) towards the seas, into the which they threw themfelves, and got by swimming unto one of the ships where Granius was: and they croffed over unto the Ifle that is right against it called ENARIA. Now for Marius, who was heavy and fick of body, two of his servants holp to hold him up always above water, with the greatest pain and difficulty in the world : and at the last they laboured so throughly, that they put him into the other ship at the self fame present when the horsemen came unto the sea side; who cryed out aloud to the Mariners to land again, or elfethrow Marius over-board, and then to go where they would. Marius on the other fide humbly befought them with tears, not to do fo : whereby the Mafters of the ship in a short space were in many minds whether to do it, or not to do it. In the end notwithstanding, they answered the horfemen, they would not throw him over-board : fo the horfemen went their way in a great rage. But as foon as they were gone, the Master of the Ship changing his mind, drew towards land, and cast Anchor about the mouth of the River of Liris, where it leaveth her banks, and maketh great Marshes: and therethey told Marius he should do well to go on land to eat somewhat, and refresh his fick body, till the wind served them to make sail, which doubtless said they, will be at a certain hour when the fea-wind falls and becomes calm, and that there rifeth a little wind from the land, ingendred by the vapours of the Marthes, which will ferve the turn very well to take Seas again. Marius tollowing their counfel, and thinking they had meant good faith, was fet on land upon the Rivers bank: and there laid him down upon the grafs, nothing suspecting that which happened arter to him. For the Mariners prefently taking their ship again, and hoisting up their Anchors failed straight away, and fled: judging it no honesty for them to have delivered Marius into the hands of his enemies, nor fafety for themselves to have faved him. Marius finding himself all alone, and forfaken of every man, lay on the ground a great while, and faid never a word : yet at the length taking heart a little to him, got up once again on his feet, and painfully wandered up and down, where was neither way nor path at all, overthwart deep Marshes and great Ditches full of water and mud, till he came at the length to a poor old mans Cottage, dwelling there in these Marshes, and falling at his feet, befought him to help to fave and succour a poor afflicted man, with promise that one day he would give him a better recompence then he looked for, if he might escape this present danger wherein he was. The old man, whether for that he had known Marius aforetime, or that feeing him (by conjecture onely) judged him to be fome great perfonage, told him that if he meant but to lie down, and rest himself a little, his poor Cabin would serve that turn reasonably well: but if he meant to wander thus, to fly his enemies that followed him, he would then bring him into a more fecret place, and farther off from noise. Marius prayed him that he would do fo much for him: and the good man Mariar hidden brought him into the Marsh, unto a low place by the Rivers side, where he made him lie down, and in the Marshes, unto a low place by then covered him with a great deal of Reed and Bent, and other such light things as could not hurr him. He had not long been there, but he heard a great noise coming towards the Cabin of the poor old man: for Geminius of TERRACINE had fent men all about to feek for him, whereof some by chance came that way, and put the poor man in a fear, and threatned him that he had received and hidden an enemy of the ROMANS. Marius hearing that, rose out of the place where the old man had laid him, and stripping himself stark naked, went into a part of the Marsh where the water was Marias takea. full of mire and mud, and there was found of those that searched for him: who taking him out of the flime all naked as he was, carried him into the City of MINTURNES, and delivered him there into the Governors hands. Open Proclamation was made by the Senate through all ITALY, that they should apprehend Marins, and kill him wheresoever they found him. Notwithstanding, the Governors and Magistrates of MINTURNES thought good first to consult thereupon among themselves, and in the mean time they delivered him into the fate cultody of a woman called Famia, whom they thought to have been a bitter enemy of his, for an old grudge fhe had to him, which was this. Familia fometime had a husband called Timius, whom the was willing to leave, for they could not agree, and required her Dower of him again, which was very great. Her husband again faid, fhe had plaid the whore. The matter was brought before Marius in his fixth Confulfhip, who had given judgement upon it. Both parties being heard, and the Law profecuted on either fide, it was found that this Fannia was a naughty woman of her body, and that her Husband knowing it well enough before, yet he took her with her faults, and long time lived with her. Wherefore Marius being angry with them both, gave fentence that the husband should repay back her dower, and that for her naughty life, she should pay four farthings. This notwithstanding, when Fannia saw Marius, she grudged him not Families course for that, and leaft of all had any revenging mind in her towards him, but contrarily did comfort and tefic unto Ma help him what she could with that she had. Marius thanked her marvellously for it, and had her than the had.

hope well: because shemet with so good luck as he was coming to her house, and in this manner. As they were leading of him, when he came near unto Fanniaes houle, her door being open, there came an Ass running out to go to drink at a Conduit not far from thence : and meeting Marius by the way, looked upon him with a livefull countenance, first of all stopping suddenly before him, and then beginning to bray out aloud, and to leap and skip by him. Whereupon Marius straight conjecturing with himfelf, faid, that the gods did fignifie unto him, that he should save himself sooner by water then by land : because the As leaving him, ran to drink, and cared not to eat. So when he had told Fannia this tale, he defired to rest, and prayed them to let him alone, and shut the Chamber door to him. But the Magistrates of the City having consulted together about him, in the end resolved they must defer no longer time, but dispatch him out of the way presently. Now when they were 3greed upon it, they could not find a man in the City that durft take upon him to kill him: but a man of Arms of the Gauls, or one of the CIMBRES (for we find both the one and the other in writing) that went thither with his fword drawn in his hand. Now, that place of the Chamber wherein Marius lay was very dark, and as it is reported, the man of Arms thought he faw two burning flames come out of Marius eyes, and heard a voice out of that dark corner, faying unto him: O tellow, thou, dareft thou to kill Cains Marius? The barbarous GAUL hearing these words, ran out of the Chamber presently, casting his sword in the midst of the floor, and cryed out these words onely: I cannot kill Caius Marius. This made the MINTURNIANS afraid in the City at the first, but afterwards it moved them to compassion. So they were angry with themselves, and did repent them that they converted their counsel to so cruel and unkinda deed, against one that had preserved all I-TALY: and to deny him aid in fo extream necessity, it was too great a fin. Therefore let us let him go, faid they to themselves, where he will, and suffer him to take his fortune appointed him elsewhere; and let us pray to the gods to pardon this offence of ours, to have thrust Marins naked and beggarly out of our City. For these considerations, the MINTURNIANS went all together to Marius where he The Minturnians. was, and flood about him, determining to fee him fafely conducted unto the Sea fide. Now though any inffered every man was ready and willing to pleafure him, some with one thing, some with another, and that Maria to go they did haften him all they could possible, yet they were a good while a going thinter : because there his way with mey due material man at they could positively yet they was a wood called Marica, that lay right in their way between their City and the Sea-coast, which they Maria, 161.4. greatly reverence, and think it a Sacriledge to carry any thing out of that Wood, that was once brought into it. On the other fide, to leave to go through this Wood, and to compass it round about, it would ask a marvellous long time. So they standing all in doubt what they should do, one of the ancientest nien of the City spake aloud unto them, and said: that there was no way forbidden them, that went about to fave Marius life. Then Marius himself being the foremost man, taking up some of the fardels which they carried with him to pleasure him in the ship, went through the Wood. All other things neceffary being thus readily prepared for him with like good will, and specially the ship which one Bellows had ordained for him: he caused all this story to be painted in a Table at large, which he gave unto the Temple, out of the which he departed when he took thip. After he was departed thence, Marius the c. the wind by good fortune carried him into the Isle of ENARIA, where he found Granius and some det flyething other of his friends, with whom he took Sea again, and pointed towards Africe. But lacking Africe. water, they were compelled to Land in SICILIA, in the territory of the City of ERIX: where by chance there lay a ROMAN Quæftor, who kept that coast. Marius being landed there, scaped very narrowly that he was not taken of him: for he flew fixteen of his men that came out with him to take water. So Marius getting him thence with all speed, crossed the Seas, untill he arrived in the Isle of MENYNGE, where he first understood that his Son was faved with Cethegus, and that they were both together gone to Hiempfall King of the NUMIDIANS to befeech him for aid. This gave him a little courage, and made him bold to pass out of that Isle, into the coast of CARTHAGE. Now at that time, Sextilius a ROMAN Prator was Governour of AFRICK, unto whom Marius had never done good nor hurt, and therefore he hoped, that for pity onely he might perhaps have help at his hand. Howbeit he was no fooner landed with a few of his men, but a Sergeant came and faid unto him: Sextilim, Prætor and Governour of Lybia, doth forbid thee to land in all this Province: 0therwise he telleth thee, that he will obey the Senates commandment, and pursue thee as an enemy of the ROMANS. Marius hearing this commandment, was so angry and forry both, that he could not readily tell what answer to make him, and paused a good while, and faid never a word, still eying the Sergeant with a grim look: untill he asked him what answer he would make to the Przetors commandment. Marius then fetching a deep figh from his heart, gave him this answer: Thou shalt tell mandment. Marius then fetching a deep figh from his neart, gave min this answer: I nou mair ten Sextilius, that thou haft feen Caius Marius banished out of his Countrey, fitting amongst the ruines. Marius wife answer of forof the City of Carthage. By this answer, he wifely layed the example of the ruine and deftru-Ction of that great City of CARTHAGE, before Sexuilius eyes, and the change of his fortune, to stancy, warn Sextilius that the like might fall upon him. In the mean time, Hiempfall King of the NUMIDI-ANS, not knowing how to resolve, did honourably intreat young Marius and his company: but when they were willing to go their way, he always found new occasion to stay them, and was very glad to fee that he started not for any opportunity or good occasion that was offered: notwithstanding there fortuned a happy mean unto them, whereby they faved themselves. And this it was, This Marius the younger being a fair complexioned young man, it pittied one of the Kings Concubines to fee him so hardly dealt withall. This pity of hers was a shadow to cloak the love she bare him, but Marius would not hearken at the first to her enticements, and refused her. Yet in the end, perceiving that there was no other way for him to escape thence, and confidering that she did all things for their avail, more diligently and lovingly then the would have done, if the had not meant further matter unto him, then onely to enjoy the pleature of him: he then accepted her love and kindness, so as at the length the taught him a way how to fly, and fave himself and his friends. Hereupon he went to his father, and Marius the after they had embraced and falured each other, and going along the sea fide, they found two Scorpi- younger escaons fighting together. Marius took this for an ill fign: whereupon they quickly took a fisher boat, Peth Hiemfills and went into the Isle of CERCINA, which is no great distance off from firm land. They had no hands. fooner hoifed up Anchor, but they faw the horsemen which King Hiempfall had sent unto the place from whence they were departed: and that was one of the greatest dangers that Marius ever escaped. In the mean time there was news at Rome, that Sylla made war against King Mithridates Lieurenants: and furthermore, that the Confuls being up in Arms the one against the other, Octavius wan the battle, Cinna driven and being the stronger, had driven out Cinna who fought to have usurped tyrannical power, and had out of Rame by made Cornelius Merula Conful in his place : and that Cinna on the other fide leavyed men out of o. Odsvius. ther parts of ITALY, and made wars upon them that were in ROME. Maring hearing of this diffention, thought good to return as foon as he could possible into ITALY. And affembling certain horsemen of the Nation of the Maurusians in Africk, and certain Italians that had faved themfelves there, unto the number of a thousand men in all : he took sea, and landed in a Haven of Thus-CANE called TELAMON; and being landed, proclaimed by found of Trumpet, liberty to all flaves and bondmen that would come to him. So the labourers, herdmen and neat-herds of all that Marsh, for the onely name and reputation of Marim, ran to the fea fide from all parts: of the which he having chosen out the stoutest and lustiest of them, wan them so by fair words, that having gathered a great company together in few days, he made forty fail of them. Furthermore, knowing that Octavius was a marvellous honest man, that would have no authority otherwise then Law and reason would: and that Cinna to the contrary was suspected of Sylla, and that he fought to bring in change and innovation to the Commonwealth: he determined to joyn his forcewith Cinna. So Marius fent first unto Cinna, to let him understand that he would obey him as Consul, and be ready to do all that he should command him. Cinna received him, and gave him the Title and Authority of Vice-Conful, and fent him Serjeants to carry Axes and Rods before him, with all other figns of Publick Authority. But Marisus refused them, and faid, that pomp became not his miserable fortune : for he ever went in a poor thread-bare Gown, and had let his hair grow ftill after he was banished, being about threefore and ten years old, and had a fober gate with him, to make men pity him the more that faw him. But under all this counterfeit pity of his he never changed his natural look, which was ever more fearfull and terrible then otherwife. And where he spake but little, and went very demurely and foberly, that shewed rather a cankered courage with him, then a mind humbled by his banishment. Thus when he had faluted Cinna, and spoken to the Souldiers, he then began to fet things abroach, and made a wonderfull change in few days. For first of all, with his ships he cut off all the victuals by Sea, and robbed the Merchants that carried Corn and other victuals to ROME: fo that in thort space he was mafter Purveyer for all necessary provision and victuals. After this he went along the coast, and took all the Cities upon the Sea fide, and at the length wan Ostia also by treafon, put the most part of them in the Town to the sword, and spoiled all their goods: and afterwards making a Bridge upon the River of TIBER, took from his enemies all hope to have any manner of Provision by Sea. That done, he went directly towards Rome with his Army, where first he wan Officials ness the hill called Jamiculum through Officius fault: who overthrew himfelf in his doings, not fo much for lack of reasonable skill of Wars, as through his unprofitable curiosity and strictness in tence of the City of Rome observing the Law. For when divers did persuade him to set the bondmen at liberty to take Arms for defence of the Commonwealth: he answered, that he would never give bondmen the Law and Priviledge of a ROMAN Citizen, having driven Caim Marim out of ROME, to maintain the Authority of the Law. But when Cecilius Metellin was come to ROME, the Son of that Metellins Numidicus, that having begun the Wars in Lybia against King Jugurth, was put out by Marius: the Souldiers forfook Offaviss immediately, and came unto him, because they took him to be a better Captain, and defired also to have a Leader that could tell how to command them to fave the City, and the Common-wealth. For they promifed to fight valiantly, and perfuaded themselves that they should overcome their enemies, so that they had a skilfull and valiant Captain that could order them. Metellus milliking their offer, commanded them in anger to return again unto the Conful: but they for spite went unto the enemies. Metellus on the other side, seeing no good order taken in the City to refift the enemies, got him out of ROME. But Offavius being perfurated by certain Soothmuch given to fayers and CHALDEAN Sacrificers, who promifed him all should go well with him, tarried still in ROME: for that man being otherwise, as wife as any ROMAN of his time, and one that dealt as Octavist veruprightly in his Confulthip, not carried away with flattering tales, and one also that followed the Ancient Orders and Customs as infallible rules and example, neither breaking ner omitting any part thereof: methinks yet had this imperfection, that he frequented the Soothfayers, Wife men, and Aftronomers, more then menskilfull in Arms and Government. Wherefore, before that Marius himfelt came into the City, Oftwiss was by force pluckt out of the Pulpit for Orations, and flain prefenly by Marins Souldiers whom he had fent before into the City. And it is faid also, that when he was slain, they found a figure of a CHALDEAN Prophecy in his bosom: and here is to be noted a official flain great contrariety in thele two notable men, Othavius and Marius. The first lost his life by trusting by Marius foulto Soothfaying, and the second prospered, and rose again, because he did not despite the Art of Divination. The state of Rome standing then in this manner, the Senate consulting together, sen Ambassadors unto Cinna and Marius, to pray them to come peaceably into Rome, and not imbrue their hands with the blood of their Citizens. Ginna fitting in his Chair as Conful, gave them audience, and made them a very reasonable and courteous answer. Marius standing by him spake never a word: but shewed by his fowr look that he would straight fill Rome with murder and blood. So when the Ambassadors were gone, Cinna came into Rome environed with a great number of fouldiers Cinnsana Ma but Marins staid suddenly at the gate, speaking parely in anger, and parely in mockery, that he was a banished man, and driven out of his Countrey by Law : and therefore if they would have him come into ROME again, they should first by a contrary. Decree abollish and revoke that of his banishment, as if he had been a Religious observer of the Laws, and as though ROME had at that present enjoyed their Freedome and Liberty. Thus he made the People affemble in the Market place to proceed to the confirmation of his calling home again. But before three or four Tribes had time to give their voices, difguifing the matter no longer, and shewing plainly that he meant not to be lawfully called home again from exile: he came into Rome with a Guard about him, of the verieft Rascals and most shameless slaves, called the BARDLEIANS, who came to him from all parts: Maring caused and they for the least word he spake, or at the twinckling of his eye, or at a nod of his head made to them, flew many men through his commandment, and at the length flew Ancharius a Senator that Marius did not falute, and speak unto : for that was the very fign he had given them to kill them Maring cruely, openly in the streets before everyman, so that his very friends were arraid of being murthered, when they came to falute him. Thus a great number of men being flain, Cinna in the end began to be fatisfied and to appeale his anger. But Marius anger and unsatiable desire of revenge increafed more and more, so that he spared not one if he suspected him never so little : and there was nei-

Mark Anthony the Orator had also found out a faithfull friend, yet was he unfortunate. This faithfull friend of his, was a poor simple man, who had received one of the chiefest men of ROME into his house to keep him close there: he being desirous to make him the best chear he could with that little he had, sent one of his men to the next Tavern to fetch Wine, who tasting the Winemore curioully then he was wont to do, called for better. The Drawer asked him why the new ordinary Wine would not ferve him, but he must needs have of the beft and deareft: the foolish fellow simply answered him (telling him as his familiar needs have of the out and tender and friend) that his mafter did feaft Mark Anthony, who was hidden very fecreity in his house. He was M. Antenius no fooner gone with his Wine, and his back turned, but the vile traiterous Drawer ran unto Marins, the Orator, bewho was fet at Supper when he came. The Drawer being brought unto him, promifed him to deli- travel by a ver Mark Anthony into his hands. But he fent Anniu one of his Captains thither with a certain number of fouldiers, and commanded them to bring him his head quickly. So they went thither, and when they were come to the house which the Drawer had brought them to, Annius tarried beneath at the door, and the fouldiers went up the stairs into the Chamber, and finding Anthony there, they began to encourage one another to kill him, not one of them having the heart to lay hands upon him. For Anthony's tongue was as fweet as a Syrene, and had fuch an excellent grace in speaking, that when he The force of began to speak unto the Souldiers, and to pray them to save his life: there was not one of them so hard eloquence. hearted, as once to touch him, no not onely to look him in the face, but looking downwards, fell a weeping. Annius perceiving they tarried long, and came not down, went himlelf up into the Chamber, and found Anthony talking to his Souldiers, and them weeping, his sweet eloquent tongue had so melted their hearts: but he rating them, ran furioully upon him, and strake off his head with his own hands. And Catulus Luctatius also, that had been Conful with Marius, and had triumphed over the CIMBRES with him, seeing himself in this peril, sent men to entreat Marin for him : but his answer Wasever, He must needs die. So Catulus locked himself into a little Chamber, and made a great fre Catulus Lufts: of Charcole to be kindled, and with the imoak thereof choaked himfelf. Now after their heads were this killed cut off, they threw out the naked bodies into the streets, and trode them under their feet: the which himself. was not onely a pitifull, but a fearfull fight to all that faw them. But after all this yet, there was nothing that grieved the people so much, as the horrible lechery and abominable cruelty of his Guard of the BARDLEIANS, who coming into mens houses by force, after they had slain the Masters, defiled their young children, and ravished their Wives and Maids, and no man would once reprove their cruelty, lechery, and unsatiable avarice: untill Cinna and Sertorius in the end set upon them as they slept in The Bardieilechery, and unfatiable avarice: until Cinna and Sertorius in the end set upon them as they hept in their Camp, and flew them every one. But in this extremity, as if all things had been reftored unto their Caprains their first estate, news came again from all parts to Rome, that Sylla having ended his War against for their cuel-King Mithridates, and recovered the Provinces which he had usurped, returned into ITALY with a tygreat power. This caused these evils and unspeakable miseries to cease a little, because the wicked doers of the same, looked they should have wars on their backs ere it were long. Whereupon Marius was chosen Consul the seventh time. He going out of his house openly the first day of January, being the beginning of the year, to take possession of his Consulship, caused one Sextus Lucinus to be thrown down headlong from the Rock TARPEIAN, which feemed to be a great fign and certain token of the evils and mileries that fell out afterwards the felf same year upon them for their faction, unto all the City befide. But Marius being fore broken with his former troubles, and his mind oppreffed with extream forrow and grief, could not now at this last time of need pluck up his heart to him again, when he came to think of this new War toward that threatned him, and of the dangers, griefs, and troubles he should enter into, more great and perillous then any he had passed before. For through the great experience he had in Wars, he trembled for fear when he began to think of it, confidering that he had to fight, not with Octavius, nor with Merula, Captains of a Company of Rebels gathered together: but with a noble Sylla, that had driven him out of ROME before, and that came now from driving the puissant King Misbridates, unto the furthest part of the Realm of Pont, and of the fea Euxinum. Thus, deeply weighing and confidering the fame, and specially when he looked back upon his long time of banishment, how vagabond like he wandred up and down in other Countries, and remembred the great misfortunes he had paffed, and the fundry dangers he fell so often into, being pursued still by fea and by land: it grieved him to the heart, and made him fo unquiet, that he could not fleep in the night, or if he flept, had fearfull dreams that troubled him, and still he thought he heard a voice buzunreasonable banquets, and to drink more then his years could bear, seeking to win sleep by this means, Device to win to avoid care the better. But at the length there came one from the Sea, that gave him certain intelligence of all : and that was an increase of a new fear unto him. And thus he being now extreamly troubled, partly for fear of the thing to come, and partly also for the over heavy burden of his prefent ill, there needed but little more aggravation, to fall into the difease whereof he died, which was a Pleurisie: as Possdonius the Philosopher writeth; who faith plainly, that he went into his Chamber when he was fick, and spake unto him about matters of his Ambassade, for the which he came to ROME. Yet another Hiftoriographer Cains Pifo writeth, that Marins walking one day after supper with his friends, fell in talk of his fortune from the beginning of his Life, telling them at large how often fortune had turned with and against him: concluding, that it is no wife mans part to trust her any more. tune nad turned with and against min: concluding, that it is no whe mans part to that first more. So when he had done, he took his leave of them, and laid him down upon his bed, where he lay fick Marias the farefeven days together, and on the feventh day died. Some write that his ambition appeared plainly, by a strangeraving that took him in his head during his sickness: for he thought that he made wars with Mithridates, and shewed in his bed all the gestures and movings of his body, as if he had been in a battle, crying the same cries out aloud, which he was wont to cry when he was in the extreamest fight, The desire he had to have taken this charge in hand against Mithridates, was so deeply settled in his mind through extream ambition and jealousie that polleft him, that being then threescore and ten year old, after he had been the first man that ever was chosen seven times Consul in Rome, and also after all this he died for forrow, lamenting his hard fortune, as it he had died before his time, and before that he had done and ended that which he had defired. But this was clean contrary unto that the wife Plato did, when he drew near to his death. For he gave God thanks for his fatal end and good fortune. First, for that he had made him a reasonable man, and no brute beast: secondly, a Greek, and no barbarous man: and furthermore, for that he was born in Secrates time. It is reported also, that one Aniquer of THARSIS, calling to mind a little before his death the good fortune he had in his life time, did not forget among other things, to tell of the happy Navigation he made, coming from his Countrey unto A-THENS: which did witness that he put upon the file of his good accounts for a fingular great grace, all favour fortune had shewed him, and that he kept it in perpetual memory, being the onely and most assured treasure a man can have, to keep those gifts that nature or fortune do bestow on him. But contrariwife unthankfull fools unto God and nature both, do forget with time the memory of their former benefits, and laying up nothing, nor keeping it in perpetual memory, are always void of goods and full of hope, gaping ftill for things to come, and leaving in the mean time the thing prefent, though reafon persuades them the contrary. For fortune may easily let them of the thing to come, but she cannot take that from them which is already past: and yet they utterly forget the certain benefit of fortune, as a thing nothing belonging unto them, and dream always of that which is uncertain. And fure it chanceth to them by great reason: for, having gathered outward goods together, and locking them up before they have built and laid a fure grounded foundation of reason through good Learning, they Note, that in cannot afterwards fill nor quench their unfatiable greedy coverous mind. THE LIFE OF LYSANDER.

Ann. Mund. 3546.

Ant. Christ. 203.

N the treasury of the ACANTHIANS, which is in the Temple of Apollo at DEL3 PHOS, there is this infcription: Brasidas, and the ACANTHIANS, with the spoil of the ATHENIANS. That inscription maketh many men think, that the image of stone that standeth within the chamber by the door thereof, is the image of Brafidas: howbeit in truth it is the lively image of Lyfander himself, Lyfanders made with a great bush of hair, and thick long Beard after the old ancient fashi- i mage. on. And where some say that the ARGIVES, after they were overcome and had loft a great battle, did all of them shave themselves in token and sign of common forrow: and that the LACEDAMONIANS on the other fide to flew the joy of their Victory, did let all their hairs grow, that is not true, no more then this is true which other do report of the BACCHIA-DES: who being flee from Corinth unto Lacedemon, the Lacedemonians found them fo ill favouredly difguifed and deformed, because their heads were all shaven, that thereupon they had a defire to let their hair and beards grow. For that was one of the Ordinances of Lycurgus, who faid, that Lycurgus the the long buth of hair maketh them that are naturally fair, the pleasanter to look upon: and upon those Authorosweatthat are ill favoured, more ugly and fearfull to fee to. And furthermore, it is faid that Ariffeelitists, the ing long hir. For they make no account of him that is not moved with the one nor the other, but take him to be of a base cowardly nature, that hath no manner of mind to do good. And therefore it is to be thought, that the ambition and froutness that was bred in Lyfander, proceeded of the LACONIAN discipline and education he had, and not so much of his own nature. But indeed of his own nature he was a right Courtier, and could tell how to entertain and flatter great States and Nobility, far better then the common manner of the natural Spartans: and moreover for his private benefit, he could eafily bear with the ftourness of greater men of Authority then hundelf, which some judge to be a great point of wisdom, to know how to deal in matters of State.

Aristotle in a place where he sauh, that the greatest with commonly are subject unto Melancholy (as Socrates, Plato, and Hercules were) writeth, that Lyfander in his latter age fell into the Melancholy difeafe, but not in his youth. He had also this singular gift above all other, that in his poverty he always kept that honelt modelty with him, as he would never be overcome nor corrupted with Lyfanter a deLyfanter a deGold nor Silver: and yet he filled his Countrey with riches and covetousness, which lost him the refigiter of tiches putation he had won, because himself made none account of riches nor getting. For, bringing ftore of Gold and Silver into his Countrey after he had overcome the ATHENIANS, he referved not unto himfelf one Drachma onely. And furthermore, when Dionysius the Tyran of Syracusa had on a time fent goodly rich Gowns out of Sicilia to his Daughters: he refused them, saying, that he was afraid such Gowns would make them sowler. Nevertheless, shortly after being sent Ambassador out of his Countrey to the same Tyrant, Dionysius having sent him two Gowns, praying him to choose which he would, to carry to his Daughter : he answered that she her self could best chuse which was the fitter, and so carried both with him. But now to come to his doings in warlike causes, the wars of Peloponnesus fell out marvellous long. For after the overthrow of the Army which the ATHENIANS had fent into SICILIA, when every man thought they had utterly loft all their force by Sea, and that by all conjecture they should soon after lose all by Land also: Alcibiades returning from his exile to deal again in matters of the

State, made an exceeding great change and alteration. For he fet the ATHENIANS affore again, and made them as ftrong by Sea as the LACEDAMONIANS: who thereupon began to quake for fear, and to look eitfoons for a fresh war, perceiving that they stood in need of a great power, and of a better Captain then ever they had before. Whereupon they made Lysander their Admiral, who arriving in the City of EPHESUS, found them very well affected towards him, and marvellous willing Lacedamonian and ready to take the Lacedemonians part : howbeit otherwise in very poor state, and ready almost to take up all the barbarous manners and fashions of the Persians, because they did continually frequent them, being envyroned round about with the Countrey of Lydia, where the King of Persia's Captains were ever refident. Wherefore having planted his Camp there, ha brought thither Merchants ships out of all parts, and set up an arsenal or store-house to build Gallies in : To that in short space, by oft recourse of Merchants that began to trade thither, he quickned their Havens, and fet up their staple again for the Trassick of Merchandize, and filled every private Artificers house with an honest trade to make them rich by, so that ever after it grew in continual hope to come unto that flourishing state and greatness, in the which we see it at this present. Furthermore, Lysunder being advertised that Cyrus, one of the great Kings of Persia's Sons, was come unto the City of Sardis, he went thither to speak with him, and to complain of Tifaphernes: who having commandment given him from the King to aid the LACEDEMONIANS, and to help to expulse the ATHENIANS, and to drive them from the sea, seemed to deal but coldly and faintly against them, for the favour he bare to Alcibiades. For, in furnishing the LACEDAMONIANS very scantly with money, he was the cause that all their Army by Sea went to wrack. Cyrus for his own part was very glad that he heard complaints of Tifaphernes, and that they spake against him: because he was an ill man, and the rather for that he had himself a little old grudge to him. Wherefore he loved Lyfander marvellous well, as well for the complaints he made of Tsfaphernes, as also for the pleasure he took in his company, because he was a man that could wonderfully please and delight Noble men: by which means having won the favour of this young Prince, he did perfuade, and also encourage him to follow this War. And when Lyfander was upon his departure to take his leave of him, Cyrus feafted him, and afterwards prayed him not to refuse the offer of his liberality: and that was, that he would freely ask him what he would, affuring him he should not be denied any thing. Whereunto Lyfander answered him. Sithence I see (Cyrus) you are so willing to pleasure us, I beseech you, and do also counsel you then to encrease the ordinary pay of our Mariners, one half peny a day: to the end that where now they have but three half pence, they may hence-Lyfandertook forth receive two pence a day. Cyrus was glad to hear Lyfanders bounty, and the encrease that money for pay he would make, and caused ten thousand Daricks to be delivered him : by mean whereof he added to of his fouldiers the ordinary pay of the Mariners, the increase of a half penya day. This liberality, within few days after emptied all their enemies Gallies of their men. For the most part of their Mariners and Galleymen went where they might have the best pay: and such as remained behind, became very dull, lazy, and feditious, daily troubling their Captains and Governours. Now though Lyfander had drawn his Enemies men from them by this policy, and had done them this great hurt, yet he durft not fight it out by Sea, fearing the worthiness of Alcibiades, who was a valiant man, and had greater flore of fhips than he had; and besides that, was never overcome by Land nor by Sea in any battle where he was General. So it chanced that Alcibiades went out of the Isle of Samos unto the City of PHOCEA, which standeth upon firm land directly over against SAMOS, and leaving the whole charge of his Fleet in his absence, with Antiochus his Pilot: he being more hardy then wise, in scorn and derision of Lyfander, went with two Galleys onely into the Haven of EPHESUS, and went by the Arfenal (where all their ships lay in Dock) with great noise and laughing. This put Lyfander in such a heat and chaie, that first of all he put a few Galleys to the Sea, and had him in chase with them. But afterwards, perceiving that the other Captains of the ATHENIANS came out one after another to the refeue, he armed other Galleys alfo: to that supplying still with a few on either side, at length they came to main battle, which Lyfander wan, and having taken fitteen of their Galleys, he fet up a token of triumph and victory. When the people of ATHENS heard the news of this overthrow, they were fo angry with Alcibiades, that they deposed him presently of his charge; and the joildiers also that lay in Camp in the Isle of Samos, began to millike him, and to speak ill of him. Whereupon he presently left his camp, and went into the Countrey of CHERRONESUS IN LIRRA-CIA. This battle was more spoken of then there was cause, by reason of Alcibiades reputation. Charter far Furthermore, Lyfander caufing the flourest and boldest men of every City, above the common fort Thracia. to come to EPHESUS unto him: laid their fecret foundations of great change and alteration, which he established afterwards in the governments of Cities. For he perswaded his private friends to make Tribes amongst themselves, to win them friends, and to practile to get the rule of their Cities into their hands: promifing them, that fo foon as the ATHENIANS were overthrown, they themfelves also should be delivered from subjection of their people, and every one of them should bear chief rule in their Countrey. And this he performed to them all, and made every one of them prove his words true : for he preferred all them that had been his old friends, unto the best offices and charges, not sparing to do against all right and reason: so that they were advanced by it. And for this cause every man came to take his part, and they all sought and desired to gratific and please him : hoping, that what great matter soever fell out, they might affure themselves that they should obtain it of him, when he came to have the Government in his own hands, And therefore they nothing rejoyced at Callicrat.das coming, who came to succeed him in the office of the Admiral: neither afterwards also, when they saw by experience that he was as honest and just a man as could be. Neither did they like his manner of governing, which was plain and without any Art or cunning. But they commended the perfection of his Vertue, as they would have done the image of some demi-god made after the old fashion, which had been of fingular Callieratidus beauty. But in the mean time, they wished for Lysander, as well for the tender love and good. Lysander, such will he bare to his friends and them, as also for the profit and commodity they got by him. So cellor in his will he bare to his triends and them, as also for the profit and commodify they got by film. So when Lyfarder took the Seas to return home again, all they that were in the Camp, were as for mirally, mirally, ry as could be possible, infomuch as the tears stood in their eyes; and he on the other side studied Poinness comto make them worse affected unto Callicratidas. For amongst many other things, he sent the rest mended for a of the money back again to SARDIS, which Grus had given him to pay the Mariners: faying, vertue, but of the money back again to sands), small the would have it, and find the means to en liked as an old that salieratidas should go himself to ask it, if he would have it, and find the means to en image of a god terrain his men. And lastly, when he was ready to imbark, he protested before all them that the shad been were prefent, that he did deliver, leave, and affign over the Army into his hands, command-excellent fair. ing all the Sea. But Callicratidas, to overcome his falle ambition, and foul boafting lie, answe- The spite of red him again and faid: If that be true thou fayeft, comethen and deliver me the Galleys in the Lylander to City of MILETUM, asthou goeft by, before the Ille of Samos: for fith thou commandeft all the Callieratides, Sea, we shall not need to fear our enemies that are in Samos. Lyfander thereto replyed, that the Army was no more at his commandment; and that he had the charge over them: and fo departed thence, taking his coursedirectly unto Peloponnesus, and leit Callicratidus in great perplexity: for he had brought no money out of his Countrey with him, neither could he compell the Cities to furnish him with any, seeing that they were at that time too much troubled already. Then had he no other way but to go to the Lieutenants of the King of Persia, to ask them money, as Lyfander had done. But he was the unmeeteft man for it that could be possible; for he was of a noble and liberal Nature, and thought it less dishonour and reproach unto the GRECI-ANS, to be overcome by the GRECIANS, then to go flatter the barbarous people, and feek to No:hing cthem that had Gold and Silver enough, but otherwise no goodness nor honefty. unreasonable banquets, and to drink more then his years could bear, seeking to win sleep by this means, to avoid care the better. But at the length there came one from the Sea, that gave him certain intelligence of all: and that was an increase of a new fear unto him. And thus he being now extreamly troubled, partly for fear of the thing to come, and partly also for the over heavy burden of his present ill, there needed but little more aggravation, to fall into the difease whereof he died, which was a Pleurisie; as Possdanius the Philosopher writeth; who saith plainly, that he went into his Chamber when he was fick, and spake unto him about matters of his Ambassade, for the which he came to ROME. Yet another Hiftoriographer Cains Pifo writeth, that Marins walking one day after supper with his friends, fell in talk of his fortune from the beginning of his Life, telling them at large how often fortune had turned with and against him: concluding, that it is no wife mans part to trust her any more. So when he had done, he took his leave of them, and laid him down upon his bed, where he lay fick so which he had using the feventh day died. Some write that his ambition appeared plainly, by a strangeraving that took him in his head during his sickness; for he thought that he made wars with Mishridates, and shewed in his bed all the gestures and movings of his body, as if he had been in a battle, crying the same cries out aloud, which he was wont to cry when he was in the extreamest fight, The desire he had to have taken this charge in hand against Mithridates, was so deeply seiled in his mind through extream ambition and jealousie that polleft him, that being then threescore and ten year old, after he had been the first man that ever was chosen seven times Consul in Rome, and also after

A note against that he had gotten a world of goods and riches together that might have sufficed many Kings: yet for all this he died for forrow, lamenting his hard fortune, as if he had died before his time, and before that he had done and ended that which he had defired. But this was clean contrary unto that the wife Plato did, when he drew near to his death. For he gave God thanks for his fatal end and good fortune. First, for that he had made him a reasonable man, and no brute beast: secondly, a Greek, and no barbarous man: and furthermore, for that he was born in Socrates time. It is reported also, that one Anispater of THARSIS, calling to mind a little before his death the good fortune he had in his life time, did not forget among other things, to tell of the happy Navigation he made, coming from his Countrey unto A-THENS: which did witness that he put upon the file of his good accounts for a fingular great grace, all favour fortune had shewed him, and that he kept it in perpetual memory, being the onely and most affured treasurea man can have, to keep those gifts that nature or fortune do bestow on him. But contrariwife unthankfull fools unto God and nature both, do forget with time the memory of their former benefits, and laying up nothing, nor keeping it in perpetual memory, are always void of goods and full of hope, gaping ftill for things to come, and leaving in the mean time the thing prefent, though reafon perswades them the contrary. For fortune may easily let them of the thing to come, but she cannot take that from them which is already past: and yet they utterly forget the certain benefit of fortune, as a thing nothing belonging unto them, and dream always of that which is uncertain. And fure itune, as a uning notining octoringing unto tuent, and uream always or that which is uncertain. N the treasury of the ACANTHIANS, which is in the Temple of Apollo at DEL-PHOS, there is this infcription: Brasidas, and the ACANTHIANS, with the spoil of the ATHENIANS. That inscription maketh many men think, that the image of stone that standeth within the chamber by the door thereof, is the image of Brasidas: howbeit in truth it is the lively image of Lysander himself, Lysanders made with a great bush of hair, and thick long Beard after the old ancient fashi-image. on. And where some say that the ARGIVES, after they were overcome and had loft a great battle, did all of them shave themselves in token and sign of common forrow; and that the LACEDAMONIANS on the other fide to flew the joy of their Victory, did let all their hairs grow, that is not true, no more then this is true which other do report of the BACCHIA-DES: Who being fled from CORINTH unto LACEDEMON, the LACEDEMONIANS found them fo ill favouredly difguised and deformed, because their heads were all shaven, that thereupon they had a defire to let their hair and beards grow. For that was one of the Ordinances of Lycurgus, who faid, that Lycurgus the the long bush of hair maketh them that are naturally fair, the pleasanter to look upon: and upon those Authorosweat; that are ill favoured, more ugly and fearfull to fee to. And furthermore, it is faid that Arifoclisus, the ing long hair. For they make no account of him that is not moved with the one nor the other, but take him to be of a base cowardly nature, that hath no manner of mind to do good. And therefore it is to be thought, that the ambition and stoutness that was bred in Lyfander, proceeded of the LACONIAN discipline and education he had, and not so much of his own nature. But indeed of his own nature he was a right Courtier, and could tell how to entertain and flatter great States and Nobility, far better then the common manner of the natural Spartans: and moreover Lifanders for his private benefit, he could eafily bear with the ftoutness of greater men of Authority then himself, which some judge to be a great point of wildom, to know how to deal in matters of State.

always kept that honest modesty with him, as he would never be overcome nor corrupted with Lyfander a de- Gold nor Silver : and yet he filled his Countrey with riches and coverousness, which lost him the reputation he had won, because himself made none account of riches nor getting. For, bringing store of Gold and Silver into his Countrey after he had overcome the ATHENIANS, he reserved not unto himself one Drachma onely. And furthermore, when Dionysius the Tyranz of SYRACUSA had on a time fent goodly rich Gowns out of SICILIA to his Daughters: he refuled them, faying, that he was afraid fuch Gowns would make them fowler. Nevertheless, shortly after being fent Ambassador out of his Countrey to the same Tyrant, Dionysius having sent him two Gowns, praying him to choose which he would, to carry to his Daughter : he answered that she her self could best chuse which was the fitter, and so carried both with him. But now to come to his doings in warlike causes, the wars of Peloponnesus fell out marvellous long. For after the overthrow of the Army which the Athenians had fent into Sicilia, when every man thought they had utterly loft all their force by Sea, and that by all conjecture they should soon after lose all by Land also: Alcibiades returning from his exile to deal again in matters of the State, made an exceeding great change and alteration. For he fet the ATHENIANS aflote again, and made them as strong by Sea as the LACED & MONIANS: who thereupon began to quake for fear, and to look eftsoons for a fresh war, perceiving that they stood in need of a great power, and of a better Captain then ever they had before. Whereupon they made Lyfander their Admiral, who miral for the arriving in the City of EPHE sus, found them very well affected towards him, and marvellous willing Lacedamonians and ready to take the LACEDEMONIANS part : howbeit otherwise in very poor state, and ready almost to take up all the barbarous manners and fashions of the Persians, because they did continually frequent them, being envyroned round about with the Countrey of Lydia, where the King of Persia's Captains were ever resident. Wherefore having planted his Camp there, ha brought thither Merchants ships out of all parts, and set up an arsenal or store-house to build Gallies in : To that in short space, by oft recourse of Merchants that began to trade thither, he quickned their Havens, and set up their staple again for the Traffick of Merchandize, and filled every private Artificers house with an honest trade to make them rich by, so that ever after it grew in continual hope to come unto that flourithing state and greatness, in the which we see it at this present. Furthermore, Lysander being advertised that Cyrus, one of the great Kings of PERSIA'S Sons, was come unto the City of SARDIS, he went thither to speak with him, and to complain of Tifaphernes: who having commandment given him from the King to aid the LACEDEMONIANS, and to help to expulse the ATHENIANS, and to drive them from the sea, seemed to deal but coldly and faintly against them, for the favour he bare to Alcibiades. For, in furnishing the LACEDAMONIANS very scantly with money, he was the cause that all their Army by Sea went to wrack. Cyrus for his own part was very glad that he heard complaints of Tifaphernes, and that they spake against him: because he was an ill man and the rather for that he had himself a little old grudge to him. Where-fore he loved Lyfander marvellous well, as well for the complaints he made of Tifaphernes, as also for the pleasure he took in his company, because he was a man that could wonderfully please and delight Noble men: by which means having won the favour of this young Prince, he did perswade, and also encourage him to follow this War. And when Lysander was upon his departure to take his leave of him, Cyrus feasted him, and afterwards prayed him not to refuse the offer of his liberality: and that was, that he would freely ask him what he would, affuring him he should not be denied any thing. Whereunto Lysander answered him. Sithence I see (Cyrus) you are so willing to pleasure us, I beseech you, and do also counsel you then to encrease the ordinary pay of our Mariners, one half peny a day : to the end that where now they have but three half pence, they may hence-Lyfandertook forth receive two pence a day. Cyrus was glad to hear Lyfanders bounty, and the encrease that money for pay he would make, and caused ten thousand Daricks to be delivered him : by mean whereof he added to of his fouldiers the ordinary pay of the Mariners, the increase of a half peny a day. This liberality, within few days after emptied all their enemies Gallies of their men. For the most part of their Mariners and Galleymen went where they might have the best pay: and such as remained behind, became very dull, lazy, and feditious, daily troubling their Captains and Governours. Now though Lysander had drawn his Enemies men from them by this policy, and had done them this great hurt, yet he durst not fight it out by Sea, fearing the worthiness of Alcibiades, who was a valiant man, and had greater store of ships than he had , and besides that, was never overcome by Land nor by Sea in any battle where he was General. So it chanced that Alcibiades went out of the Ille of SAMOS unto the City of PHOCEA, which standeth upon firm land directly over against Samos, and leaving the whole charge of his Fleet in his absence, with Antiochus his Pilot : he being more hardy then wise, in scorn and derision of Lyfander, went with two Galleys onely into the Haven of EPHESUS, and went by the Arfenal (where all their ships lay in Dock) with great noise and laughing. This put Lyfander in such a heat and chase, that first of all he put a sew Galleys to the Sea, and had him in chase with them. But asterwards, perceiving that the other Captains of the ATHENIANS came out one after another to the rescue, he armed other Galleys also: so that supplying still with a few on either side, at length they came to main battle, which Lysander wan, and having taken fifteen of their Galleys, he fet up a token of triumph and victory. When the people of ATHENS heard the news of this overthrow, they were so angry with Alcibiades, that they deposed him prefently of his charge; and the souldiers also that lay in Camp in the Isle of Samos, began to mislike him, and to speak ill of him, Whereupon he presently left his camp, and went into the Countrey of CHERRONESUS in THRA-

CIA. This battle was more spoken of then there was cause, by reason of Alcibiades reputation. Cherron fas e Furthermore, Lyfander causing the stoutest and boldest men of every City, above the common for Thracia. to come to Ephesus unto him: laid their fecret foundations of great change and alteration, which he established afterwards in the governments of Cities. For he perswaded his private friends to make Tribes amongst themselves, to win them friends, and to practife to get the rule of their Cities into their hands; promifing them, that fo foon as the ATHENIANS were overthrown, they themfelves also should be delivered from subjection of their people, and every one of them should bear chief rule in their Countrey. And this he performed to them all, and made every one of them prove his words true : for he preferred all them that had been his old friends, unto the best offices and charges, not sparing to do against all right and reason: so that they were advanced by it. And for this cause every man came to take his part, and they all fought and defired to gratific and please him : hoping, that what great matter soever fell out, they might affure themselves that they should obtain it of him, when he came to have the Government in his own hands, And therefore they nothing rejoyced at Callicratidas coming, who came to succeed him in the office of the Admiral: neither afterwards also, when they saw by experience that he was as honest and just a man as could be. Neither did they like his manner of governing, which was plain and without any Art or cunning. But they commended the perfection of his Vertue, as they would have done the image of some demi-god made after the old fashion, which had been of fingular Callicratidas beauty. But in the mean time, they wished for Lyfander, as well for the tender love and good- Lyfanders sucwill he bare to his friends and them, as also for the profit and commodity they got by him. But Callicratidas, to overcome his false ambition, and foul boasting lie, answer The spite of red him again and faid: If that be true thou fayeft, comethen and deliver me the Galleys in the Lyfander to City of MILETUM, asthou goeft by, before the Ille of Samos: for fith thou commandeft all the Callicratidat; Sea, we shall not need to fear our enemies that are in SAMOS. and specially unto the heads and Rulers of Cities, which long before had withed for his coming : because that by his means they hoped to make their authority greater, and altogether to take away the authority from the people. But they that loved plain dealing, and open magnanimity in the manners of a Governour and General, when they came to compare Lyfander with Callicra-Lyfander crafty eidas, they found that Lyfander had a fine fubtil head, and did more in wars with his policy and fuband deceitfull. tilty, then by any other means. And moreover that he efteemed justice, when it fell out profitable : and took profit, for juffice and honefty, not thinking that plain dealing was of better force then craft, but measuring the value of the one and the other, by the profit that came out of them, and mocking of them that faid, that the race of Hereules should not make wars with craft and subtilty. For, faid he, when the Lions skin will not ferve, we must help it with the case of a Fox. And hereunto agreeth that which they write he did in the City of MILETUM. For his friends and familiars to whom he had promited aid for destruction of the peoples authority, and to drive their enemies out of the City: they having changed their minds, and being reconciled unto their advertaries, he openly made great thew of gladnels, and feemed as though he would help to agree them together: but fecretly being alone, he took them up sharply, and told them that they were cowards to do it, and did procure them to the contrary, to fet upon the people. And then when he understood that there was commotion among them in the City, he ran thither suddenly as it were to appeale it. But when he was also come into the City, the first he met with of them that would alter the state of the Government, and take the Authority from the people, he fell out withall, and gave them rough words, commanding with extreamity that they should follow him, as though he would have done fome great punishment. And again, meeting with them of the contrary part, he willed them also that they should not be afraid, nor doubt that any man should do them hurt where he was. This was a wicked and malicious practife of him, to stay the chiefest of them that were most affected to the popular faction, to the end that afterwards he might put them all to death, as he did: for they that trufting to his words remained quiet in the City, were all put to death. Moreover, Androclidas touching this matter, hath left in writing that which Lyfander was wont to fay: by the which it appeareth, that he made very little reckoning garded no per-jury, following to be perjured. For he faid, that children should be deceived with the play of Kayles, and men the example of with Oaths of men, following therein Polycrates the Tyrant of Samos, but without reason: for he Paperater the was a lawfull Captain, and the other a violent usurper of Tyrannical power. Furthermore, it Tyrant of Sa was not done like attue LACONIAN, to behave himself towards the gods none otherwise, then towards men, but rather worfe, and more injuriously. For he that deceiveth his enemy, and breatowards men, but rather worfe, and more injuriously. For he that deceiveth his enemy, and breatowards men, but that he careth not for God. Cyrus Cynu liberali- therefore having tent for Lyfander to come to SARDIS to him, gave him money largely, and prory to Lylander, mifed him more; and because he would more honourably shew the good will he had to gratifie him, told him, that if the King his Father would give him nothing, yet he would give him of his own. And furthermore, when all other means failed to help him with money, that rather then he should lack, he would melt his own chair to make money of (which he fat in when he gave audience in matters of Justice) being altogether of Gold and Silver. And to be short, when he was going into Media to the King his Father, he gave Lyfander power to receive the Taxes and ordinary tributes of the Cities under his Government, and made him Lieutenant of all his Countrey. And laftly, bidding him farewell, prayed him that he would not give battle by Sea unto the A-THENIANS, untill he returned from the Court: and that before his coming again, he would have authority to levy a great number of ships, as well out of Phoenicia, as out of Cilicia. Wherefore whilst Gru was in his journey, Lyfander not being able to fight with his enemies with like number of ships, nor also to lie still and do nothing with so good a number of Gallies, went and scoured the Seas, where he took certain Islands, and robbed also ÆGINA and SALA-MINA. From thence he went and landed on the firm Land in the Countrey of ATTICA, and did his duty there unto Agu King of LACEDEMONIA, who came purpolely from the Fort of Decelea to the sea side to see him, because their Army by land also should see what power they had by fea, and how it ruled more by fea then they would. Nevertheless, being advertised that the Fleet of the ATHENIANS followed hard after him, he took another course to fly back again into ASIA by the Isles: and returning again, found all the Countrey of HELLES PONT without men of war. So he laid siege before the City of LAMPSACUS, and did affault it with his Gallies by fea : and Thorax being come thither also at the felf fame time in great haft, with his Army by land gave the affault on his side. Thus was the City taken by force, which Lyfander left to the spoil of the Souldiers. Now in the mean time the Fleet of the ATHENIANS (which was an hundred and fourtere fail) came to an Anchor before the City of ELBUNTE, in the Countrey of CHERRO-NESUS: and news being brought them that the City of LAMPSACUS was taken, they came with all speed possible unto the City of SESTOS, where getting fresh Cates and Victuals, they coafted all along the coast unto a certain place called the Goats River, directly over against the Fleet of their enemies, which lay yet at Anchor before the City of LAMPS ACUS. Now there was a Cap-Philades coacl tain of the ATHENIANS amongst other, called Philades, he that perswaded the ATHENIANS advice unto the to cut off the priloners Thumbs of their right hands that were taken in the Wars, to the end they should no more handle the Pike, but onely serve to pull the Oar. Both the one and the other rested that day, hoping to have battle without fail the next morning. But Lyfander having another meaning with him , commanded the Mafters and Mariners notwithftanding , that they

we bacile the next morning by break of day, because every and should keep themselves in order of battle, making no Lyfanders craste man should get noise at all, attending what he would command them : and further made the Army by land al- in marine fight fo to be ranged in battle ray, by the Sea fide. The next morning at Sun-rifing, the ATHENI-ANS began to row with all their Gallies fet in order of battle in a front. But Lyfander, though he had his ships in order to fight, the prores lying towards the enemies before day, rowed not for all that against them, but sending our Pinnaces unto the first Gallies, commanded them straightly that they should not stir at all, but keep themselves in order, making no noise, nor rowing against the Enemy. Though the ATHENIANS also were retired in the night, he would not give the Souldiers leave to come to land out of the Gallies, before he had fent first two or three Gallies to descry the Fleet of his Enemies: who brought him word that they had seen the ATHENIANS take Land. The next morning they did the like, the third day, and the fourth also all in one fort: fo that the ATHENIANS began to be bold of themselves, and to despise their enemies, imagining they lay thus close for fear of them, and durst not come forward. In the mean time, Alcibiades Alcibiades (who lay at that time in the Countrey of CHERRONESUS, in certain places which he had consquered) came riding to the Camp of the ATHENIANS, to tell the Captains and Generals of Country the Agree the creek that the country of the Captains of Captains and Captains of Capta the Army, the great faults they committed. First, for that they had cast Anchor, and kept their Athensisms. fhips in an open place, where there was no manner of fuccour, nor harbour to retire unto upon any ftorm: and worst of all, because that they were to fetch their victuals far off, at the City of SE-STOS, unto which Haven they should rather draw themselves, considering that they had but a little way to go, and also they should have the City to back them, which would furnish them with all things necessary: and beside that, they should be further off from their enemies, which were governed by one General onely that did command them all, and were so well trained that at a whiftle they were ready straight to execute his commandment. Alcibiades perswasions to these Captains of the ATHENIANS were not onely milliked, but furthermore there was one called Tydeus, that answered him very leudly: That he had nothing to do to command the Army, but other that had the charge of them. Alcibiades mistrusting thereby some treason, quietly went his way. The fifth day, the ATHENIANS having made the fame countenance to prefent battle unto their enemies, and retiring the same night as of custome, very negligently, and in ill order, as men that made no reckoning of their enemies: Lyfander fent again certain Galliots to descry them, commanding the Captains of the same, that when they perceived the ATHE-NIANS had left their Gallies and taken land, they should then return back with all possible speed they could, and being midway over the straights, that they should lift up a Copper Target into the air, upon the top of a Pike in the fore-deck, for a fign to make all the whole fleet to row in battle. Now Lyfander himself in the mean time went in person from Galley to Galley, perswading the fign of batand exhorting every Captain, that they should put their Galliots, Mariners, and souldiers in good tleby Sea. readiness, to the end that when the fign should be litted up, they should row with all their might in battle against the enemies. Wherefore, so soon as the Copper Target was set up in the air, and that Lysander had made his Trumpet found out of the Admiral, for a token to hale out into the fea: the Gallies immediately began to row for life in envy one of another, and the footmen that were upon the land, ran with speed also to the top of a high cliff near unto the sea, to see what would be the end of the fight, because the distance from one side to the other in that place was not fully two miles; which they had foon cut over, and in a little space, through the things in this danger, called fome by their names, others he intreated, and the rest he compelled to take their Gallies. But all his diligence was to no purpose, because the souldiers were wholly feattered here and there. For fo foon as they were fet aland out of their Gallies at their return, some went to buy provision, other went a walking in the Fields, some were set at Supper in their

Cabins, and other were laid down to fleep, nothing miftrufting that which happened to them, the mean time, the PELOPONNESIANS falling upon the other Gallies, took fome of them empty, and brake the others as the Souldiers began to come aboard upon them. And as for the men, some were slain by their ships as they ran unto them like naked men without weapon, and out of order, thinking to have faved themselves: other were killed in flying, because the enemies landed and had them in chase. And there were taken alive of them, three thousand prisoners with the Captains. Lyfander moreover took all the whole Fleet of their Ships, the holy Galley LAMPSACUS, having won a great victory with little labour, and had cut off in a small time, the long continuing and most divers war that ever was, and had brought forth so many sundry strange events of fortune, as are uncredible. For there had been infinite battles fought both by Sea and Land, and had altered many fundry times, and there was flain at that time moe Captains, then in all the other Wars of GREECE together: all determined, by the good wildom and conduction of one one that this great overthrow was given by the gods, and faid: That at the great overthrow was given by the gods, and faid: That at the out of the Haven of LAMPSACUS, to go fet upon the Fleet of the Enemies, they perceived over Lyfanders Galley the two fires which they call the Stars of Caffar and Pollux: the one on the one fide of the Galley, and the other on the other fide. They fay also, that the fall of the stone was a token, that did fignifie this great overthrow. For about that time (as many hold opinion) there fell A flore fellour our of the air a marvellous great flone, in the place they call the Goats River, which flone is feen yet unto this day, holden in great reverence by the inhabitants of the City of CHERRONESUS. It is faid also, that Anaxagoras did Prognosticate, that one of the bodies tied unto the vault of the Heaven, should be plucked; away, and should fall to the ground by a sliding and shaking that should happen. For he faid, that the Stars were not in their proper place where they were first created, considering that they were heavy bodies, and of the nature of ftone: howbeit that they did shine by reflection of the fire Elementary, and had been drawn up thither by force, where they were kept by the great violence of the circular motion of the Element, even at the beginning of the world they had been staid and let from falling down beneath, at that time when the separation was made of the cold and heavy bodies, from the other substance of the Universal World. There is another opinion of certain Philosophers, where there is more likelihood then in that. For they say, that those which we call falling Stars, be no fluxions nor derivations of the fire Elementary, which are put out in the air, in a manner fo foon as they be lighted; nor also an inflammation or combustion of any part of the air, which by overmuch quantity thereof doth spread upwards: but they are Celestial bodies, which by some slackness of strength, or falling from the ordinary course of Heaven, are thrown and cast down here beneath, not always in any part of the earth inhabited, but more ofter abroad in the great Ocean fea, which is the cause that we do not fee them. Notwithstanding, Anaxagoras words are confirmed by Damachus, who writeth in his book of Religion, that the space of three-Danachurellis from and fifteen years together, before that this ftone did fall, they saw a great lump of fire conmony of the fiery flone feen tinually in the air like a cloud inflamed, the which tarried not in any one place, but went and nery none teen came with divers broken removings, by the driving whereof there came out lightnings of fire that fell in many places, and gave light in falling, as the Stars do that fall. In the end, when this great body of fire fell in that part of the earth, the inhabitants of the Countrey, after that they were a little boldned from their fear and wonder, came to the place to fee what it was: and they found no manner of shew or appearance of fire: but onely a very great stone lying upon the ground, but nothing in comparison of the least part of that which the compass of this body of fire did shew, if we may fo name it. Sure herein, Damachus words had need of favourable hearers. But again if they be true, then he utterly confuteth their arguments, that maintain that it was a piece of a Rock, which the force of a boifterous wind did tear from the top of a mountain, and carried in the air, fo long as this whirlwind continued: but fo foon as that was down, and calm again, the stone fell immediately. Neither do we fay, that this lightning body, which appeared so many days in the Element, was very fire indeed, which comming to diffolve and to be put out, did beget this violent storm and boisterous wind in the Element, that had the force to tear the stone in funder, and to cast it down. Nevertheless, this matter requireth better discourse in some other Book then this. But now to our story. When the three thouland ATHENIANS that were taken prisoners at that overthrow, were condemned by the Council to be put to death : Lyjander calling Philocles, one of the Captains of the ATHENIANS, asked him what pain he would Philocles con- judge him worthy of, that gave the Citizens fo cruel and wicked Counfel. Philocles being nothing tain of the A- abalhed to fee himfelf in that mifery, answered him: Accuse not them that have no judge to hear their cause: but since the gods have given thee grace to be Conqueror, do with us, as we would have done with thee, if we had overcome thee. When he had faid so, he went to wash himself, and then put on a fair Cloak upon him, as if he would have gone to some feast: and went luftily the foremost man to execution, leading his Countreymen the way, as Theophrastus writeth. After this done, Lyfander with all his Fleet went by all the Cities of the fea coast, where he commanded fo many ATHENIANS as he found, that they should get them to ATHENS, letting them underftand that he would not pardon a man of them, but put them all to death as many as he found out of their City. And this he did of policy to bring them all within the precinct of the walls of ATHENS, because he might so much the sooner famish them for lack of victuals: for otherwise they would have troubled him fore, if they had had wherewithall to have maintained a long fiege. But in all the Cities as he passed by, if they were governed by the Authority of the People, or if that there were any other kind of Government, he left in every one of them a LACEDAMONI-AN Captain or Governour, with a Council of ten Officers, of them that had been before in league and amity with him: the which he did aswell in the Cities that had ever been confederates and friends unto the LACEDEMONIANS, as in them that not long before had been their enemies. So he went failing all along the coafts, fair and foitly making no bafte, stablishing in manner a general principality over all GREECE. For he did not make them Officers that were the Richeft, the Nobleft, or Honestest men, but such as were his friends, out of those Tribes which he had placed in every City: Liftenders cou- and to them he gave authority to punish, and reward such as they liked of, and would be present him felf in person to help them to put those to death whom they would execute, or otherwise expulse or banish their Countrey. But this gave the GRECIANS small hope of good or gracious governLYSANDER.

ment under the rule of the LACEDEMONIANS. Wherefore me thinks that Theopompus the Comi- Theopompus the call Poet doted, when he compared the LACED&MONIANS unto Taverners, faying, that they Comical pohad given the GRECIANS a tafte of the sweet Drink of Liberty, and that afterwards they had ensitying of mingled it with Vineger. For, the taffe they gave the GRECIAN's of their Government from the niant. beginning, was very sharp unto them: because Lyfander took the Rule and Authority of Government out of the Peoples hands, and gave it unto a few of the boldeft, and most fedicious men in every City. Thus having spent a great time in this Voyage, to make these alterations, he sent news before to LACEDEMON, that he was coming with two hundred Sail. He spake also with the Kings, Apli and Paufanias, in the Countrey of ATTICA, perfwading himself that he should win the City of ATHENS at the first affault. Bur when he saw that his expectation failed, and that the ATHENI-ANS did valiantly refift him, he returned once again with his Fleet into ASIA, where he made an end of changing and altering the manner of Government through every City in equall manner, ftablishing a Councell of ten Officers onely in every one of them, and putting every where many Citizens to death, and banishing many also. Among others, he drave all the SAMIANS out of their Countrey, and reftored again all them that had been banished before : and the City of SESTOS alfo, being yet in the ATHENIANS hands, he took it from them. And furthermore, he would not fuffer the naturall Sestians to dwell there, but drave them away, and gave their City, their Houfes and Lands, unto Ship-mafters, Officers of Galleys, and Galley-flaves, that had been in the Wars withhim. But therein the LACED EMONIANS were against him, and this was the first thing that they did forbid him : for they reftored the SESTIANS, against his will, unto their Lands and Goods again. But as the GRECIANS were very much offended, to fee the parts Lysander played : fo were they all very glad again, to fee these others which he afterwards did. For he restored the EGINE-TES again to their Lands and Houses, who had been put from them a long time. He restored also the MELIANS, and the SCIONEIANS to their Lands again, which the ATHENIANS had gotten from them, and drave out the ATHENIANS. Furthermore, Lyfander being advertised, that the Citizens and Inhabitants of ATHENS were pinched fore for lack of Victualls, he returned again, and came into the Haven of PIREA: by means whereof he kept the City fo straight, that he made them yeeld upon fuch Conditions as he himfelf would. Howbeit there are certain LACEDAMONI The Athenian ANS that fay, Lyfander wrote unto the Ephores: The City of ATHENS is taken: and that the & yield up Athens phori wrote again unto him : It is well that it is taken. But this is but a tale deviled to make the mat- to L. fander. ter feem better : for indeed the capitulations which the Ephori fent unto him, were these : The Lords of the Councell of LACEDEMON have thus decreed: That ye do raze the Fortification of the Haot the Counter of Lace Land over throw also the long Wall that joyneth the Haven to the City: The manner of perce offer. That ye yeeld up and redeliver all the Cities which ye do hold, and content your felves with your ed by the Lacelives and Countrey onely. This doing ye shall have peace, so that ye perform our demands. That demonians to ye shall receive those which are banished : and for the number of Ships, ye shall dispose of them as the Athenians, we shall will you. The Athenian's agreed upon the Articles contained in that Bill, sollowing the councell of Theramenes the Son of Agnon. Who when a young Orator called Cleomenes, did openly ask him in anger, if he were fo bold to dare to do, or fay, any thing contrary unto that which Themistocles had done before time, to affent unto the LACEDEMONIANS, that the Wall which he built in despight of them, should by their commandment now be razed : he answered him openly again : Young man, my friend, I do nothing contrary to Themistocles doings : for like as he heretofore did build the Wall, for the fafety and benefit of all the Citizens and People that were in ATHENS at that time : even so do we that are here now, for the self-same cause pluck it down and raze it. And if it be true that Walls do make Cities happy, then it must needs follow that the Anorable By-City of SPARTA which never had any Walls, should be the unfortunateit of all other. So Lyfan- ing for the der having received all the ATHENIANS Ships but twelve, and the Walls of the City alfo to use Wallsof Cities them at his pleasure : on the sixteenth day of March (on which day in old time the ATHENIANS had won the Battell by Sea, within the Straight of SALAMINA, against the King of PERSIA) he counselled them straight to change the form of their Government. The People could not brook that motion, and were marvellously offended withall. Whereupon Lysander sent to declare unto them, that they had broken the Articles of the Peace made between them, for that their Walls were yet flanding, the ten dates being expired in which they had promifed to overthrow them: and therefore that he would once again refer it to the determination of the Councell, how they should be used. that had broken the Articles and Covenants of the first Peace. Other fay, that immediately he referred it unto the deliberation of the Councell of their Confederates, that is to fay : whether they should altogether deftroy the City, and make the Inhabitants thereof Slaves and Bondmen, or no. In this Erlanding cru-Councell, it is reported that there was was a THEBAN called Eriambiu, whose opinion was, that they ell storic a should utterly raze the City, and make the Countrey a Defart : fo that it should never after serve for grinds the Aother thing, but for pafturage of Beafts. But during this diet and Councell, there was a Banquet theniana made, whereunto all the Captains and chief Officers of the Army being bidden, there was a Pho-CIAN, a Singer of Songs, that fang the entry of the Chorus to the Tragedy of Elettra, made by the Poet Europides, which began in this fort:

Electra noble Dame, and Daughter to a King, Even Agamemnon, King of Greece, whose fame so wide did ring : I come now to your Courts, which lye both wide and vaft. By spoil of Wars depopulate, destroyed and disgrast.

These words moved all the hearers with compatition, so that the most part of them thought it were The fweet ma too great a fin to destroy to noble a City, which brought forth to many famous wife men, and great persons. Wherefore Lyfander, when the ATHENIANS had infimited themselves altogether to his will, caufed all the Women-players of Pipes or Shalmes to come out of the City, and gathered all win, caused an time vyonici-prayers of rapes of spiannes to come out of their inftruments he made those together which he had in his own Camp allo, and with the found of their inftruments he made the Walls and Fortifications of the City of ATHENS to be pulled down to the very ground, and piry.

Lylander overfet all their Galleys on fire, and burnt them in the prefence of the Confederates of the LACEDAMO threw the walls NIANS, who danced and played in the mean feafon with Garlands of Flowers on their heads, in 10ken that that day was a beginning of their full and perfect liberty. Immediately after he changed also the flate of the Government, establishing a Councell of thirty Magistrates in the City, and other ten also in the Haven of Pirkes, having all equal and like authority: and therewithal made Callibia a Gentleman of SPARTA Captain of the Caffle there, and left a good Garrilon of the LACEDENO-NIANS with him. This Callibras one day life up his fraff he had in his hand to ffrike Autolycus with-Callibras Capallo all, a ftrong made man to wreftle: whereupon Kenophon the Philosopher made his Book in old time, called Convivium. But Autolycus that was a cunning wreftler, having all the fleights of wreftling, fuddenly tripped Callibins with his leg, and lifting him up at the arms end, caft him to the ground. Howbeit Lyfander was not angry with Autolycus for it, but reproved Callibras, relling him that he should have remembred (if he had been wife) that he had the government of freemen, and not of Bondmen. Notwithstanding, thorstly after the thirty Governours of the City, to strike Calibins, put this Auto-lycus to death. When Lyfander had done all these things, he took Sea again, and Went into the Countrey of Thracia, and lent by Gylippus before unto Sparta (who had been Captain and Generall of the SYRACUSIANS in SICILIA) all the Gold and Silver that was left in his hands, with all Money to spire the Prefents befides which had been privately given him, and with the Crowns also that had been pretaby Gilipur, fented him; which were marvellous in number, as it is to be thought, for that many came to prefent him, confidering the great power he had, and that in manner he was chief and fole Prince of all GRECE.

This Gylppus did rip the fearns of every bag in the bottom where the Money was, and took a good tims oyappus un tip me cams of every one and afterwards fewed them up again, not thinking that there had been fum out of every of them: and afterwards fewed them up again, bed part of the Money he car- a border upon every bag, upon the which was declared, the number and kinds of Gold and Silver that ried to Sparts. were therein. Now when he was come to Spart a, he hid the Money he had ftolne under the house were increase. From the many and delivered the bags he had brought into the hands of the Ephori, flewing them eavings, and went and delivered the bags he had brought into the hands of the Ephori, flewing them eavings, and went and derivered the bags in that a bought and the hands of the Ephors, intering them Lyjanders Seal, which he had let to every one of them. The Ephors having opened the bags, and told Lyjanders, found that the furn agreed not with the borders of the contents: and yet could not tell the Money, found that the furn agreed not with the borders of the contents: where the fault was. But a Servant of Gylippan told them in dark words, faying: that under the tiles where the tall was a state of the Coin of Gold of his Mafters house there lay a great number of Owls. Now the greatest part of the Coin of Gold and Silver which was currant through GREECE, was stamped with the mark of an Owl, by reason of the ATHENIANS. Thus Gylippus after to many noble exploits done in Wars, committing to fhamefull and vile a deed, was banished out of his Countrey of LACEDEMONIA. But the wifest men of Sparta, and of deepeft judgement, tearing the power of Gold and Silver, and feeing by proof of Gylippus doings, that it had fuch power to make one of their chiefest men fall through coverousness: they greatly blamed Ly/ander for bringing of it into LACEDEMON, befreeching the Ephori that they would fend all his Gold and Silver out of Sparta, as a plague, provocation; and wicked bait, to rupted Gripp would rend an ins your aim onver our of or a language, protocation, aim winks dain, we put, one of the make them do evil: declaring unto them, that they should use no other Money, but their own onely. pur, one or are make mention even a declaring onto them, man and determination of the Councell. Theopompus writeth, that Sciraphidu was he that did move the Councell of the Ephors in it. Howbeit Ephorus calleth him Phlogidat, who was the first that spake against it in the Councell, that they should not admit nor receive into the City of Sparta, any Money of Gold or Silver: but should onely content themselves with their own Countrey Iron Coyn, the which first of all, coming from the fire red hor, was quenched with Vineger, to the end they should be forged no more, nor imployed unto any other use. For it was fo eager and brittle by means of this temper, that they could no more convert it to any other purpole : and befide, it was very heavy and unhandsome to remove, confidering that a great heap and quantity of it, was but of fmall value. And it feemeth they did use of old time, certain little Iron Money, and in some places Copper Money, called Obelifci, from whence the small pieces of Money now extant are called Oboli, whereof fix made a Drachma, fo tearmed for that it was as much as the hand could gripe. Nevertheless, at the earnest suit of LyJanders friends that stood against it, and held hard with him, it was decreed in the Councell, that the Money should remain in the City, and ordained that it should be currant onely but for the affairs of the Commonwealth. And if it were found, that any private man did either lock up, or keep any Money, that he should suffer death for it : as if Lycurg w when he made his Laws, feared Gold or Silver, and not the coverousness and avarice which the Gold and Silver bringeth with it. The which was not taken away fo much, prohibiting private men to have it : as it was engendred onely by a toleration of getting it. For, the profit which they saw it brought withall, made it to be esteemed and desired. For it was unpossible they should despite a thing privately for unprofitable, which they saw reckoned of commonly, as a thing very necessary: and that they should think it would not serve their turn privately, feeing it to commonly effeemed and defired. But we are rather to think, that private mens manners are confirmed according to the common uses and customs of Cities, then that the faults and vices of private men do fill Cities and Commonweals with ill qualities. And it is more likely, that the parts are marred and corrupted with an infection of the whole, when it falleth out ill:

then that the parts corrupted should draw the whole to corruption. For to the contrary, the faults of a part destroyed, which might be prejudiciall unto the whole, are often times redressed and corrected by the other parts, whole and entire. But they that took this resolution in their Councell at that time, to have Money in the Commonwealth, made fear of punishment, and of the Law, to be the outward watchmen of Citizens houses, to keep that no Money should come into them. But all this while they made no inward provision, to keep the entry of their souls from all passion and greedy defires of Money : but to the contrary, they made them all to have a covetous defire to be rich, as if it were a great and honourable thing. But for that we have heretofore in other places reproved the LACEDEMONIANS. And moreover Lyfander caused a Statue of Brass to be made like himself of the spoil he had gotten of the Enemies, to set it up in the City of DELPHOS, and for every private Captain of the Galleys in like case, and the two Stars of Castor and Pollux in Gold besides, which vanished away a little before the Battell of Leuctres; and no man knew what became of them. A- A Galley of gain, in the Chamber of the Treasury of Brasidas, and of the ACANTHIANS, there was also a Galley Gold and Ivomade of Gold and Ivory, of two cubits long, which Cyrus fent unto him after the Victory he had won 14. by Sea of the ATHENIANS. And furthermore, Alexandrides the Historiographer born at DEL-PHOS, writeth, that the felf-same Lyfander had lest there to be kept safe, a Talent of Silver, two and fifty Mina's, and eleven pieces of Gold called Stateres. But all this accordeth not with that which all the other Historiographers write, agreeing of his poverty. But Lyfander being aloft then, and of greater power then ever any GRECIAN was before him, carried a greater port and countenance then became his ability. For as Daris writeth, he was the first of the GRECIANS unto whom they did ever erect any Lylanders ho-Altars, and offer Sacrifice unto as a god, and in honour of whom they did first fing any Hymnes: nours and pride and at this day there is yet good memory of one which began in this manner:

The noble Captains praise, we mean to celebrate Of Greece: that Land which is divine in every kind of state: Even he which was both born, and brought to high renown. Within the noble wealthy walls of Sparta stately Town,

The Samians by publick Decree ordained, that the Feafts of Juno, which were called in their City Hercea, should be called Lysandria. Lysander had ever one Charilus a Spart An Poet about him to write and fet forth all his doings in verle. Another Poet called Antilochia, one day made certain Verfes in his praise : which pleased him so well , that he gave him his hat full of Silver. There were two other Poets, Antimachin Colophonian, and Niceratin born at Heraclea, which did both write Verses to honour him, striving whether of them should do best. Lysander judged the Crown and Victory unto Niceratus: wherewith Antimachus was so angry, that he razed out all that he had written of him. But Plato who at that time was young, and loved Antimachus because he was an exPlato's saying cellent Poet, did comfort him, and told him that ignorance did blind the understanding of the ignoof the ignorant rant, as blindness doth the fight of the blind. Aristonus an excellent Player of the Cithern, and Ignorance one that had fix times wan the Prizes of the Pythian Games : to win Lyfanders layour, promifed compared with one that had its times want the prize of his Art again, he would cause himself to be proclaimed Ly binnens.

him, that if ever he wan the prize of his Art again, he would cause himself to be proclaimed Ly binnens.

Lysanders fanders shader. This ambition of Lysander was very odious and grievous, onely unto great persons, bition, pride, bition, pride and men of hiseftate : but besides his ambition, in the end he became very proud and cruell, through and cruely, the flatteries of his followers, and them that courted him: fo that he exceeded in recompencing his friends, as also in punishing of his enemies. For, to gratifie his triends and familiars, he gave them absolute power and authority of life and death in their Towns and Cities: and to pacific and appeale his anger where he once hated, there was no other way but death, without all possibility of parden. And that he plainly shewed afterwards in the City of MILETUM, where, fearing least they would flie that took part with the People, and because he would have them appear that hid themselves : he gave his word, and sware that he would do them no hurt at all. The poor men gave credit to his word: but so soon as they came out and did appear, he deliveved them all into the hands of their adversaries, (which were the chiefest of the Nobility) to put them all to death: and they were no less than Lylander brake eight hundred men one with another. He caused great murders of People also to be done in other oath, and pro-Cities: for he did not onely put them to death that had privately offended him, but numbers be-cuted the death fides, onely to fatisfie and revenge the private quarrels, enmitties and covetoulness of his friends, of eight hunwhom he had in every place. And therefore was Eteocles LACEDAMONIAN greatly commended dred People. for his faying: That GREECE could not abide two Lyfanders. Theophrastus writeth also, that the of Lyfander. very like was spoken of Alcibiades by Archestratus. Howbeit in Alcibiades there was nothing but his infolency and vain-glory that men milliked : but in Lysander, a severe nature, and sharp conditions, that made his power fearfull and intolerable. Nevertheless, the LACEDÆMONIANS passed over all other complaints exhibited against him, saving when they heard the complaints of Pharnabazus, who purposely sent Ambassadours unto them, to complain of the wrongs and injuries Lyfander had done him, spoyling and destroying the Countrey under his Government: then juries Lyfander had done him, fpoyling and destroying the Countrey under his Government; then the Epioni being offended with him, clapped up Thorax in prison, one of his friends and Cap death for of-death for oftains that had served under him and finding that he had both Gold and Silver in his House confending the trary to the Law, put him to death. And to himself they fent immediately that which they call Law. Scytala, (as who would fay, the scroll written upon a round staff) commanding him that he should return immediately upon receipt thereof. The Scytala is in this fort : When the Ephori do fend a Generall, or an Admirall to the Wars, they cause two little round staves to be made of the like bigness and length, of which the Ephori do keep the one, and the other they give to him whom they fend to the Wars. These two little staves they call Scytales. Now when they will advertife their Generall fecretly of matters of importance, they take a fcroll of parchment, long and narrow like a leather thong, and wreath it about the round fraff, leaving novoid space between the borders of the fcroll. Afterwards when they have bound them fast together, then they write upon the Parchment thus rolled what they will, and when they have done writing, unfold it and fend it to their Generall, who cannot elle possibly read it to know what is written (because the letters are not joyned together, nor follow in order, but are feattered here and there) until he take his little roll of wood which was given him at his departure: and then wreathing the feroll of parchment about it which he receiveth, the folding and wreaths of the parchment falling just into the felf-fame place as they were first folded, the letters also come to joyn one with another, as they ought to do. This little scroll of parchment also is called as the roll of wood, Scytala, even as we commonly fee in many places, that the thing measured, is also called by the name of the measure. When this parchment scroll was brought unto Lysander, who was then in the Countrey of HELLES PONT, he was marvelloufly troubled withall, fearing above all other things, the acculations of Pharnabazus: so he fought means to speak with him before he departed, hoping thereby to make his peace with him. When they were together, Lyfander prayed him he would write another Letter unto the Lords of Sparta, contrary to his first, how that he had done him no hurt at all, and that he had no cause to complain of him: but he did not remember that he was a Cretan (as the common Proverb faith) that could deceive another Cretan. For Pharnabazus having promifed him that he would perform his defire, wrote a Letter openly, purporting the effect of Lyfanders request: but behind he had another of contrary effect, so like on the outlide unto the other, that by fight no man could difcern the one from the other. And when he came to put to his Seal, he changed the first with the last that was hidden, and gave it him. When Lyfander carrie Lyfander came unto Sparta, he went as the manner is, straight to the Palace where the Senate eth Letters - kept, and gave his Letters unto the Ephores, thinking that by them he should have been cleared from gainst himself. all danger of the greatest accufations they could have burdened him withall: because that Pharnaba-Zus was very well thought on of the Lords of LACEDEMONIA, for that he did ever fhew himself willing and ready to help them in all their Wars, more then any other of the Kings Lieutenants of Persia. The Ephors having read this Letter, they shewed it unto him. Then did Lysander plainly fee, that the common Proverb was true:

LYSANDER.

That Ulysses was not subtill alone.

Lyfunder goes

Thereupon he went home to his house marvelloully troubled: but within few daies after returning to the Palace again to speak with the Lords of the Councell, he told them that he must needs make a voyage unto the Temple of Jupiter Anmon, to discharge certain Sacrifices, which he had vowed and promiled to him before he had won the Battells. Some fay, that indeed Tupiter Ammon appeared to him in a dream as he did befrege the City of the APHYTEIANS, in the Countrey of THRACIA, and that by his commandment he raifed the Siege, and charged them of the City, that they should thank Jupiter Ammon , and do Sacrifice unto him : by reason whereof they think that he meant good faith, when he fued for license to make this Voyage into Ly BIA, to perform the vows which he had made. But the most part did certainly beleeve, that he made fuit to go this journey, for a cloak and colour onely to absent himself, because he seared the Ephores, and that he could not indure the yoke and subjection which he must abide remaining at home, neither could like to be commanded. And this was the true caule of his fuit to go this voyage: much like unto a Horfe taken out of a fresh Pasture and goodly Meadows, to bring him into a stable, and make him to be journeyed as he was before. Nevertheless, Ephorus writeth another cause, the which I will recite hereafter. In the end, Lyfander having hardly obtained license, took Ship and hoised Sail: but during his absence, the Kings of LACEDEMON remembring that he kept all the Cities at his commandment, by means of the friends he had in every City, whom he had made chief Governours of the same, and that by their means he came in manner to be absolute Prince over all GREECE, they took upon them to redeliver the Government of the Towns and Cities again into the hands of the People, and also to pur down his friends whom he had stablished there. And hereupon fell our great insurrection again : for first of all, they that were banished from ATHENS, having surprised and taken the Castle of Phyla, upon the sudden did fet upon the thirty Governours Tyrants (whom Lyfander had placed there) and overcame them in Battell. Whereupon Lyfander straight returned to SPARTA, and perswaded the LACEDEMONI-ANS to refer the Government to the number of a few, and to punish the infolency of the People. So by his procurement, they fent first an hundred Talents unto the thirty Tyrants for an aid to maintain this War, and appointed Lyfander himself Generall. But the two Kings of Sparta envying him, and fearing left he should take the City of ATHENS again, they determined that one of them would go. Whereupon Paufanias went thither immediately, who in appearance feemed to maintain the Tyrants against the People : but in effect, he did his endeavour to appeale this War, for fear lest Lylander by means of his friends and followers should once again come to have the City of A-THENS in his power, the which he might easily do. And thus having agreed the ATHENIANS again one with another, and pacified all faction and commotion among them, he plucked up the root of Lyfanders ambition. But shortly after the ATHENIANS rebelling again against the La-CEDEMONIANS, Paufanias himself was reproved, because he yeelded so much to the boldness and insolency of the People, which were bridled and restrained before, by the Authority of the small number of the Governours : and to the contrary , they gave Lyfander the honour to be Generall, who ruled not in this rebellion to please mens minds and to content them, neither with fond oftentation of glory, but severely, for the profit and commodity of SPARTA. It is true, he.

would give great words, and was terrible to them that refifted him. As he answered the ARGIVES one day, who contended for their Confines with the LACEDEMONIANS, and feemed to alledge Lyfanders terthe best reasons. Even they (said he) that shall prove the stronger hereby (shewing them his Sword) rible words, shall be they that shall plead their cause best for their confines. Another time, when a MEGARIAN had told his mind boldly enough in open Councell, he answered him: Thy words (good friend) had need of a City, meaning thereby that he was of too mean a Town to use so great words. And to the BOEOTIANS also, who were in doubt to profess themselves friends or enemies : he sent unto them, to know if he should passthrough their Countrey with his Pikes upwards or downwards, And when the CORINTHIANS also were revolted from their alliance, he brought his Army hard unto their walls: but when he saw his men were afraid, and made courtesse whether they should go to the affault or not : by chance spying a Hare coming out of the Town-ditches, he said unto them : Are ye not ashamed to be asraid to go and assault your Enemies, that are so cowardly and slothfull, that Hares do keep their forms at ease within the circuit of their walls? Now King Agis being deceased, he left behind him his Brother Agesilaus, and his supposed Son Leorychides. Wherefore Lyfander that had loved Agefilam aforetime, gave him councell to fland for the right of the Crown. The death of as lawfull heir and next of the bloud, descending of the race of Hercules: because it was suspected king desir that Leorychides was Alcibiades Son, who secretly had kept Timaa Agis Wife, at what time he was Lislander depr. banished out of his Countrey, and came then to remain in Sparta. And Agis self also, conclu- weth Leosychiding by reckoning of the time of his absence, that his Wise could not be with child by him, made des of his no reckoning of Leotychides: (and had openly shewed it all the rest of his life time) that he did not Kingdom. acknowledge him for his Son, untill fuch time as falling fick of that dilease whereof he died, he was carried to the City of HEREA : and there lying in his death bed, at the humble fuit of Leotychides himself, and partly at the instant request of his friends, who were importunate with him, he did acknowledge Leotychides for his Son in the presence of divers, whom he prayed to be witnesses unto the Lords of LACEDEMON, of his acceptation and acknowledging of him to be his Son: which they all did in favour of Leotychides. For all that, Agefilaus took it upon bim, by the fupport and maintenance of Lysanders favour. Howbeit, Diopithes a wise man, and known to be skilfull in ancient Prophecies, did great hurt to Agesilaus side, by an ancient Oracle which he alledged against a defect Agefilans had, which was his lameness:

O Spartan People you, which bear high haughty hearts. And look aloft : take heed I fay, look well unto your Marts : Lest whiles you stand upright, and guide your State by grace. . Some halting Kingdom privily come creeping in apace. By that means might you move, great troubles, cark, and care, And mischiefs heap upon your head, before you be aware : . And plunged should you be, even over head and ears, With waste of Wars, which here on Earth doth perish many Peers.

Many by occasion of this Gracle, fell to take Leotychides part : but Lysander declared unto them. that Diopithes did not conftrue the meaning of the Oracle well. For God, faid he, cared not whether he halted of one leg or no, that should come to be King of LACEDEMON : but indeed, the Crown and Kingdom should halt and be lame, if bastards not lawfully begotten, should come to reign over the true naturall iffue and right line of Hercules. By these perswasions, Lysander with his great countenance and authority besides, wan all men to his opinion : so that Agesilam by this means, was proclaimed King of LACEDEMON. This done, Lysander began straight to counsell him to make Wars in ASIA, putting him in hope that he should destroy the Kingdom of Persia, and should come to be the great- Through Lyest man of the world. Moreover, he wrote unto his friends in the Cities of As 1 A, that they should fend fanders workunto the LACEDEMONIANS to require King Agestians for their Generall, to make wars against the ing, Agestians barbarous People. Which they did, and fent Ambaffadours purposely unto SPARTA to sue that they was made King might have him : the which was no less honour procured unto Agestlaus by Lifanders means, then that he did, in making him to be chosen King. But men ambitious by nature, being otherwise not unapt nor unfit to command, have this imperfection: that through the jealoufie of glory, they do common- Ambition abily envy their equals, the which doth greatly hinder them from doing any notable thing. For, they take deth no equall, them for their enemies, envying their vertue, whose service and means might help them to great matters. Thus Agefilam being chosen Generall of this Enterprize, took Lyfander with him in this Journey, among the thirty Counfellors which were given unto him to affift him : and made speciall choice of him, as by whole councell he hoped most to be governed, and to have him nearest about him, and his chiefest friend. But when they were arrived in ASIA, they of the Countrey having no acquaintance with Agefilaus, feldome spake with him, or but little : and to the contrary, having known Lyfander of long time, they followed him, and waited upon him to his Tent or Lodging , some to honour him , because they were his friends ; others for fear , because they did mistrust him. Even much like as it falleth out oftentimes in the Theaters, when they play Tragedies there, that he that shall play the person of some Messenger or Servant, shall be the best Player, and shall have the best voyce to be heard above all others : and to the contrary , that he which hath the Royall Band about his head, and the Scepter in his hand, a man doth feant hear him speak. Even so it fell out then : for all the Dignity due unto him that commanded all, was shewed onely to the Councellors : and there remained to the King no more, but the Royall Name onely of a King, without any Power. Therefore methinks that this undifcreet and importunate Kk 3 the Crown, faving two Families onely, the Eurytiontides, and the Agiades. The other Families, albeit they were all for nobility of bloud descended out of one self-house, yet had they no more right of the Kings of nor interest unto the Realm, then the residue of the People : for the Dignities that were attained unto by vertue, were given unto the Inhabitants that could deferve them. Lyfander then being one of those which was defeended of the true race of Hercules, who notwithstanding had no interest in the Crown: when he saw himself alost, and called to great honour through his samous acts and merits, and that he had won many friends, and great credit and authority by dealing in matters of the State : it grieved him much , to fee that they which were no nobler them himfelf , should be Kings it that City which he had increased by his vertue, and that he could not have so much power as to take from thele two Houses, the Eurytiontides and the Agiades, the Prerogative that the Kings should be chosen onely our of one of these two Houses, and to cast it upon the off-spring of Hercules. Some fay again, that he would not onely have enlarged that Prerogative unto the liftee of Herculus, but unto all the naturall Spartan's alfo: because that Hercules race should not onely defire this reward of honour, but even they also that followed his steps in vertue, which had made him equal with the gods in honour. For he doubted nor, but if they would dispose the Crown in this fort, that there was no man in the City of SPART A that should sooner be chosen King then himself: whereupon he attempted first to perswade his Citizens by very good reasons, and to bring this about the better, he conned an Oration without Book , penned by Cleon Halicarnaffens, made him for this purpose. But afterwards weighing with himself, that so great and strange a change as he would bring in , had need of fome better and stronger help : he began to frame a device, as they say , to move the People by , much after the manner they use in Tragedies, framing engines to bring some god to come down from Heavenunto them, and this was his reigned invention. He deviled certain Oracles and Prophecies, thin-Lifander dev king that all Cleons thetorick would fland him in no flead, if first of all he did not fill the Citizens feth file Ora-king that all Cleons thetorick would fland him in no flead, if first of all he did not fill the Citizens ces, and cor- hearts with fome superstition and fear of the gods, that he might bring them afterwards more easily unto reason. ambition of Lyfander, did well deserve reproof, even to make him to be contented onely with the fecond place of honour next unto the King. But for Agefilans again, through extream covetoul-nels and jealoutie of glory, to calt Lyfander altogether off, and to let fo light by his friend and Benefactor, that furely became not him neither. For first of all, Agesilaus never gave Lysander occasion to do any thing, neither did commit any matter of weight unto him, that might be honourable for him : but which is worft of all, if he perceived that he had taken any mens causes in hand, and that he did favourthem, he did alwaies fend them back again into their Countrey, denying their fuit, without that they could obtain any thing they fued for, lefs then the meanest persons that could without that they come obtain any times that, the and little, and taking from him all authority by have come, extinguishing Lyfanders credit by little and little, and taking from him all authority by this means. Wherefore, Lyfander perceiving how he was thus refused and rejected in all things, feeing that the countenance and favour which he thought to shew unto his friends, fell out hurtiull unto them: left off to folicite their matters any more, and prayed them to forbear to come unto himlelf, and specially those that honoured him. When they heard that, many defisted to trouble him any more in matters of importance, but not to do him all the honour they could, and continued ftill to accompany him, when he went out to walk, or otherwife to exercise himself: the which did aggravate and increase Agesilans anger more against him, for the envy he bare unto his glory. And where he gave very honourable charge and commission in the Wars, oftentimes unto very mean Souldiers to execute, or Cities to govern : he appointed Lyfander Surveyer generall of all the or-disary Provision of Victuals, and distributer of flesh. And then mocking the IONIANS that did honour him so much : Let them go now, said he, and honour my sless-distributer. Wherefore Ly-

Sander seeing it high time to speak, went unto Agesilaus, and told him in sew words after the LA-CONIAN manner: Truly Agefilaus, thou hast learned well to abase thy friends. Indeed, said he again, so have I, when they will be greater then my selt : 'and to the contrary, they that maintain and increase my Honour and Authority, it is reason that I esteem of them. Yea marry, said Lyfander, but perhaps I have not done as thou fayeft, yet I pray thee give me fuch an Office, as I may be least hated, and most profitable for thee : though it be but in respect of strangers eyes that look upon us both. After this talk between them, Agesstans sent him his Lieutenant into the Countrey of HELLES PONT, where Lyfander still kept this anger secret in his heart against him, but for all that, did not leave to do all that he could for the benefit of his Mafters affairs. As amongst many other things, he caused a PERSIAN Captain called Spiebridates, to rebell against his Master, who was a valiant man of his hands, and a great Enemy of Pharmabazus, and had an Army allo, which he brought with him unto Agefilans. Now concerning this War, this was all that he did in that Jourment of the City of SPARTA: by reason whereof, he determined to put that in practice, which he had long time thought upon concerning the alteration of Government, and his enterprize was this:

Amongst the off-spring and Issue of Hercules, who were mingled with the DORIANS, and returned again into the Country of Peloponnesus, the greatest number and chiefest of them, dwelled in the City of SPARTA: howbeit all they that came of that race had no right of succession to

Wherefore he returned again to SPARTA not long after, with little honour, being marvel-he being rejected by them both, went lastly unto the Temple of Jupiter Ammon : and that there he spake unto the Priests, and offered them great store of Money for the same purpose. But they were so offended with Lylander, that they fent men of purpose to SPARTA, to accuse him, that he would have corrupted them with Money. The Councell clearing Lyfander of this accufation, the Lybians his accusers at their departing said: We will one day judge more justly, then you my Lords of LACE-DEMON have done now, when you shall come to dwell in our Countrey of LYBIA: supposing there was an ancient Prophecy that faid, the LACEDEMONIANS one day should come to dwell in the Countrey of Ly BIA. But we shall do better to write the whole Story at large of this practife, subtilty, and malicious device, which was no matter of small importance, nor lightly grounded: but as in a Mathematicall Proposition, there were many great conjectures and presuppositions, and many long circumstances to bring it to conclusion, the which I will dilate from point to point, delivering that which an Hiftoriographer and Philosopher both hath written. There was in the Marches of the Lysaders Realm of Pont, a woman that faid, she was gotten with child by Apollo, the which many (as it is feigned device to be thought) would not beleeve at all, and many also did beleeve it : so that she being delivered of a to possess the goodly Son, divers Noblemen and of great estate were carefull to bring him up, and to have him Kingdom. raught. This child I know not whereupon, nor how, was named Silenus: and Lyfander fetching the plot of his device from thence, added to all the rest of himself, to go on with his practice. Now he had many (and they no small men) that made his way to frame this jest, giving out a rumour of the birth of this child, without any suspicion gathered out of the intent of this rumour. And furthermore, they brought other news from DELPHOS, which they dispersed abroad through the City of Spar-TA, to wit, that the Priests of the Temple kept secret books of very ancient Oracles, which they themfelves durst not touch nor handle, neither might any man read them, unless he were begotten of the feed of Apollo, who should come after a long time, and make his birth appear unto the Priests that kept these Papers, and that by some secret mark and token, which they had amongst them: and thereby being known for Apollo's Son, he might then take the Books and read the ancient Revelations and Prophecies of the same. These things prepared in this fort, there was order taken, that Silenus should come and ask for these Books, as though he were the Son of Apollo : and that the Priests which were privy to this practice, should make as though they did diligently examine him of every thing, and how he was born. And that at the length, after they had seemed to know all, they should deliver these Prophecies unto him, as if he had been indeed Apollo's Son: and that he should openly read them in the presence of many witnesses. And among the rest of the Prophecies : that he should read that specially, for the which this long paltry seigned drift was framed, touching the Kingdom of LACEDEMONIA: that it was better, and meetlier for the SPARTANS they should choose them for their Kings, whom they found the meetest men of all their Magistrates. But when Silenus was come to full age, and brought into GREECE of purpose to perform this practice, all the mystery was marred by the faint heart of one of the players and companions of Lyfander, who holp him to countenance this device : who when the matter should have taken effect, shrunk for sear, and let the mystery alone. This notwithstanding, nothing was betrayed in Lyfanders life time, till after his death. For he died before King Agefilans returned out of ASIA, being fallen into Wars with BOEOTIA The Wars of before his death, or rather having himself made GREECE to fall into Wars. They do report it Bastia. either way : and some lay the fault upon him, other upon the THEBANS, and other upon them both: and they burthen the THEBANS withall, because they did utterly overthrow the common Sacrifices which Agesilaus made in the City of Aulide. And they say alio, that Androclides and Amphitheus did raile this War among the GRECIANS, being before corrupted with Money by the King of Divers causes PERSIA, to bring Wars upon the LACEDEMONIANS in GREECE: and began to invade and furmifed of the deftroy the Countrey of the Phocians. Other fay, that Lyfander was very angry with the The thefe Wars. BANS, because they onely of all other their consederates, did ask the tenth part of all the spoil which was won in the War against the ATHENIANS : and that they were not pleased that Lysander had fent the Money away unto SPARTA. But above all , Lyfander did malice them most , because they were the first that made way for the ATHENIANS to be delivered from the oppression of thirty Tyrants, whom he had stablished Governours in ATHENS, and in whose favour (to make them to be dreaded the more) the LACEDEMONIANS had ordained by a common Edict, that they that An Edict abe dreaded the more) the LACEDEMONIANS mad organized by a common funct, that they that were banifhed, and did flee from Athens, might lawfully be taken and apprehended in what place a might demonstrate the might be a might be a might lawfully be taken and apprehended in what place a might demonstrate the might be a might be a might be taken and apprehended in what place a might be a might be taken and apprehended in what place a might be taken and apprehended in what place a might be a might be taken and apprehended in what place and the might be a might be taken and apprehended in what place a might be a might be taken and apprehended in what place a might be a foever they fled unto; and that who foever should refift or lett them to do it, they should be proclaifrom Athens, med Rebels, and open Enemies unto the LACEDEMONIANS. Again, to contrary this Edict, the THEBANS made another very like, and meet for the glorious deeds of Bacchus and Hercules their Ant dict made Ancestors, for whom it was made: that every House and City through the Countrey of BOEOTIA, by the Thebans should be open for the ATHENIANS that would come thither; and that he than would not help a in favour of banished man from ATHENIA against him that would take him away by force thould be food and the banished banished man from ATHENS, against him that would take him away by force, should be fined and men, amerced at a talent. And also if there were any Souldiers that went unto ATHENS, through the Countrey of BOEOTIA, that the THERANS should not see nor hear it. This was no dissimulation to speak of, that they should ordain things with so gentle words, and so meet for the People of GREECE, and then that the deeds should not answer unto their Edicts and Proclamations. For Thrasybulus, and his fellows of the Conspiracy, who kept the Castle of Phyla, they departed from THEBES, with Armour and Money, and the THEBANS did help them to begin and practice their enterprise so secretly, that it was not discovered. These were the causes why Lyfanders was so earnestly bent against the Thebans, and his choler being so extream, by reason of his melancholiness that grew daily upon him more and more through his age, he folicited the Ephores so, that he persua-Lysanders Jour ded them to fend a Garrison thither: and himself taking the charge of them, undertook the Journey Lypanarry jour act them to have a Carterion times a summary from King Paufanias also with an Army thither, who was ney unto Bat- ftraight with his men. But afterwards they fent King Paufanias also with an Army thither, who was to fetch a great compais about to enter into the Countrey of BOEOTIA, by Mount Citheron : and Citharon Mont. Lyfander should go to meet him through the Countrey of Phocides, with a great Company of Souldiers besides. Now as Lyfander went, he took the City of the ORCHOMENIANS, who willingly yeelded themselves to him as soon as he came thither. From thence he went to the City of LEBADIA, which he spoyled: and from thence he wrote unto King Pausanias, that departing from PLATES, he should march directly to the City of ALIARTE, where he should not fail to meet him the next morning by break of day at the Town Walls. These Letters were intercepted by certain Scours of the THEBANS, who met with the Messenger that carried them. Thus the THEBANS having intelligence of their purpose, left their City in custodyunto the ATHENIANS who were come to aid them, and departed out of THEBES about midnight, and marched all night with great fpeed, that they came to ALIARTE in the morning a little betore Lyfander, and put half their men into the City. Now for Lyfander, he was determined at the first to keep his men upon a hill which is near to the City, and there to tarry the coming of King Paufanias. But afterwards when he faw that the day was far spent, and that he came not, he could tarry no longer, but arming himself, after he had made an Oration unto the Confederates which he had brought with him, he marched on with his men in Battell ray, longer then large, by the high way that went unto the City. In the mean feafon, the THEBANS that were leit without the City, leaving ALIARTE on the left hand, did fet upon Lyand I REBANS that were her wanted the Fountain called Ciffusa: where the Poets seign that the fanders Rereward of his Army against the Fountain called Ciffusa: Nurles of Bacchus did wath him, when he came out of his Mothers womb, because the water that cometh out of it (though it be very clear and fweet to drink) hath notwithstanding (I cannot tell by what means) a colour like wine: and not far from thence there grow great-plenty of Styrap-trees, The which the ALIARTIANS do alledge, to prove that Radamanthus heretolore dwelt in that part, and do flew his Sepulcher there yet to this day, which they call Alea. And hard by that also, there and no new in Separation interfer to the man, which was buried (as they fay) in that place, and was married to Radamanthus, after the death of Amphirryon. But the TheBANS who were within the City with the A-LIARTIANS, stirred not until they saw that Lyfander with the first of his Troup was near unto Lyfander stein the Town Walls: and then opening the Gates on the sudden, they made a Salley out upon Lyfander, by the Thaban and slew him with his Soothfayer and a few other, because the most part of the Vaward fled into the Areagth of the Battell. Howbeit the Thebans gave them not over so, but sollowed them so valiantly, that they brake their order, and made them all flie through the Mountains, after they had flain three thousand of them in the Field : so were there three hundred THE BANS also slain there, who followed their Enemies so fiercely, till they recovered straight narrow waies, of great strength for them.

These three hundred were in manner all those that were suspected in These to favour the LACS. DEMONIANS fecretly: wherefore, for the defire they had to take away this opinion from their Citizens, they hazarded themselves to no purpose, and were cast away in this chase. King Pausanias heard news of this overthrow, going from PLATES unto THESPIES, and went on further, marching still in Battell ray towards ALIARTE, where Thrasybulus also arrived at the self-same time, bringing the aid of the ATHENIANS from THEBES. And when Paufanias was purposed to send to ask license of the Enemies to take away the bodies of their men which they had slain, to the intent to bury them: the old Spartans that were in his Army, milliking it much, at the first were angry in themselves. But afterwards they went unto the King himself, to tell him that he dishonoured Spag-TA, to offer to take up Lysanders body by his Enemies leave and favour, and that he should valiantly recover him by force of Arms, and honourably bury him, after that he had overcome their Enemies: or elseif it were their fortune to be overthrown, that yet it should be more honourable for them to lie dead in the Field by their Captain, then to ask leave to take up his body. But notwithflanding all theic words of the old men, King Panfanias feeing that it was a hard matter to overcome the THE-BANS in Battell, now that they had gotten the Victory, and furthermore, that the body of Lyfander lay hard by the walls of ALIARTE, and that he could not come to take it away without great danger, although they should win the Battell : he fent a Herauld to the Enemies, and having made truce for certain daies, he led his Armyaway, and took up Lyfanders body with him, and buried him after they were out of the confines of BOEOTIA, within the Territory of the PANOPEIANS : where untill this day his Tomb remaineth upon the high way, going from DELPHOS unto the City of CHE-RONEA. Thus Paufanias Camp being lodged there, it is faid there was a PHOCIAN, who reporting the Battell unto one that was not there, faid that the Enemies came to give a Charge upon them, as Lyfander had passed the Oplites. The other wondring at that, there was a SPARTAN a very friend of Lyfanders by, having heard all their talk, asked him what that was which he called Oplites: for that he had not heard that word named before. What ? answered the PHOCIAN to him again, Even there it was where the Enemies did overthrow the first of our men which were slain in the Fields: for the River that runneth by the walls of the City, is called Oplites. The Spartan hearing that, burft our in weeping for forrow, faying: Then | fee it is unpossible for a man to avoid his deftiny. For Deltiny inevi- Lyfander aforetime had an Oracle that told him thus:

Lyfander, take good heed, come not I thee advise, Near Oplites that Rivers banks, in any kind of wife. Nor near the Dragon he, which is the Earth her Son Who at the length will thee affault, and on thy back will run.

How-

Howbeit some take it, that this River of Oplites is not that which passeth by the Walls of ALIARTE, but it is the River that runneth near unto the City of CHOERONEA, and falleth into the River of Philarus ft. Phliarus, hard by the City; and they say that in old time it was called Hoplia, but now they call it Isomantus. He that siew Lyfander, was an Allartian called Neochorus, who carried a Dragon Neochorus slew painted upon his Target: and this was that which the Oracle of likelihood did signifie. They say Lyfander. alfo, that in the time of the Wars of PELOPONNESUS, the THEBANS had an Oracle from the Temple of Apollo Ismenias: which Oracle did prophetic the Battell which they wan, by the Castle of DELIUM, and the Battell of ALIABTE alfo, which was thirty years after that. The effect of that Oracle was this:

When thou thy nets frak fpread, the metues for to intrap. Boware thou come not near unto a little hill by bay, Of Orchalide. Nor near to any his confines: For there the crafty foxes keep, their dens and privy mines.

He called the Territory that is about DELIUM, the uttermost confines, because BOROTIA doth Orchalid: Mont confine there with the Countrey of ATTICA, and the hill Orchalide which is now called Alopecon (to fay the Fox den) which lieth on that fide of the City of ALIARTE, that looketh towards Mount Helicon. Liviander being flain, the SPARTANS took his death fo ill, that they would have Helicon Monsi Mount selector. If you was being in any Law: who durft not abide the trial, but fled upto the City Paulanias exile of Free 19, where he ended the reft of his life within the fanctuary of the Temple of Minerus. When Life and the reft of his life within the fanctuary of the Temple of Minerus. When Life and the cold and his Vertue far more famous; then when he lived. For when they saw; that for all the Gold and Silver which find passed through his hands; for all his great Authority and countenance that he had carried, and for all that he made and for any Cities and Towns did come to honour him: and briefly, for all that he had had so great and deafter his puffant a kingdom in manner in his hands: yet he did never in rich nor increase his House with bothe with better the first hands: puissant a Kingdom in manner in his hands: yet he did never inrich nor increase his House with so death. much as one farthing. So writeth This perpus, whom we should rather believe when he praiseth, then when he discommended: for commonly he taketh more delight to dispraise, then to praise any. It fortuned not long after, as Ephorus writeth, that the LACEDEMONIANS and their Confederates fell at variance together, whereupon Lyfanders Letters were to be feen that were in his House. King Agessiaus going thither to peruse them, amongst other Writings, found the Oration penned by Lysanderscoun-Cleon Halicarnassen, which Lysander had prepared to persuade the Spartans to change their fell son attended. Government, and to declare unto them that they should revoke the Prerogative which the Eurytion-dom, tides and the Agiades had : that the Kings of SPARTA could not be chosen but out of those two Families, and to leave the Prerogative at liberty, that the chiefelt Magistrates might be lawfully chosen Kings of SPARTA. Agefilaus stood indifferent to have shewed this Oration openly to the People, Lacratidas wifthat the SPARTANS might fee what manner a Citizen Lysander had been in his heart. But La-dom, forbearcratidas, a grave wife man, and Prefident at that time of the Councell of the Ephori, would not fuffer him: faying, that he should not dig Lysander out of his grave again, but rather bury his Oration the dead with him, that was so passingly well and eloquently penned to perswade. Yet notwithstanding, they Lysander hodid him great honour after his death : amongst others, condemned two Citizens in a great sum of noured by the Money, that were made fure to two of his Daughters while he lived, and refused to marry them when his death. he was dead, feeing their Father died fo poor : because they fought to match in his House, supposing singleness of he had been rich, and for look them afterwards for their Fathers poverty, when they faw he died a good life, late marriand just man. Thus we see, that at SPARTA there was a punishment for them that did not marry, or age, and ill that married too late, or that married ill: and unto this puralhment were they most subject that fought nished by the great Matches for covetoulnels of Goods. This is all we have to write of Lyfanders Life and Acts.

Ucius Cornelius Sylla was of the race of the Patricians, who be the Noblemen and Gentlemen of ROME: and there was one of his Ancestors called Rufinus, that obtained the Dignity of Confull. He notwithstanding his Confulthip, wan more difhonour by defame, then he obtained honour by Dignity of Confull. For they finding in his house above ten pounds worth of Plate, contrary to the Law at that time expresly forbidding it; he was expulsed the Senate, and loft his place there, after which difhonour once received, his Islue never role, on yet recovered it. And Sylla himfelf had very little left him by his Father:

fo that in his youth he was fain to hire another mans house, and fate at a small rent, as afterwards he was twitted in the teeth withall, when they faw him richer then they thought he had deferved. For when he gloried and boafted of the Victory at his return from the Wars of Africk, there was a Nobleman that faid unto him : Why, how is it possible thou shouldest be an honest man, that having nothing left thee by thy Father, thou art now come to have so much? Now, though ROME had left her ancient juftice and pureness of life, wherewith the brought up her People in former times, and that their hearts were poyloned with covetous defire of vain fuperfluous delights: yet notwithftanding it was a foul reproach to them that did not maintain themselves in the poverty of their Fathers, as unto them that did confume their Patrimony, and bring all to naught which their Parents had left them. But afterwards also when he carried the whole sway in Rome, and that he had put so many men to death: a Freeman being born of the Slaves infranchifed, and being ready to be thrown down the rock Tarpeian, because he had saved and hidden one of the outlaws and men proclaimed to be put to death wherefoever they were found, cast it in Sylla's teeth, how that they had lived and dwelt together a long time in one felf-house, he having payed a thousand Nummo's for the rent of the uppermost rooms of the fame house, and Sylla three thousand for all the neathermost rooms. So that between both their wealths, there was but onely two thousand and fifty Drachma's of ATHENS difference. And this is that we find in writing of his first wealth. As for his stature and person, that appeareth sufficiently by the Statues and Images that were made for him which yet remain. Eut for his eyes, they were like fire, and wonderfull red : and the colour of his face withall, made them the more fearfull to behold. For he was copper-nofed, and that was full of white streaks here and there : whereupon they say that the Surname of Sylla was given him, by reason of his colour. And there was a Jefter at ATHENS that meth red when finely mocked him in his Verse: Sylla to like a black-berry sprinkled with meal.

It is not amils to fearch out the naturall disposition of this man by such outward marks and tokens, It is faid also, that he was so naturally given to mock and jeft, that being a young man unknown, he would never be out of the company of Players, Fools, and Tumblers, but still eating and tippar ple colour. ling with them in diffolute manner. And afterwards also when he was in his chiefest Authority, he would commonly eat and drink with the most impudent jefters and scoffers, and all such rake-hells. and made profession of counterfeit mirth, and would fixive with the baddest of them to give the finest states foot. mocks : wherein he did not onely a thing uncomely for his years, and dishonoured the Majesty of his hang. Office and Dignity, but thereby also grew careless and negligent in matters of great importance. whereunto he should have taken good regard. For after he was once set at his Table, he was not to be moved any more in matters of weight. Now, though from the Table he was commonly found both very active, painfull, and fevere; yes falling into fuch company, by drinking, bowling, and making good cheer, he fuddenly became another manner of man. So that without all compass of modefly and judgement, he was too familiar and conversant with players, jefters, tumblers, and dancers : who when they had him in that vein, might do what they would with him. Of this rioting came (in s. Ma's rolupmine opinion) his vice of lechery, whereunto hewas greatly given, and eafily drawn after love and mondards. pleasure, in such fort, as his gray hairs could not restrain his voluptuous life. His unlawfull lusting love began in his young years, with one Metrobiu a common player, which stretched on increasing his amorous desire until his latter age. For at the first he loved Nicopolis a rich Curtizen : and frequenting her company by oft access, beside that he spent the prime of his beauty and youth in feasting her with great delight and passing pleasure, she afterwards became in love with him, fo that when the died, the made Sylla her Heir of all the had. He was Heir also unto his Mother-in-law , who loved him as her own begotten Son : and by these two good haps he was stept up to prety wealth. Afterwards being chosen Quaftor (to fay Treasurer) the first time that Marin was Consull, he imbarked with him in his Journey into Africk, to war with King Ingurib. When he was arrived at the Camp, he shewed himself a man of great service in all other things, but in this especially, that he could wifely use the benefit of any occasion offered him, and thereby wan Bocchus King of the NUMIDIAN'S to be his fast and faithfull friend : whose Ambassadours, that scaped from a company of Nuntition thieves, he courteoully entertained, and having given them goodly Prefents, sent them back again with a fafe Convoy. Now concerning King Bocchus, he had The cause of goodly Preferres, with fitten out a grant of long time both hated and feared King Jugarth his Son-in-law: informuch, that after he was over-flip unto Syllas come in Battell, and came to him for fuccour, Bocchus practifed Treason against him, and for this cause sent secretly for, Sylla, desiring rather that Jugarth should be taken by Sylla, then by himself, Sylla brake this matter unto Marine, of whom having received a small number of Souldiers to accompany him (without respect of perill or danger) went and committed himself to the faith and fidelity of one barbarous King, to take another : confidering also that the King whom he trufted. was so unjust of his word, even unto his nearest friends and consederates. Now Bocchus having Jugurib and Sylla both in his power, and brought himself to that pitch, that of necessity he must betray the one or the other : after he had raken good breath to refolve which of the two he should deal withall, in the end went on with his first plot and device of Treason, and so delivered Jugurth into Prifoner. These things misliked Marius much: but notwithstanding, judging that Sylla was not to much envyed as himself, he took him with him unto the Wars. Marius in his second Confulship, made Sylla one of his Lieutenants: and in his third Consulship, he had charge under him of a thou-he perswaded them to remain good friends and consederates of the ROMANS. For this his good fervice, he found that Marius grew in great misliking with him, because from thenceforth he never gave him any honourable charge, or occasion to shew good service: but to the contrary, did what he could to hinder his rifing. Wherefore, Syllaafterwards took Catulus Luctatius part, who was companion with Marius in his Confulfhip. This Catulus was a very honest man, but fonewhat flack and cold in Martiall matters, which was the cause that indeed he did commit unto

Sylla all the speciall service and matters of weight in his charge: whereupon he gave him occasion

Sylla's hands. Indeed Marius triumphed for taking of King Jugurth : but his evil willers, for the Jugurth delivefright and grudge they bare him, did attribute the glory and honour of Jugurehs taking wholly unto by King Boc-Sylla. That fecretly went to Marius heart, and specially for that Sylla being high minded by nature chus. (coming then but newly from a bale, obscure, and unknown life, to be known and well accepted of The honour of the People of Rome, and to take also what honour meant) became so ambitious and covetous of Jugaribitaglory, that he caused the story to be graven in a Ring, which he did ever after use to wear and seal king ascribed withall : wherein King Jugurib was delivered of Bocchus unto Sylla, and Sylla also receiving Jugurib unto Sylla.

Provision to be brought thither, infomuch as Catulus Camp being plentifully victualled, they fent their store and surplusage unto Marin Souldiers, the which Sylla himself writeth, did much miflike Marius. And this is the first cause of their enmity. The which being grounded upon so light The first cause occasion, was followed with Civill Wars, great effusion of bloud, and with incurable factions and of enmity, bediffentions, that it ended at the length with a cruell tyranny, and confusion of all the ROMAN twist sylls and State and Empire. to prefer him to fome honourable Office in the City of ROME : he was no fonce returned from the Wars, but he would needs prove the Peoples good wills unto him, and procured his name to be billed among them that fued for the Pratorfhip of the City (that is to fay) the Office of the ordinary Judge that ministreth Justice unto the Citizens t but he was rejected by the voyce of the People. For the which he laid the fault upon the meaner fort, faying, that the Commonalty knew well enough the friendship he had with King Bocchiu, and that therefore they hoping that if he were made Ædilis before he came to be Prator, he would make them fee noble hanings and great fightings of wild Beafts of Ly BIA : and that therefore they did choose other Practors, and put him by his suit, in hope to compell him by this means to be first of all Ædilis. Howbeit it seemeth that he doth nor confess the truth of his refusall : for his own act doth condemn himself : because the next year following he was chosen Prator, partly for that he wan the People with courteste, and partly with Money. So he falling out with Cefar upon that occasion, in his anger threatned him that he would use the Power and Authority of his Office upon him. But Cefer smiling, answered him, Thou hast reason to call it thine Office, for indeed it is thine, because thou hast bought it. But after the time of his Pratorship was expired, he was fent with an Army into CAPPADOCIA, colouring his Voyage thither with Commission to restore Ariobarzanes into his Kingdom again : howbeit the onely cause of his Journey was indeed to suppress King Misbridates a little, who took too many things in band, and increased his Power and Dominion with a new Signiory of no less greatness then that which he had before. In truth he brought no great Army out of ITALY with him, but he was faithfully holpen by the Confederates of the ROMANS in every place, through whose aid he overthrew a great number of the CAPPADOCIANS, and afterwards also a great number of the ARME-NIANS, which came in like cale to aid them : to that he expulsed Gordin King of PHRYGIA OUT of CAPPADOCIA, and reftored Ariobarzanes to his Realm again. After which Victory, Syla remained by the River of Euphrates, and thither came unto him one Orobaz Ms 2 PART HIAN, Ambai-Uroneque Am-PARTHIAN'S were never friends before : and that with other things shewed the great good fortune Sylla had, that the PARTHIANS came first to him by his means to feek friendship with the ROL the King of the Parthians MANS. They say, that receiving this Ambassadour Orobazus, he made three Chairs to be brought out, the one for King Ariobarxanes, the other for Orobarus the Ambaffadour, and the third for himfelf, which he placed in the midft between them both, and fitting down in the fame, gave audience unto the Ambassadour: for which cause the King of PARTHIA afterwards put Orobazus to death. Some do commend Systa for this act, for that he kept his State in such Majesty among the barbarous People. Other do reprove his ambition in it, shewing himself stately out of time, and to no purpole. We do read that a Soothfayer of CHALDEA being in Grebazus Train, having diligently viewed and confidered the physiognomy of Sylla, and all his other movings and gestures of mind and body, to judge not by the climate of the Countrey, but according to the rules of his Art, what his nature should be : all well considered of, he said that Sylla one day must needs come to be a great man, and that he marvelled how he could fuffer it, that he was not even then the chiefest man of the World. When Sylla was returned again to Rome, one Cenforinas accused him of Extortion, that he had carried away a great fum of Money with him, contrary to the Law, out of one of their Confederates Countrey: howbeit he profecuted not his accufation, but gave it over. In the mean time the enmity begun betwirt him and Marius, kindled again upon a new occasion of King Bocchus ambition : who partly to creep further into the Peoples favour of ROME, and partly also for to gratific Sylla, gave and dedicated terrain Images of Victory, carrying tokens of Triumph unto the Temple of Jupiter Capitolin, and next unto them also the Image of Jugurth, which he delivered into the hands of Sylla, being all of pure Gold. This did to offend Marius, that he attempted to take them away by force: but others did defend the cause of Sylla. So that for the quarrell of these two, the City of ROME taking Arms, had like to have brought all to ruine; had not the Wars of the Confederates of ITALY been, which of long time did kindle and fmoke, but at the length brake out into open flame and fedition for that time. In this marvellous great War which fell out very dangerous, by fundry misfortunes and great losses to the ROMANS, Marius did no notable exploit : whereby it appeareth , that the vertue of warlike Difcipline hath need of a ftrong, lufty, and able body. For Sylla to the contrary, having done notable fervice, and obtained many profitable Victories, wan the fame and effimation among the ROMANS, of a noble Souldier, and worthy Captain: and among the Enemies themselves, of a most fortunate man. Norwithstanding, Sylla did not as Timotheus ATHENIAN, the Son of Conon had done: who, when his adversaries and ill willers did attribute his noble deeds unto the favour of Fortune, and did paint Fortune in Tables, that brought him all the Cities taken and fnared in nets whileft he flept, he took it in very ill part, and was marvellous angry with them that did it, faying, that they robbed him of the glory that justly belonged unto him. Wherefore one day shealan would when this Timetheus was returned from the Wars with great Victories, after he had openly not attribute acquainted the ATHENIAMS with the whole discourse of his doings in his Voyage, he said the slory of his the glory of his unto them: My Lords of ATHENS, Fortune hath had no part in all this which I have told doing to Forunt unto you. Hercupon the gods, it should feem, were so angry with this soolish ambition of Ti-53/H gave For mothers, that he never afterwards did any worthy thing, but all went utterly against the hair tune the how with him: until at the length he came to be so hated of the People, that in the end they banisate at all the same to be so hated of the People, that in the end they banisate at the same to be so hated of the People, that in the end they banisate at the same to be so hated of the People, that in the end they banisate at the same to be so hated of the People, that in the end they banisate at the same to be so hated of the People, that in the end they banisate at the same to be so hated of the People, that in the end they banisate at the same to be so hated of the People. near of all his fied him from ATHENS. But Sylls to the contrary, did not onely patiently abide their words, that faid , he was a happy man , and fingularly beloved of Fortune : but also increasing this opinion, and glorying as at a speciall grace of the gods, did attribute the Honour of his doings unto Fortune, either for a vain glory, or for that he had in fancy, that the gods did profper him in all his doings. For he wrote himself in his Commentaries, that the enterprises which he hazarded most hotly according to the sudden occasion offered, did better prosper with him, then those which by good advice he had determined of. Furthermore, when he faid that he was better born unto Fortune, then to the Wars: it feemeth that he confeffed all his prosperity came rather by Fortune, then by his worthiness. And to conclude, it appeareth that he did wholly fubmit himself unto Fortune, acknowledging that he did altogether depend upon her; confidering that he did attribute it to the speciall grace and favour of the gods. that he never disagreed with Metellus his Father in Law, who was a man of like Dignity and Authority as himself was. For where it was thought he would have been a great hinderer of his doings, he found him very courteous and gentle in his behalf, in all that they had to deal in together by reason of the society of their Office. And surthermore, in his Commentaries which he dedicated unto Lucellus, he counfelled him to think nothing more certain and affured then that which the gods should reveal unto him, and command him in his nights Dream. He writeth also, that sylla's belief when he was fent with an Army unto the Wars of the confederates, the Earth suddenly opened in Dreams. about LAVERNA, out of the which immediately came a marvellous bright flame of Fire that ascended up to the Element. The Wife men being asked their Opinions about the same, made Astrange fight answer, that a very honest man, and also a marvellous fair man of complexion taking soveraign appeared to Authority in his hands, should pacifie all tumults and feditions which were at that time in ROME. Whereupon Sylla faid it was himself whom the gods meant, because that amongst other things he had the fingular gift of beauty, that his hair was as yellow as Gold : and he was not ashamed to name himself an honest man, after he had won so many notable great Victories. Thus have we sufficiently spoken of the trust he had in the favour of the gods. And Furthermore he seemed to be very contrary in his manners, and unlike to himself. For if he took away much in one place, he gave as much more also in another. Some he preferred without cause : and others he put down without reason. He would be very gentle unto them of whom he would have ought: sylas strange of and unto those that fought of him, he would stand much upon his Honour, and look for great conditions. reverence. Whereby men could hardly difcern his nature, whether pride or flattery did more abound in him. And as for the inequality he used in punishing of them that had offended him: sometimes he hanged up men for very small and light causes: some other times again to the contrary, he patiently abode the most grievous offences in the world, and lightly pardoned and forgave fuch faults as were in no wife to be forgiven; and afterwards again would punish right small crimes, with murthers, effusion of bloud, and confiscation of goods. This judgement may be given of him: that by nature he had a malicious and a revenging mind : yet notwithstanding he qualified that naturall bitterness with reason, giving place to necessity, and his benefit. For in this War of the confederates, his Souldiers flew Albinus one of his Lieutenants, beating him to death with Staves and Stones, being a man of goodly quality, and one that had been Prætor. This great offence he passed over with silence, using no manner of punishment, and turned it to a boaft in the end, faying that his men were the more obedient and diligent in any piece of service that was to be done, and that he made them amend their faults by worthy fervice. And furthermore, he did not regard them that did reprove him: but having determined with himself to destroy Mirius. and to procure that he might be chosen Generall in the Wars against King Mithridates, because that this War of the confederates was now ended : for this cause he flattered and curried favour with his Souldiers that served under him. At his return to Rome from these Wars of the con- sylla chosen federates, he was chosen Consull with Q. Pompeius, being then fifty years old and married with Consull. Caciliaa Noble Lady, and Metellin Daughter, who was then chief Bishop of Rome, for which Metellins chief marriage the common People fang fongs and Ballads up and down Rome against him: and many of Bishop of the Noble men envyed him for it, thinking him unworthy of fo Noble a Lady, whom they thought ried man. worthy to be Confull, as Titus Livius faith. Now she was not his onely Wife, for he had a young Wife before called Ilia, by whom he had a Daughter. After he had married Elia, then a third called Calia, Sylla's Wives, whom he put away because she brought him no Children. But notwithstanding she went honourably away from him, with very good words of her, belides many other goodly rich Gifts he gave her: howbeit shortly after he married Metella : which made the world suspect that Calia was put away for her naughtiness. Howfoever it was, Sylla did ever Honour and love Metella: in so much as the People of Rome afterwards making fute, that they that were banished for Marins saction, might be called home again: and being denied, and refused by Sylla, they cried out with open voice for Metella, praying her to help them to obtain their request. And it seemeth also that when he had taken the City of ATHENS, he dealt more cruelly with them, because that some of them had seoffed at Metella from the Walls: howbeit that was afterwards. So Sylla making his reckoning at that time that the Consulship was a small matter, in comparison of that which he looked for in the time to come : was marvellous desirous to go against Mithridates. But herein Marius also, of a mad furious ambition and covetousness of glory, stood against him, and sued to go that journey in like manner, being subject to those passions, which never wax old, as we may daily see by experience. For being Marius fond now a heavy man, fickly of Body, and broken in service abroad in the Wars, from the which he came ambition; but newly home, and bruifed moreover with age: did notwithstanding yet aspire to have the charge of the Wars to far off beyond the Seas. Wherefore to obtain his purpose whileh Sylla was gone a little unto the Camp to give order for certain things that were to be done, he remainwas gone a titue unto the Camp to previous to return times that were to occurre, the remaining in the City, did practife this pertilent mortall fedition, which alone did more hurr unto the City of Rome, then all the Enemies that Rome ever had: the which the gods themselves had foreshewed by many figns and tokens. For Fire took of it felf in the Staves of the Enfigns, which they had much ado to quench. Three Ravens brought their young ones into the high way, and they may much auto to quench. The fight of many People, and afterwards carried the garbage they left of them into their Nefts. Rats also having knawn some Jewels of Gold in a Church, the Sextons setting a Trap for them, as a Rat was taken full of young, and kindled five young Rats in the Trap, of the which she eat up three. But more yet, on a fair bright day when there was no Cloud seen or the winter the case of the state of the s their wits, for fear of fo great a noise. Whereupon the Wisemen and Soothsayers of Thuscan being asked their Opinions, they answered: that this fo ftrange and wonderfull a figne did foreshew the change of theworld, and the departure out of this into another Life: for they hold opinion, that there should be eight worlds, all contrary one unto another, in manners and fashions of Life: unto every one of the which, faid they, God hath determined a certain time of continuance: but that they should all end their course within the space of the revolution of the great year : and when the one is ended, and the other ready to begin, there shall appear such strange signs on when the one is charact, and the other ready to begin; there man appear then trange light on the Earth, or in the Element. So that fuch as have studied that science, do certainly know, as soon as men be born, which are meer contrary unto the first in their lives and manners, and which are as men or porn, which are men containing the gods, then those which lived in former age. For they says that amongst great changes and alterations which are done in those places from one age unto athat amongh great changes and anterconstant of things to come, doth grow in reputation, and nother, the frience of divination and foretelling of things to come, doth grow in reputation, and meeteth in their predictions, when it pleafeth God to fend most certain and manifest signs, to know and foretell things to come. And in contrariwife allo in another age it groweth to contempt, and lofeth her reputation, for that it is very rash, and failed to meet with the most part of her and toteth her reputation, not mad it is very tain, and talled to meet with the most part of her predictions, because the hath but obscure means, and all her Instruments defaced, to know what should come. And these be the fables which the wifest Southlayers of Thuscan reported abroad, and they specially who seemed to have some singular speculation above others. But as the oroau, and they specially with the Soothfayers of thele wonders, being Affembled together within the Temple of the goddes Bellona, a Sparrow came flying into the Church in fight of them all, and carried a Grafhopper in her bill, and parted it in the middelt, and left one part within the Temple, and carried the other away with her. Whereupon the Wile men and Interpreters of fuch wonders, faid, that they doubted a commotion and a rifing of the Countrey-men against the Commons of the City, because the common People of the City do cry out continually like Grashoppers, and the Husbandmen do keep themselves upon their Lands in the Countrey. Thus Marine grew great and very familiar with Sulpitim, one of the Tribunes of the People, who in all kinds of wickedness and mischief that a man can reckon, would give place to no living creature: fo that a man withcunics and minimized that a man an account of the he had but the question is rather wherein he himfelf was not the worft of all others. For hewas full repleat with all kindsof cruelty, avarice, and rafines, and that so extreamly, as he cared not what villany and wickedness he openly committed, for that the fame might turn to his profit. For he had fet up a Table in the open Market-place, where he fold freedom, making flaves and ftrangers denizons of Rome for their Money: and for that purpose he entertained a guard of three thousand about him, besides a band of young Gentlemen of the order of Knights that attended always upon his Perfon ready at his commandment, whom he called the guard against the Senare. And furthermore, himself baving passed a Law by the voice of the People, that no Senatour should borrow nor owe above two thousand Drachmas: it was found that at the hour of his death, he dyed three millions of Drachmas in debt. This man now like a furious raging beaft, being left by Marina amongst the People, turned all things topic turvey, by force of Arms and main firength. He made also many wicked Laws to pass by voice of the People, and amongst others, that one specially, whereby he gave Marin Commillion to make Wars against King Mitbridates. For which extream oppressions and dealings of Sulpisius, the two Confuls (Sylla and Quintus Pompeisus) lest off to hear publick causes, and ceafed the common course of Law and justice. And as they were one day occupied about the adjournment of the Law, in an open Affembly in the Market-place, before the Temple of Caffor and Pollax: Salpitim the Tribune came upon them with his Souldiers, and flew many People, and among others, the Confull Pompeins own Son, and the Father himself being Confull, had much ado to fave his Life by flying. And Szilla the other Confull, was also purfued even into Marine House, where he was compelled to promife before his departure, prefently to go and revoke the adjournment of the law which he had before commanded. Thus Sulpitime having deprived Pompeins of his Confulfhip, did not depose Sylla, but onely took from him the charge he had given him to make Wars against Mithridates, and transferred that unto Marim. And fending Colonels to the City of NOLA to receive the Army that lay there, and to bring them unto Marim, Sylla prevented them, and fled to the Camp before them, and told the Souldiers all what had paft, as it was indeed: who when they heard it, fell all to a tumult, and flew Marim Colonels with Stones. Marium on the other fide put all Sylla's friends to death at ROME, and took the spoyl of their goods and Houses: so was there nothing else but flying from the Camp to ROME, and from

ROME to the Camp again. The Senate were in manner befides themselves, not being able to govern as they would, but driven to obey Marin and Sulpitim commandments. Who being advertifed that Sylla was coming towards ROME, fent straight two Prators unto him, Bratim and Servilius, to command him as from the Senate, to approach no nearer. These two Prætors spake a little two boldly unto Sylla: whereupon the Souldiers fell to a mutiny, in such fort, that they flood indifferent whether to kill them prefently in the Field, or no: howbeit they brake their Axes and bundels of Rods, which were carried before them, and took their Purple Robes wherewith they were apparelled as Magistrates, from them, and sent them home thus shamefully handled and intreated. Upon their return now to ROME, their fad filence onely, and themselves so stripped besides of all their marks and tokens of Prætoriall dignity, made all menthen to judge that they brought no other News, but fuch as were the worst that possible could be: and that there was no way then left to pacifie the fedition, which was now altogether uncurable. Wherefore Marius and his followers began to make himself strong by force : and Sylla with his Companion Quintus Ponpeins, departed in the mean time from the City Nola, and brought fix entire Legions on with him , who defired no other thing but to make haft to march to ROME-ward. Howbeit Sylla frood Sylla marchesh in doubt with himself what to do, thinking of the great danger that might follow. Untill such with fix Legitime as his foothfayer Pofthumius having confidered the figns and tokens of the Sacrifices, which ons 57/1. had made upon this determination, gave him both his hands, and bad him bind them hard, Posthamins the and shur him up saft, untill the day of Battell should be past: saying, that he was contented to and thut him up tatt, until the day of batter mound be part, laying, that he was continued to prognoflicate furfier death, if he had not good fuccess, and that out of hand, to his great Honour. And it is victory unto faid also, that the same night there appeared unto Sy a in a Dream the goddess Bellona, whom Sylla. the ROMANS do greatly Honour, following therein the Cappadocians; and I know not sould be Vision whether it be the Moon, Minerva, or Enyo the goddels of Battels. So he thought, that she in his dream. coming to him did put lightning into his hand, commanding him that he should lighten upon his Enemies, naming them one after another by their proper Names: and that they being stricken with this lightning, fell down dead beforehim, and no man knew what became of them. This Vision incouraged Sylla very much, and having reported the fame to Pempeius, his fellow Confull and Companion, the next morning he marched with his Army to ROME. When he was at PICINES, there came other Ambassadours unto him, to pray him in the Name of the Senate that he would not come to ROME in this heat and fury, declaring therewithall that the Senate would grant him all things that should be meet and reasonable. When Sylla had heard the message, he answered them, that he would Camp there : and so commanded the Marshals to divide the fquadrons according to their manner. The Ambassadours beleeving that he would have done so indeed, returned again to ROME: howbeit their backs were no fooner turned, but Sylla straight fent Lucius Basillus, and Cains Munmius, before to seize one of the Gates of ROME, and the Walls which were on the fide of Mount Efquilin, and he himself also in Person with all possible fpeed marched after them. Bafillus entred Rome, and wan the Gate by force. But the common People unarmed, got them up straight to the top of their Houses, and with Tiles and stones staved and kept him, not onely for entring any further: but also drave him back again, even to the very Walls of the City, In this hurly burly came Sylla himself to Rome, who seeing apparently in what state Sylla fet the things flood, cryed out to his men, and bade them fet fire on the Houses: and himself taking a Houses on fire Torch light in his hand, shewed them the way what they should do, appointing his Archers and in Rome. Darters to hurl and bestow their Darts and other fiery instruments, to the tops of the Houses. Herein he was foo much overcome with unreasonable choler, passion, and defire of revenge : for feeking onely to plague his Enemies, he took no regard to friends, to Parents or confederates, neither had he yer any manner of remorfe or pity : fuch and so fiery was his anger then, that he put no kind of difference between those that had offended, and them that had done him no hurt at all. By this means was Marius driven into the City; unto the Temple of the Earth, where he made open Proclamation by found of Trumpet, that he would make free all the flaves that would come to his part. But forthwith came his Enemies, fet upon him, and prest him so near, that he was constrai- Marint and ned utterly to fly and forfake the City. Then Sylla affembling the Senate, caused Marius and cer- Sulpinias contain others, together with Sulpitius Tribune of the People, to be condemned to death. Sul- demned to pitius was betrayed by a flave of his own, whom Sylla made free according to his promife past Treason justify by publick Edict: but when he had made him free, he caused him to be thrown down headlong rewarded. from the Rock Tarpeian. And not contented with this , he promifed by Proclamation a great Theingratuale fum of Money to him that would kill Marius: a very ingrate and unthankfull part, confidering of Sills that Marins not many days before, having $5/la in his own House, in his hands and custody de reproved. livered him from perill, and fet him in safety. Which if at that time he had not done, but had suffered Salpitius to have slain him, himself had been soveraign Lord of the whole without all contradiction, and might have ruled all things at his own will and pleasure. But Sylla shortly after upon the like advantage, used no such manner of requitall or gravity towards him, which bred a secret milliking amongst the Senate: howbeit the common People made open shew of the evill will they bare unto Sylla, by rejecting one Nonius his Nephew, and one Servi s, who upon confidence of his favour, presented themselves to sue for certain Offices. And besides the shame of this refufall, to spite him the more, they chose others in their steads, whose Honour and preferment they right well knew that Sylla would not onely millike, but be much offended withail.

Howbeit he wifely diffembling the matter, seemed to be very glad, saying that by this means the People of Rome enjoyned a full and perfect liberty, that in fuch cases of election they might freely do what themselves listed. And to mitigate somewhat the Peoples ill will towardshim, he determined to chuse Lucius Cinna Confull, who was of a contrary faction unto him: having first bound him by folemn Oath and curse to savour his doings and whole proceedings. Whereupon Cinna went up to the Capitoll, and there holding a Stone in his hand, did folerandy fwear and promife, that he would be Sylla's faithfull friend: befeeching the gods if he did the contrary, that he might be thrown out of ROME, even as he threw that Stone out of his hand; and with thosewords, threw it to the ground before many People. But notwithstanding all these curses, Cinna was no fooner entred into his Confulship, but presently he began to change and alter all. For amongst other things, he would needs have Sylla accused: and procured Verginina one of the Tribunes of the People, to be his accuser. But Sylla left him with his Judges, and went to make Wars against Mithridates. And it is faid, that about the time that Syllatook Ship, and departed out of ITALY, there fortuned many tokens and warnings of the gods unto King Mitridates, who was at that prefent in the City of PERGAMUS: as amongst others that the PER-GAMENIANS to Honour Mithridates withall, having made an Image of Victory, carrying a Garland of Triumph in her hand, which was let down from aloft with Engines : to foon as the was ready to put the Garland upon his head, the Image brake, and the Crown fell to the groundin the middeft of the Theater, and burst all to pieces. Whereby all the People that were prefers, were stricken with a marvellous fear, and Mithridates himself began to missike this evill luck: although all things at that time fell out more fortunately then he looked for. For he had taken ASIA from the ROMANS, and BITHYNIA and CAPPADOCIA, from the Kings which he had driven out : and at that time remained in the City of PERGAMUS , to devide the riches and great Territories among his friends. As touching his Sons, the eldeft governed the Realm of PONTUS, and BOSPHORUS which he inherited from his predecessors, even unto the deferts beyond the Marishes of Mecotides, without trouble or molectation of any man. The other also, Deciding the Marines of Michael Army in Conquering of Thracia, and Macedon, His Ca-Ariarathes, was with a great Army in Conquering of Thracia, and Macedon, His Caprains and Lieutenants moreover, did many notable Conquests in divers places, with a great Power: amongst the which, Archelaus being Lord and Master of all the Sea for the great number of Ships he had, Conquered the Illes CYCLADES, and all those beyond the head of MALEA, and specially amongst others, the Ille of Euboea. And beginning at the City of ATHENS, had made all the Nations of GREECE to rebell, even unto THESSALY, faving that he received forme loss by the City of CHERONEA. Where Brutius Sura, one of the Lieutenants of Sentias Governour of MACEDON (a man of great Wiledom and Valiantness) came against him, and flayed him from going any further, overturning the whole Countrey of BOEOTIA like a furious raging River. And fetting upon Archelam by the City of CHERONEA, overthrew him in three feverall Battels: repulsed, and enforced him to take the Seas again. But as Bratim was following him in chafe, Lucius Lucullus fent him commandment to give place unto Sylla, to follow those Wars against Mithridates, according to the charge and Commission in that behalf given him. Whereupon Bratisu Sura went out of the Country of BOEOTIA, and returned towards his Generall Senting, notwithstanding his affairs prospered better then he could have wished, and that all GREECE were very willing to revolt, for the reputation of his Wildom and goodnels. Howbeit the things that we before have spoken of , were the most notable matters that Brutius did in those parts. Sylla now upon his arrivall, recovered immediately all the other Cities of GREECE: who being advertifed of his coming, fent prefently to pray him to come to their aid, Sylla befiegeth the City of Athens onely excepted, which was compelled by the Tyrant Arifion, to take the City of A- part with Mitbridates. Sylla thereupon with all his Power went thither, befieged the Haven of PIREA round, caufing it to be battered and affaulted on every fide, with all forts of Engines and Instruments of battery: whereas if he could have had patience but a little longer, he might have had the high Town by famine, without putting himfelf in any manner of danger, the fame being brought to such extream dearth and searcity of all kind of Victuals. But the haste that he made to return again to ROME, for fear of the new change which he heard of daily from thence, compelled him to hazard this War in that fort with great danger, many Battels, and infinite charge: confidering also, that befides all other provision and Furniture, he had twenty thousand Mules and Mulets labouring daily to furnith his Engins of battery. And when all other Wood failed him , because his Engins were oftentimes marred after they were made, fome breaking of themselves by reason of their weight, others confumed with fire thrown from the Enemies : at the length he fell to the holy Wood, and cur down the Trees of the Academia, being better ftored and farmished, then any other Park of pleasure in all the Suburbs of the City, and felled down all the Wood of the Park Lycrum. And standing in need of a great sum of Money to entertain this War withall, he dealt allowith the holieft Temples of all GREECE, causing them to bring him from the Temples of EPIDAURUM and OLYMPUS, all the richeft and most precious Jewels they had. He Wrote moreover unto the Counfell of the AMPHICTIONS holden in the City of DELPHOS, to bring him the ready Money they had in the Temple of Apollo, for that it should be kept in better safety withhim, then if it still remained there: promiting befides, that if he should by occasion be compelled to use it, he would restore as much again unto them: and for this purpose he sent Captia PHOCIAN, one of his very friends and familiars, and commanded him to weigh all that he took. So Caphis went unto Delphos: but when he came thither, being afraid to touch the holy things, in presence of the Counsell of the AMPHICTYONS he wept, that the tears ran down by his cheeks, as a man compelled to do such an Act against his will. And when some that were pre- caphis superfent, told Caphie that they heard the found of Apollo's Cithern, in the Temple : whether he be- fittion for leeved it was so indeed, or because he would put this superstitious tear into Sylla's head, he wrote touching the to him of it. But Sylla mocking him, fent him word, that he marvelled he could not confider, holy things, that Singing and Playing on the Cithern, were tokens rather of joy then of anger, and therefore that he should not tail to proceed further, and bring him those things which he commanded, for that (faid he) Apollo did give them him. Now for the other Jewels of the Temple of Apollo, the common People knew not that they were fent unto Sylla: but the Silver tun, which onely was that, that remained of the offerings of the Kings, the AMPHICTYONS were fain to break that in pieces, because it was so great and Massie, that the Beasts of draught could not draw it whole as it was. This Act made them to remember the other ancient ROMAN Captains, as Flaminius, Manius Acilius, and Panlus Amylius: of the which, the one having driven King Antiochin out of GREECE, and the rest also having overthrown the Kings of MACEDON, they never once touched the Gold and Silver of the Temples of GREECE: but contrarily fent they never once touched the Gold and Silver of the Temples of Street and Solution of the their offerings thither, and had them all in great Honour and reverence. But as to them, they dation of the were all Captains lawfully chosen and sent to their charges: their Souldiers well trained, and obe-ancient Roman. dient at commandment, void of rebellion, or any manner of mutiny. And for themselves, were Captains for Kings in greatness of courage and magnanimity of mind: but in expence of their Persons, very ordering of spare and scant , without any lavish , but needfull and necessary , proportioned by reason , and their souldiers, thinking more shame to flatter their Souldiers, then fear their Enemies. Now the Captains and also for thinking more shame to flatter their models contrarily in Sylla's time, fought not their preferment in the Common-wealth by Vertue, but by expences, force, and having greater Wars one with another, then with strangers their Enemies, were compelled to flatter their Souldiers whom they should command, and to buy their pains and service. feeding them still with large and great expences, to please and content them. Wherein they did not confider, that they brought their Countrey into bondage, and made themselves slaves of the vilest People of the World, whilest that in the mean time they fought to command by all means positible those which in many respects were far better then themselves. And this was the cause that both drave Marius out of ROME, and made him also to return again against Sylla. This self syllathe first fame cause made Cinna to kill Ottavius, and Fimbria to slay Flaccus: of which evils Sylla was manthat spoilthe very first and onely Author, spending out of all reason, and giving the Souldiers largely that served vice of soulunder him, to win their good wills the more, and thereby also to allure them. By reason whereof, diers, by over-Sylla had need of Mountains of Money, and specially at the siege where he was : both to make much liberty frangers Traytors, and besides, to furnish and satisfie his own dissolute Souldiers : for he had such and sufferance. an earnest desire to take the City of ATHENS, that he could not possibly be dissiwaded from it. And either it was of a certain vain ambition he had to fight against the ancient reputation of that City, being then but a shadow to that it had been : or else of a very anger, for the mocks and gibes which the Tyrant Ariftion gave in his foreches from the Walls, against him and Metella, to spitchim the more withall. This Tyrant Ariftion was full of all cruelty and wickedness, having taken up all the notion the worlt qualities and greatest imperfections of King Mithridates, and heaped them wholly together Tyrant Ariin himself: by reason whereof the poor City of ATHENS which had escaped from so many Wars, stion. Tyrannies, and civill diffentions untill that prefent time, was by him as by an uncurable difease, brought unto all extremity : for a bushell of Wheat was worth a thousand Drachmas, and men were driven for famine to eat Feverfew that grew about the Caftle : and they caused old Shoes and old Oyl Pots to be sodden, to deliver some savour unto that they did eat, whilest the Tyrant himself did nothing all day long but cram in Meat, and Drink drunk, dance, maske, scoff, and flout at the Enemies, suffering the holy Lamp of Minerva in the mean season to go out for lack of Oyl, And when the Nun of the same Temple sent unto him for a quarter of a bushell of Wheat , he sent a quarter of a bulhell of Pepper. And when the Counfellors of the City, the Priests and Religious came to the Caftle, holding up their hands, and befeeching him to take some pity of the City, and fall to composition with Sylla: he made them to be driven away and scattered with Slings. In the end: very late and yer with great ado, be fent two or three of his quaffing Companions unto Sylla, who when they were come to him, made no demand of Composition for the Town but began to praise and magnifie the deeds of Thefew, of Eumolpus, and of the ATHENIANS against the MEDES. Whereupon Sylla made them this answer: My goodly Orators, return you again with all your rherorick ! for the ROMANS fent me not hither to learn nor to fludy, but to overcome and conquer those that are rebelled against them. In the mean time there were certain spies in the City, that heard old men talking together in a place called Ceramicus, blaming the Tyrant because he kept no better Watch on that fide of the Wall that was directly over against the Heptachalchon, which was the onely place where the Enemies might easilieft get up upon the Walls. Those spies went straight unto Sylla and told him what they had heard the old men fay. Sylla tracted no time, but came to the place in the night to fee it; and perceiving that it was to be taken, fet the matter straight abroach, And himself writes in his Commentaries, that the first man that scaled the Walls, was Marcus Teim who finding a souldier ready to refift him, gave him fuch a fore blow with his Sword upon his Marcus Teins. Headpiece, that his Sword brake in two; and yet notwithstanding that he saw himself naked and difarmed of a Sword, did not for all that give back, but flood ftill to it, and kept the place fo long, by Sylla.

Wall to be pulled down between the Haven of PIREA, and the holy Haven and having before made the breach very plain, entred into the City about midnight with a wonderfull fearfull order, making a marvellous noise with a number of Horns, and sounding of Trumpers, and all his Army with him in order of Battell, crying, To the fack, to the fack : kill, kill. For he had given the the Town in fpoil, and to put all to the Sword. The Souldiers therefore ran through the Streets with their Swords drawn, making an uncredible flaughter : fo that to this day they be not acknown, nor do not declare what number of Perfons were flain; but to shew the greatness of the murder that there was committed, the place is yet extant to be seen where the Bloud ran. For befides them that were flain through all the City, the Bloud of them onely that were flain in the Market-stead, did wet all the ground of Ceramics, even unto the very place called Dipylon: and some fay also, that it ran by the Gates into the Suburbs of the City. But if the multitude of the People that were flain in this fort were great, much more (or so many at the least) it is said were those that slew themselves, for the forrow and compassion they had to see their Countrey in fuch pitifull state, supposing certainly that their City was now come to utter ruine and destruction, This opinion made the noblest men of the City to despair of their own safety, and seared to live any longer, because they thought they should find no mercy, nor moderation of cruelty in Sylla. Notwithstanding, partly at the requests of Midias and Calliphon, who were banished men from ATHENS, and fell at Sylla's feet upon their knees: and partly also at the requests of the Ro-MAN Senators that were in his Camp, who prayed him to pardon the Body of the City, and the rather, for that he had already quenched the thirst of his ravening mind sufficiently well : after that he had faid fomewhat in praise of the ancient ATHENIANS, he concluded in the end, to give the greater number unto the smaller, and the living to the dead. Sylla writeth himself in his Commentaries, that he took the City of ATHENS on the very felf day of the calends of March, which cometh to agree with the first day of the Moneth that we call Anthesterion, on the which day by chance many things are done at ATHENS in meniory of Noes Flood, and of the universall destruction of the whole world, that was in Old time by rage of Waters, falling out even in that very Moneth. When the City was thus taken, the tyrant Ariftien fled into the Caftle, where he was belieged by Curio, whom Sylla left there of purpole about that matter. And after he had a great time kept it, at the last constrained thereunto for lack of Water, he yeelded. The Castle was no fooner given up, but immediately by Gods providence, the weather miraculoully altered. For the self same day, and the very felf instant that Curio carried the Tyrant Arission out of the Casse, the Element being very fair and clear, the Clouds suddenly gathered together, and there fell such a marvellous glut of rain, that all the Castle was full of Water. Shortly after also, Sylla baving gotten the Haven of PIREA, burnt the greatest part of the Buildings: amongst others Philos Armo, was the Arfenall and Armory, which Philo in Old time had caused to be built, being of a strange and wonderfull edifice. In the meantime, Taxilles, one of the Lieutenants of King Mithridates, coming from Thracia and Macedon, with a hundred thousand Footmen, ten thousand Horsmen, and fourscore and ten thousand Carts of War all Armed with Sithes: sent unto a nunated thouland Foor Archelaus to joyn with him , lying yet at Anker in the Haven of Muny Chia, and not wilmen, ten thou ling to leave the Sea, nor come to fight with the ROMANS, but feeking rather to draw these men, ten thou ling to leave the Sea, nor come to fight with the ROMANS, but seeking rather to draw these men, ten thou ling to leave the Sea, nor come to fight with the ROMANS, but seeking rather to draw these men, ten thou ling to leave the Sea, nor come to fight with the ROMANS, but seeking rather to draw these men, ten thou ling to leave the Sea, nor come to fight with the ROMANS, but seeking rather to draw these men, ten thou ling to leave the Sea, nor come to fight with the ROMANS, but seeking rather to draw these men, ten thou ling to leave the Sea, nor come to fight with the ROMANS, but seeking rather to draw these men, ten thou ling to leave the Sea, nor come to fight with the ROMANS, but seeking rather to draw these men, ten thou ling to leave the Sea, nor come to fight with the ROMANS, but seeking rather to draw these men, ten thou ling to leave the Sea, nor come to fight with the ROMANS, but seeking rather to draw these men, ten the sea of the sea better then himself, departed out of the Countrey of ATTICA (a very barren loyl, and indeed not able to keep him in time of Peace) and went into BOEOTIA: wherein most men thought he committed great errour to leave ATTICA, which is a very hard Countrey for Horsemen, and to go into BOEOTIA, 2 plain Champion: and so much the rather, because he knew well enough the Barbarians that the chiefest strength of the Barbarous People consisted in their Horsmen, and their Armed Carts with Sithes. But to avoid famine, and lack of Victuals as we have faid, he was compelled to feek Battell. Furthermore, he had another cause also that made him astraid, and compelled him to go: and that was Hortensim a famous Captain, and very valiant also, who brought him aid out of THESSALIE; and the Barbarous People lay in wait for him in his way, in the Straight of THERMY POLES. And these were the causes that made Sylle take his way into BOEOTIA. The Straight But in the mean time, Caphie that was our Countrey-man, deceiving the Barbarous People, guided Hortensia another way by Mount PARNASSUS, and brought him under the City of TITHORA, which was not then fo great a City as now at this present it is, but was a Castle onely, situated upon the point of a Rock, hewn all about : whether the PHOCIANS in Old time flying, King Aerxii coming upon them, retired themselves for their safety. Horiensian lodged there, and there did also both defend and repulse his Enemies, so long as day-light lasted: and when the night came on, got down through very hard ftony ways, unto the City of PATRONIDE, where he joyned with Sylla, who came to meet him with all his Power. Thus being joyned together, they Camped upon a Hill that standeth about the middest of the plain of ELATEA: the foyle was very good, and well replenished with great store of Trees and Water at the soot of the same. The Hill is called PHILOBEOTUS, the nature and fination whereof, Sylla doth marvelloufly com-Their whole mend. When they were Camped, they feemed but a handfull in the Eye of their Enemies: and no Army together more they were indeed, for they had not above fifteen hundred. Horse, and less then fifteen thousand Footmen. Whereupon the other Captains their Enemies, against Archelam mind, brought out their bands into the Field, and filled all the Valley and plain thereabouts with Horimen, with Carts, with Shields and Targets, so that the Air was even cut a funder as it were with the

cryes of fo many fundry Nations which all together did put themselves in violence of the no Battell ray. The sumptuousness of their Furniture moreover, was not altogether superfluous and The brave Ar unprofitable, but ferved greatly to fear the beholders. For the gliftering of their Harnels, so mour and furunprohitable, but lerved greatly to tear the beholders. For the granting of their richly trimmed and fet forth with Gold and Silver, the colours of their Arming Coats upon their Thracians and Curaces, after the fathion of the MEDES and SCYTHIAMS, mingled with the bright gliftering Macedonians, Steel and shining Copper, gave such a shew as they went and removed too and fro, that made a serving under light as clear as if all had been on a very Fire, a fearfull thing to look upon. Infomuch as the Taxilles King ROMANS durft not fo much as once go out of the Trenches of their Camp, nor Sylla with all his Atthributes perswasion could take away this great conceived fear from them; wherefore (and because also he Lieutenant. would not compell them to go forth in this fear) he was driven not to ftir, but close to abide, (though it grieved him greatly) to see the Barbarous People so proudly and villainously laugh him and his men to fcorn. Howbeit the difdain and fcoffing of his Enemies, ftood him to great good purpose afterwards: for they making now no account of him, kept small Watch and Ward, strayed up and down diforderly befides, though otherwise they were not very obedient unto their Cap- Many Comtains, being many Commanders, and few good followers: by reason whereof, a small number manders make kept in the Camp, and all the reft of the great multitude entired with the gain they made by spoy-disobedient ling and facking of Towns thereabouts, dispersed themselves many days journey from their Camp. For it is faid, that at that very time they destroyed the City of PANOPAIA, sacked the City of LEBADIA, and spoiled the Temple without commandment or licence of any of all their Captains to do it. In the mean while, Sylla feeing fo many Cities and Towns spoiled and destroyed. took it both grievously and also angerly : howbeit he suffered not his men to lye idle, but kept them in labour, to turn the course of the River of Cephisus, and to cast great Trenches, not suffering Cephisus st any man to take east or reft, but contrarily with great severity punished such as went faintly and lazily sylla straight to work, to the end that being wearied with the pain they took after fo many works, they would Souldiers. rather prove to hazard Battell, as it fell out indeed. For the third day after they had begun thus A good volice to labour, as Sylla passed by them, they cried out unto him, to lead them against their Enemies, to weary fearto labour, as Sylla paned by them, they like our about ries of men wearied rather with labour, full Soudiers. But this answer was unto them again: That those were but cries of men wearied rather with labour, with extream then defirous to fight. Notwithstanding, if it be so indeed, and that you have so good a will to labour wherefight as you make shew of: then I will, said hethat you Armyour selves presently, and get you to by to make yonder place : shewing them therewithall where the Cattle of the PARAPOTAMIANS stood in them definous Old time, which then (the City being destroyed) was no more but the top of a Stony Mountain to fight. cut all about, and severed from the Mount of Edylium by the breadth of the River of Assus that runcut all about and fevered from the Mount of Edystum by the breath of the River of Cephilius, and Edyslum Mons; neth betwire, and which at the very foot of the same Mountain falleth into the River of Cephilius, and Affais fl. both these Rivers running in one, carrying a swift Stream, do make the knap of the said Hill very ftrong of fituation to lodge a Campupon. And therefore Sylla feeing the Souldiers of his Enemies Camp, marching with their Copper Fargets to take up that place to lodge in: to prevent them. and to get it before them (as indeed be did) he marched shither in all hafte possible, and got it even with the earnest good will of all his Souldiers. idrehelam being to repulsed from thence, nurned his way towards the City of Choeronea. Whereupon cemain of the Choeroneans that were in 57Ha's Camp, befought him that he would not forfake their City, and leave it to their Enemy. Sylla desiring to gratific them therein, sent Gabinins one of his Colonels with a Legion, and therewithall gave the Choeroneans leave to gothither, who did what they could possible to Sylla fendeth get into the City before Gabinius: but that they could not, such was the diligence and honesty of Gabinius with get into the City Detore Garmina: Distinstincy Council to be and was in building a legion to the man, as he feemed more definous of their fafery, then they were themselves. Nevertheles, aid Charonast. Tubes doth not call the Colonell that was sent thinker Gabinius , but Hircins. And thus was the City of CHOERONEA preferved from the danger is stood in at that time. In the mean time came very good News to the ROMANS, both of Oracles and Prophecies, which promited them Victory Oracles and from the Temple of LEBANDIA, and the Cave of Trophonius: of which Prophecies, those Prophecies of Countrey-men make great mention. But Silla in the tenth Book of his Commentaries writeth, Victory unto that Sainem Tiem, a man of quality and Name amongst them that scafficked into the Countrey of Sylla. GREECE, came unto him after he had won the Battell of CHOERONEA, to tell him that Trophonius gave him to understand, that shortly after he should have a second Battell, and that he should yet again have another Victory in the same place. After him another man of War called Sal- Salvenius a oversion, sold him also what success he should have in the Wars of ITALY, saying, that he knew Souldier. it by revelation: and both these men agreed in the manner of the Revelation. For they faid, that they had seen a god, in Majefty, beauty and greatness, like unto the Image of Jupiter Olympias. Finite Olympias of August Olympias. Syda having palled the River of Affus, went to lodge at the foot of Mount Edylum, hard by Archelam, Acontium, who had placed and fortified his Camp between the two Mountains of Acontium and of Edylium, Edylium joyning to the City of the Assians. The place where Archelans Camped beareth his own Name Mountains, Archelans unto this day. One day after Sylla had changed his lodging , he left Murana in his Camp with a Legion, and two Cohoris, to keep the Enemies still occupied that were in great trouble and he himself in the mean time went and Sacrificed by the River of Cephidus. His Sacrifice being ended, he marched cowards the City of Choeronea, to take the force he had there under Gabinius, and to know the Mountain also called Thurium, which the Enemies had taken. It is a knap of a Thurium mone Mothtain very steep and sharp of all fides, with a narrow point like a Pine Apple, by reason attreOrthopawhereof we do call it Orthopagum. At the foot of the same runneth the River called Morion, and Morion fl. there is also the Temple of Apollo Surnamed Thurins : and they say , that this Surname of Thuring Apollo Thuring

396 was given unto him of the Name of Thurss, who was Mother of Charon, of the City of CHOERONEA. Other think that the Cowwhich was given to Cadmus for a guide, CORPORTED OF the Carry of that Place: which hath ever fince kept the Name, for that the PHOENICIANS Founder of the came to him in that Place: which hath ever fince kept the Name, for that the PHOENICIANS City of Cherr- call a Cow, Thor. Now when Sylla came near unto Choeronea, the Colonell Gabinius whom he had fent thither with a Garrilon to defend the fame, went to meet him, with his men very well Armed, wearing a Laurell Garland: and Sylla after he had faluted him and his Souldiers, made an Oration unto them, exhorting them to do their duty in fighting. And as he was in his Oration, there came two Citizens of Choeronea to him, one his Name was Omoloichu, and the other Anaxidamus, who promifed him to drive the Enemies from Mount Thurium which they had taken, if he would but give them some small number of Souldiers. For there was a little Path-way, which the Would but give them for the mining at a place called Petrochus, hard by the Temple of the Musses, by the which they might easily go to the top of this Mountain Thursum: fo that following that Path, it would bring them over the Barbarous Peoples heads, and they might eafily kill them with stones, or at the least they should drive them maugre their heads down into the Valley. Gabimins affuring Sylla that they were both very valiant men, and such he might boldly trust unto: Sylla gave them men, and commanded them to execute their enterprise: and he himself in the mean sea-57/1/2 ordereth fon went and fet his men in order of Battell in the plain, dividing his Horsmen on the wings, placed himself in the right wing, appointing the left unto Murans. Galba and Hortensins his Lieutenants, were placed in the tail with certain bands of the rereguard, which they kept upon the Hills, to watch and lett that the Enemies should not enclose them behind : because they perceived a far off that the Enemies put forth a great number of Horimen and Footmen light Armed in the wings, to the end that the Points of their Battell might the more easily bow and enlarge themselves, to compass in the ROMANS on the back side. Now in the mean time, these two CHOERONE-ANS whom Sylla had fent under Hireins their Captain, having compassed about the Mountain Thurium, before the Enemies were aware of them, fuddenly came to flew themselves upon the top of the Mountain, which did fo fear the Barbarous People, that they began immediately to flie, one of them for the most part killing another. There was no relistance, but flying down the Mountains, fellupon the Points of their own Partifants and Pikes, and one of them thrufting in anothers neck, tumbled headlong down the Mountain together, having their Enemies besides on their backs, which drave them from the Hill, and strake them behind where they lay open unto them: so as there were slain three thousand of them about this Mountain Thurium. And as for them that fought to fave themselves by flight, Murana that was already set in Battell ray, met with some, cut them off by the way, and slew them downright. The other fled directly to their Camp, and came in great companies, thrufting into the Battell of their Footmen, put the most part of them quite out of order, and marvelloully troubled their Captains before they could fet them again in order: which was one of the chiefest causes of their overthrow. For Sylla went and gave a charge upon them in this trouble and disorder, and had quickly won the ground that was between both Armies, whereby he took away the force of all their Armed Carts with Sithes, which are then of greatest force, when they have the longest courie, to give them a swift and violent stroke in their chafe: whereas when their course is but shore; the blow is so much the weaker and of less strength, even as Arrows are, that afar off enternor deep into the thing they be shor at : as at that time The force of the Armed it fell our with the Barbarous People. For their first Carts set forth so faintly, and came on with so Carts with in long courie, feeble a force, that the ROMANS fent them back, and eafily repulfed them, with great flaughter, and clapping of hands one to another, as they commonly ule in the ordinary Games of Horse-run-Sylla's conflict ning at ROME. When they had thus repulled the Carts, the Battell of Sylla's Footmen began synas connect to charge the Barbarous People; who basing their Pikes, stood close one to another, because they with Archelaus to charge the Barbarous People; who basing their Pikes, stood close one to another, because they would not be broken; and the ROMANS on the other fide, bestowed first their Darts among them, and then fuddenly drew out their Swords in the heat they were in, and put afide the Enemies' Pikes, whereby they might come nearer to their Bodies. There were fifteen thousand flaves in the front of the Battell of the Barbarous People , whom Mithridates Lieutenant had made free by open Proclamation, and had divided them by bands, amongst the other Footmen. By occasion whereof, there was a ROMAN Centurion spake pleasantly at that time, saying, That he never saw flaves before have liberty to fpeak and do like free men, but onely at Saturn's Feaft. Neverthe-Slaves made freely authori- lefs, they against the nature of slaves, were very valiant to abide the shock, and the ROMAN rrecoy authors Footmen could not fo readily break nor enter into them, nor make them give back, because they tensms in the flood very close one to another, and their ranks were of such a length besides; untill such time as the ROMANS that were behind the first ranks, did so pelt them with their slings, burling Stones, beflowing their Darts and Arrows upon them, that in the end they compelled them all to turn their backs and fly amain. And when Arebelaus did first threst out the right wing of his Army, suppoling to enclose the ROMANS behind, Hortenfins straight ways caused the bands he had with him to run and charge upon the Flanks: which Archelam perceiving, made the Horimen he had about him, turn their faces forthwith, which were in number above two thousand: infomuch as Hortenfius being set upon with all his Troop, was compelled to retire by little and little towards the Mountain, perceiving himself far from the Battell of his Footmen, and environed round about with his Enemies. Sylla feeing that , being in the right wing of his Battell , and having not yet fought, went straight to the rescue of Hortensium. But Archelam conjecturing by the dust which the Horses raised, what the matter was : lest Horsensium there, and with speed returned again towards the right wing of his Enemies, from whence Sylla was gone, hoping he had left it unfurnished of a sufficient Captain to command them. Taxilles on the other fide, caused his Copper Targets also to march against Murana: so as the noise they made on both sides, caused the Mountains to ring again, wherewithall Sylla stayed, standing in doubt which way to take. At the last he resolved to return to the place from whence he came, and sent Hontenging with four Enfigns to aid Murene: and himself with the fifth in great speed went towards the right wing of his Army, the which was now already bickering, and joyned with their Enemies, fighting hand to hand with Archelaus. By reason whereof, when Sylla was come with his aid, shey sylla's victory did easily distress them, and after they had broken their array. They did the soll ship of Milwilluts did easily diffres them : and after they had broken their array, they chaled them a flying for Lite Lieutenaus. to the River, and unto the Mountain Acontium. But Sylla notwithanding forgat not Murana, but went again to his relief; and finding that he on his fide had also put the Enemies to flight, followed him with the chale of them that fled. There was a marvellous flaughter made in that Field of the Barbarous People, and many of them supposing to have recovered their Camp, were flain by the way: so as of all that infinite multitude of fighting men, there escaped onely ten thousand, who saved theinselves by flying unto the City of CHALCIDE. Sylla for his part writeth, that he could make reckoning of no more but fourteen of his Souldiers onely that were flain, whereof there came two again to him the fame night. Wherefore in the marks of Triumph which he fet up for tokens of that Victory, he caused to be written on the top thereof, Mars, Victory, and Venus: fignifying thereby, that he had overcome in these Wars as much by good fortune. as by force, policy, or Martiall discipline. These marks of Triumph were set up for the Battell as by totte, pointy, or mattern ancepture where Archelana began to flye, even unto the River and the head when the wan in the plain Field, in that place where Archelana began to flye, even unto the River won in the of Molus. And he fet up another also on the top of Mount Thurium, where the Barbarous People plain of Ewere set upon behind : and there is written in Greek Letters .: That the valiant deeds of Omologic latea. chus and Anaxidamus, gave way to the winning of this Victory. Sylla for the joy of this great Molus fl. won Battell , caused Mustitians to Play in the City of THEBES, where he builded a Stage for all the Musitians near unto the Fountain OEdipus, and certain Noble GRECIANS were appointed Judges of that Musick, whom he caused to be sent for out of other Cities, because he mortally hated the THEBANS: infomuch as he took from them half their Lands, which he confecrated unto Apollo Pythias, and Jupiter Olympias, appointing that of the revenue thereof, they should redeliver Apollo Pythias. and pay back the Money which he had taken and carried away from out of their Temples. Sylla af- Jupiter Olymter this having intelligence that Flaceus, one of his Enemies, was chosen Consull at Rome, and pion. had passed the Sea Ionium with an Army, under pretence to make War against King Mithridates, sull wente-but indeed to make Wan with himself: took his journey towards Thessaly to meet him, gaint sold. But when he was in the City of MELITEA, there came News to him out of all parts, that there was a new and second Army of the Kings arrived, no less then the first, the which spoiled and destroyed all the Countrey which he had left behind him. For Dorylaus one of King Mithri- Dorilaus Midates Lieutenants , was arrived in the City of CHALCIDE with a great fleet of Ships, having thridates Gebrought thither with him fourfcore shouland fighting men, the best trained, the best Armed and appointed Souldiers that were in all his Kingdom of PONTUS in ASIA : and from thence went into BOFOTIA, had all that Countrey at commandment, and fought to fight with Sylla, notwithstanding that Archelaus alledged many reasons to diffiwade him from it : and surthermore, gave it out in every place, that so many thousand of Souldiers could not have been cast away in the first Battell, without some notable treason. Whereupon Sylla returned with all possible speed, and made Dorylaw know before many days paffed over his head, that Archelaw was a wife man, and knew well enough the worthiness and valiant courage of the ROMANS. And Dorylaus having had but a little proof unely in certain light skirmishes which he made against Sylla, about Tilphosion in THESSALY: himself was the first that could say then, it was not for them to hazard Battell. but rather to draw out the Wars in length, and supplant the ROMANS with charge and expence. And yet notwithstanding, the commodity of the great large plain that lyeth all about ORCHO-MENE, where they were encamped, gave great encouragement to Archilam, who judged it a very fit place to give Battell in , specially because he was the stronger of Horsmen in the Field. For all the The goodly plaines that are within the Countrey of BOEOTIA; the greatest and largest of them, is the plain plain before near to the City of ORCHOMENE, which is altogether without Trees, and runneth out in length the City of unto the Marshes where the River of Melas disperseth it felf abroad. The head of the same River Orchomene. is not far from the City of ORCHOMENE, and that River of all other Rivers of GREECE, from The River of the were head whence it cornects is possible, and had be fellowed by the control of the were head whence it cornects is possible, and had be fellowed by the control of the were head whence it cornects is possible and had be fellowed by the control of the were head whence it cornects in the control of the were head whence it cornects in the control of the were head whence it cornects in the control of the were head whence it cornects in the control of the were head whence it cornects in the control of the were head whence it cornects in the control of the were head whence it cornects in the cornects in the were head whence it cornects in the cornects in the cornects in the cornects in the were head whence it cornects in the cornect in the the very head whence it cometh, is navigable: and hath befides another fingular property, that it ri-tire thereof. feth and swelleth even in the longest Summer days , as the River of Nilus doth, and bringeth forth the felf same Plants and Trees, saving that they bear no Fruit, neither are they so great as those of ÆGYPT. This River hath no long course, because that the most part of the Water runneth into lakes and Marishes covered with Brambles and Briars, and there is but a very little part of it that falleth into the River of Cephifus, in the place that the Reeds grow where they make good Flutes withall. When they were camped one near to another, Archelaus lay quietly and stirred not: but Sylla presently cast great Trenches from one side to another, to stop the way against their Enemies, that they could not come into that great plain, where they might have taken what ground they would for their men of Arms, and have driven the ROMANS into the Marithes. The Barbarous People not being able to endure that, so soon as their Captains had given them liberty, discharged with such a fury, that they did not onely featter them that wrought in Sylla's Trenches, but put the most part of their guard also that stood in Battell ray to defend them, in a marvellobs rear , who also began to fly. Which Syla perceiving, lighted fraight from his Horfe, and taking an Enfigr in his hand, ran through the middeft of his men that fled; untill he came to his Enemies; and crying out, Syllas words faid unto them: O my ROMAN Souldiers, mine Honour commandeth me to die here, and thereto animate his fore when any man asketh you where you forfook your Captain; remember that you answer; It was at Orchomene. They were so ashamed at these words, that he made them turn: befides that, there came two Cohorts unto him from the right wing of his Battell, who under his leading gave such a hot charge upon their Enemies, that they fled forthwith upon it. That done, Syllia retired with his men, and made them dine : and thereupon by and by fet them again to the Trenches to enclose his Enemies Camp, who then came out in better order then they did before there was Diogenes, Archilaus Wives Son slain, fighting valiantly before them all; in the right wing of their Battell. And the bow-men being pressed so near by the ROMANS, that their Bowes viould do no good, took their Arrows in their hands in flead of Swords, and ftrake their Enemies with them, to force them to give back, untill fuch time as at the last they were all driven into their (amp, where they passed that night in great forrow, as well for the loss of them that were flain, as also for the number of those that were hurt. The next morning, Sylla leading his men again towards the Camp of his Enemies, went on still continuing his Trenches: and certain of them being come out to skirmish with them, he fet upon them to luftily, that at the first charge he put them to flight. That brought such a fear to all the whole Camp of the Enemies, that not a man durft abide any longer: fo as Sylla valiantly following on his Victory, fluffled in among them as they fled, and in the end took altogether. Straightway all the Marishes were filled mong ment as they are a ment and an are that took an agent and the lake full of dead Bodies: fo that untill this prefent day they find there in that place many Bows of the Barbarous People, Morians, pieces of Taffes, and Swords drowned in place many nows of the national reopie, mortains, pieces of raises, and swords drowned in the mud of the Marishes, notwithstanding that it is well-near two hundred years ago fince this well-near two hundred years ago fince this of Sylla orecrame Battell was stricken. And thus much for the Wars about the Cities of Choeronea and Arabelaus in ORCHOMENE. Now the Wars being past in this fort in GREECE, Cinna, and Carbo dealt very cruelly and unnaturally at ROME with the Noblemen and greatest Persons; by reason whereof, Datters at Charactes and many flying their Tyranny, went to Sylla's Camp, as unto the Haven of their health and fulness of felicity, fo that in short time Syllahad an Assembly of a ROMAN Senate about him, Metella her felf, his Wife, having stolen away very hardly with her Children, came to bring him News that his Houses in the City and Countrey both, were all burnt and destroyed by his Enemies: praying him that he would go and help them that yet remained at ROME. Sylla upon hearing of these News, fell in great perplexity. For on the one fide, it grieved him to fee his Countrey fo milerably afflicted: and on the other fide, he knew not well how he might go, leaving fo great an enterprise that war was, and specially against a King of such might and Power as Mishridates shewed he himself to be. And being in the dumps, there came one Archelism a Merchantto him, born in the Girm of Power in the Archelism a Merchantto him, born in the City of Delium, who brought him a fecret message from the other Archelam, King m the City of Dellow, who orough him a rected menage from the office at Architam and himfelf might meet and talk together. So at the length they met by the Sea fide, near unto the City of Delium, where there is a Temple of Apollo. Arekelans began to enter the talk with him, declaring unto Sylla, that he would wish him to leave the Conquest of Asia, and of the belaur at their Realm of PONT, and to return into his Countrey to the civil Wars at ROME: and in fo doing, the King would furnish him, not onely with as much Money, but with as many Ships and men, as he himself would defire. Sylla upon this motion told him again, that he would wish him to forlake Mithridates service, and to make himself King, offering to Proclaim him a friend and confederate of the ROMANS, fo that he would deliver him all the Navy which then he had in his hands. Archelam feemed much to abbor to hear him speak of treason. But Sylla going on with his tale, replied again unto him: Why Archelam, faid he, thou that art a CAPPADOLIAN, and Servant to a Barbarous King, or his Friend at the leaft: haft thou fo good a heart with thee that for all the benefits I offer thee, thou wilt not once commit an ill act ? And art thou indeed fo bold to speak to me of treason, which am the ROMANS Lieutenant Generall, and Sylla? As if thou wert not he, that at the Battell of CHOERONEA didft fave thy felf by flying, with a small number lest thee of fix score thousand fighting men, which thou before hadst in thy Camp: and that hid thy felf two days together in the Marishes of ORCHOMENE, leaving the Fields of BOBOTIA with such heaps of dead Bodies , that no man could pass for them? After this reply, Archelass altered his speech, and falling down at Sylla's feet, humbly befought him to end this War, and to make Peace with Mithridates. Whereunto Sylla answered; that he was very well contented withall. And thereupon Peace was concluded between them under conditions: that Mithridates should depart from ASIA the less, and from PAPHLA GONIA, that he should refore BITHYNIA unto Nicomedes, and CAPPADOCIA unto Ariobarzanes, that he should pay two thouland Talents to the ROMANS, and give them threefcore and ten Gallies, with all their Furniture. And upon this, Sylla would also affure him the rest of his Realm : and would cause him to be chears in Mi-Proclaimed a friend of the ROMANS. These Articles being past by agreement betwist them, Syllas taking his journey through THESSALY and MACEDON, into the Countrey of HELLESPONT, carried Archelau with him, whom he honourably intreated. For Archelau falling dangeroully field of a difeafe in the City of LARISSA, he stayed there for him, and was very carefull to recover him, as if he had been one of his chiefest Captains and Companions. And this was the cause that made the Battell of CHOBRONEA, as if he had not faithfully fought it out, nor Syllatruly workies but by treason. And again , Archelans was the more suspected , because Arthelans su-Sylla redelivered Mithridates all his Servants and Friends which he had Prisoners, saving the Tyrant specied of trea. Ariftion that kept ATHENS, whom he poyfoned, because he was Arefulam Enemy: but specially lon, Ariftion that kept ATHENS, whom he polytoned, became he was Arebrian Enemy: but specially for the Lands Sylla gave unto this CAPPADOCIAN. For he gave him tenthousland Jugera, (or Ariftion Ty. 13th of A Enemy of the Ro. 13th of Alberty. Acres of Land) within the Isle of Europea, and gave him more over the title of a Friend of the Ropoyloned by MANS for ever. But Sylla denyeth all these things in his Commentaries. In the mean time, 50/la. Ambassadors came from King Mithridates unto Sylla, who told him that the King their Master did Mithridates. Ambaliagors cance from a significant of Peace, faving that he onely prayed him he would not take the ception to the Countrey of PAPHLAGONIA from him: and as for the Gallies, he would not fo much as once fay conditions, he would promife them. Sylla being offended herewith, angerly answered them again: Then Mithridates (as ye fay) meaneth to keep PAPHLAGONIA ftill, and refuseth to give the Ships I demanded : where I looked that he would have humbly thanked me on his knees , if I left him his right hand onely, with the which he put fo many ROMAN Citizens to death. But I hope to make him tell me another Tale, if I come once into Asia: but now at Pergamus, he speaketh his pleafure of this War which he hath not feen. The Ambassadours being afraid of his words, replied not again. Whereupon Archelaus spake, and besought him with tears in his eyes to be contented, and took him by the hand. By intreaty, in the end he obtained of Sylla to fend him unto Mt- Archelmu fent thridates: promifing that he would either bring him to agree to all the Articles and conditions of from syllato Peace that he demanded, or if he could not, he would kill himself with his own hands. Upon Mithridates. this promife Sylla fent him away, and in the mean while entred with his Army into the Countrey of MEDICA: and after he had destroyed the most part thereof, returned back again into MACE-DON , where Archelam being returned from Mithridates , found him near unto the City of PHILIPPES, bringing him News that all should be well: howbeit that his Master Mitbridates prayed him he might speak with him in any case. Now the matter that made Mithridates fo earnest to speak with Sylla, was chiefly for Fimbria: who having slain Flacem the Confull, being of the contrary faction unto Sylla, and certain of Mithridates Lieutenants also, went himself against him to fight with him. Mithridates fearing his coming, chose rather to make himself Sylla's friend. So Mishridates and Sylla met together in the Countrey of TROADE, in the City of DARDANE, Mithridates being accompanied with a fleet of two hundred fale of Ships Sylla and Miwith Oars at Sea, with twenty thousand Footmen, fix thousand Horse, and a number of Armed thridates meet Carts with Sithes befides by Land, Sylla having onely but four Enfigns of Footmen, and two at Dardage. handred Horsmen. Mishridates went to Sylla, and offering to take him by the hand : Sylla asked him first, if he did accept the Peace with the conditions which Archelaus had agreed unto, Mi. The source of Sylla. thridates made him no answer. Sylla following on his Tale, faid unto him: It is for suters to speak Mitbridates first, that have request to make: and for Conquerours, it is enough to hold their peace, and hear excuses himwhat they will fay. Then began Mithridates to excuse himself, and to lay the occasion of the War, self to Sylla, partly upon the ordinance of the gods that fo had appointed it, and partly also upon the ROMANS 5944's answer themselves. Whereunto Sylls replyed, that he had heard of long time that Mithridate was an Elo. to Mithridate. quent Prince, and that he knew it now by experience, seeing that he lacked no comely words to cloke King of Bihis foul and shamefull deeds : but withall he sharply reproved him , and drave him to confess thrais. the cruelties he had committed. And afterwards asked him again, if he did confirm that which driobarganes Archelaus had done. Mithridates, made answer, that he did. Then Sylla faluted, embraced King of Capand kissed him: and calling for the Kings Nicomedes and Ariabarkanes, reconciled them together, and made Mithridates their friend again. In conclusion, after Mithridates had delivered Sylla threefcore and ten Gallies, and five hundred Bow-men, he returned by Sea into his Realm of PONTUS. But Sylla hearing that his Souldiers were angry with this Peace made with Mi- Abundred and thridates, because they could not abide to behold that King, whom they accounted for their most cruell fifty thousand and mortall Enemy, having in one felf day caufed a bundred and fifty thousand Roman Citizens in one day in to be flain, that were dispersed abroad in divers places of ASIA) so to depart, and go his way safe, Asia by Miwith the riches and spoils of the Countrey, which he had bereft them of, and used at his pleasure, thridates comthe space of forty years together: answered them in excuse of himself, that he was not able to mandment. make Wars with Mithridates, and Fimbria both, if once they were joyned together against him. Finbria.

And in Salla denseting thence went against Einbria, who then was encouned near to be Council Camped at And so Sylla departing thence went against Fimbria, who then was encamped near to the City of Toharya. THYATIRA, and lodged himself as near unto him as he conveniently might. Now whilest he was compassing in his lodging with a Trench, Fimbria's Souldiers came out of their Camp in their Fimbria flain; Coats without any Armour or Weapon, to falure "ylla's Souldiers, and holp them very friendly to make up their Teench: which Fimbria feeing, and perceiving his Souldiers minds to changed, of sylla very an extream fear which he had of Sylla, at whose hands he looked for no mercy, killed himself histly interin his own Camp, Salla hereupon condemned the whole Countrey of Asia the lefs, to pay the ted them of fum of twenty thousand Talents amongst them, and presently also he undid many poor Housholders through his infolent Souldiers, lying long upon their charge, which he leit in Garrison there. For he ordained that every Housholder should give the Souldier that lodged in his House, four Tetradrachmas a day, and should be bound to give him and his friends (as many as he would bring with him) their Supper also : and that every Captain should have lifty Drachmaes a day . a night Gown for the House, and a Garment to go abroad into the City when he thought good, When he had given this order, he departed from the Ciry of Ephrisus with 'all his fleet, and in three days fayling arrived in the Haven of PIREA at ATHENS, where ternity of the Mysteries, and reserved for himself the Library of Appeals, roas: in the which were the most part of Arifforle and Theophrasim Works , not then thought meet to come in every mans hands. And they fay, that this Library being brought to ROME, Tyrannion the Grammarian found the means to extract a great part of them : and that Andronics the Rhodian having recovered the originals into his hands, published them, and wrote the summaries which we have at this prefent: For the ancient Periparetick Philosophers were of themselves very Wise and Learned men, but they had not all Arifeotles Works, nor Theophrastu amongst them, and yet those few they had, were not by them feen all whole and perfect together; becaule that the goods of Nolew Scepsian (to whom Theophrastus left all his Books by will) came to fall into the hands of mean ignorant men, who knew not the Vertue and estimation of them. And surthermore, Sylla being at ATHENS, had fuch a pain and numnels in his Leggs, and was fo heavy withall, that Strabo calleth it a spice of the gour, that is to say, a feeling or entring thereinto, which then began to root and take hold of him. Upon which occasion he took the Seas, and went unto a place called Andipsum, where there are naturall hot Bathes: and there remained a while foliating himfeli all the day long with Musick, seeing of Playes, and entertaining such kind of People. Upon a day as he walking by the Sea fide, certain Fisher-men made him a Present of Fish, which pleased him marvellous well: and demanding of them whence they were: they answered him again, that they were of the City of Ales. What? of Ales faid he : is there any of them yet left alife? fpeaking it, because that after the Battell of ORCHOMENE, when he followed the chase of his Enemies, he nt, occasio cum and taken and destroyed three Cities of BOEOTIA all at one self time, to wit, Anthedon, LARYMNA, and ALES. The poor Fisher-men were so amazed with these words, that they stood fill, and could not tell what to say, Sylla fell a laughing thereat, and bad them go their ways a Gods Name, and not be afraid, for they brought no small intercessours with them, which were worth the reckoning of. When Sylls had given them these words, the ALEIANS went home with a merry heart, to gather themselves together again in their City. Sylla so passing through THESSALY and MACEDON, came to the Sea fide, intending to go from the City of DYRRACHIUM unto Bubbles of fire Brundus 1114 with a hundred and twenty fail. The City of Apollonia is hard by Dyrra Chium, and thereabouts is a Park confecrated unto the Nymphs, where in a fair goodly green Meadow, in many places there cometh out great bubbles of Fire that Flame continually: and it is faid, that there Direction.

Assayie taken was a Saryre taken fleeping, even in the very felf fame form the Painters and Image-gravers have fet him out. He was brought unto Sylla, and being asked by all forts of Interpreters what he was, he broughtto syl-made no answer that a man could understand, but onely put forth a sharp voice like the neying of a Horle, or whinning of a Goat. Sylla wondering at it, abhorred him, and made him to be carried from him as a monstrous thing. Furthermore, when Sylla had imbarked his men to pass the Sea, he was afraid that so soon at they had landed in lTALY, they would shrink from him, and every man go home to his own City. But they fware and promifed first of themselves, that they would man gand keep together, and by their wills would do no hurt in ITALY. Moreover, perceiving that he ftood in need of Money, they offered him of theirs, and every man to lend him as his ability ferved. But Sylla would none, yet thanked them for their good will: and after he had exhorted them to fight like Valiant Souldiers, he went against fifteen Generals of Armies of his Enemies, who had four hundred and fifty Enfigns of Footmen well Armed, as he himself writeth in his Commentaries. But the gods promifed him good fortune in his Wars, by many fundry apparent For in a Sacrifice he made by TARENTUM, after he was come on Land, the Liver of a certain Beast sacrificet, was altogether fashioned after the manner of a Crown or Garland of Epheum Most. Lawrell, out of the which did hang two Bands or Rolles. And a little before he went into CAMPA-NIA, near unto the Mountain Epheum, there appeared two great Goats in the day time fighting together, even as two men do when they fight: which nevertheless was no matter of truth, but a Vision onely that appeared, and rising from the Earth, dispersed it self by little and little here and there in the Ayr, and in the end vanished quite away as Clouds which come to nothing. Shortly after, in the self same place, Marim the younger, and Norbanim the Confull, who brought two great Armies against him, were overthrown by him, before he had fet his men in Battell, or had appointed any man in his place where he should fight: and this proceeded onely upon the courage and Life of his Souldiers, whose good will to serve against them was such, as following this Victory, he compelled the Confull Norbanus after he had flain fix thousand of his men, to take the City of CAPUA for his the burning of refuge. This Noble exploit (as himfelf reported) was the cause that his men kept so well together, the Capitally that they went neither home to their Houles, nor made any reckoning of their Enemies, although they were many against one. And he saith surthermore, that in the City of SILVIUM, there was a flave of one Pontins a Citizen, who being inspired with a Prophetical Spirit, came to tell him from the goddes Bellows, that he should grow in strength, and carry away the Victory of these Wars: howbeit that if he did not hie him the fooner, the capitoll at Rome should be burnt. And so it fell out the fame day according to his words, being the fixteenth day of the Moneth called Quintilia and now July. And furthermore also, Lucullu (one of Sylla's Captains) being near unto the City of Figure 1 and furthermore also, Lucullu (one of Sylla's Captains) being near unto the City of Figure 1 and 1 an dow upon Lut to be very well affected to ferve, because the most part of them were naked and unarmed, was a counts sometimes that the Battell and as he was even bethinking himself what was best to determine thereof, there role a little wind out of a goodly Meadow, that blew a wonderfull fort of Flowers upon the

This made Lucullus fouldeer more lutty a great deal then they were before, and with this good will they determined to Lucallus videogive a charge upon their enemies: whom they overthrew, flew eighteen thousand of them in the ry at Fidentia. field, and took their Camp. This Lucuilus was brother unto the other Lucuilus, that afterwards overthrew the Kings Mithridates and Tigranes. Nevertheless, Sylla perceiving that his enemies lav round about him with many great putifant Armies, thought good to use policy with force : and therefore practifed with Scipio one of the Confulls, to make peace with him. Scipio was willing to it : and thereupon were oft meetings and affemblies of both fides. Now Sylla drave off the conclufion of the peace as long as he could, ftill feeking occasion of delay, to the end that his fouldiers which were throughly acquainted with craft and fubtility as well as himself, might in the mean time corrupt Scipio's fouldiers by repair into his camp : for they coming into Scipio's Camp, being very sylla's policy converfant with them, ftraight corrupted some of them with ready money, other with promises, and with scipio. other with fair flattering words, and many goodly tales they told them. At the length, after this practife had continued a while, Sylla coming near unto Scipio's Camp with twenty Enfigns onely: all his men faluted Scipio's fouldiers, and they refaluting them again, yeelded themselves unto Svila. So as Scipio was left post alone in his Tent, where he was taken, but they afterwards let him go. So Sylla wan 40 Sylla with his twenty Enfigns, like to the Fowlers, that by their stales draw other Birds into their Enfigns from Nets, having gotten forty Enfigns from his enemies by his craft, brought them away with him into his Scipio by poli-Camp. There it was that Carbo said of Sylla, that he had to fight with a Fox, and a Lyon both: Carbo, saving but that the Fox did him more hurt and mischief then the Lyon. After this, Marius the younger of Sylls touch having sourfcore and five Enfigus in his Camp near unto the City of SIONIUM, presented battell ing the Fox unto Sylla: who having very good desire to fight, and specially on that day, because the night be- and Lion. fore he had feen this vision in his dream , that he thought he faw Mariss the Father who was de- Marius the ceased long before) warning his Son that he should come to him. Sylla for this respect desi- 80 Fishers red marvelloufly to fight that day: and thereupon caused Dolabella to come unto him, that was before presented Syllodged far from him. But the enemies stept between him and home, and stopped his passage to keep la Battel him from joyning with Sylla. Sylla's fouldiers to the contrary, fought to keep the way open for by the City him, with fo great labour and pain, that they were all weary and over harried. And furthermore, of Signum. there fell a marvellous great shower of rain upon them as they were busic opening the way, that in his drame troubled them more then the labour they had in hand. Whereupon the private Captains of the bands went to make Sylla understand it, and to pray him to defer the battell untill another day; shewing him how the fouldiers wearied with labour, lay down upon their Targets on the ground to take their ease. Sylla perceiving this, was contented withall, though greatly indeed against his will, But when he had given the fignall to lodge, and that they began to trench and fortifie their Camp Marius the younger cometh on horseback marching bravely before all his company, hoping to have furprised his enemies in disorder, and by that means to have overthrown them easily. But far otherwife did fortune then perform the Revelation which Sylla had in his forefaid dream : for his men falling in a rage withall, left their work in the Trench where they wrought, fluck their darts upon the bank, ran upon their enemies with their fwords drawn, and with a marvellous cry fet upon them fo valiantly, that they were not able to refift their fury, but fuddenly turned their backs and fled, where there was a great and notable flaughter made of them. Marine their Captain fled to the City of PRENESTE, where he found the Gates shut: but they threw him down a Rope from the wall, which he tyed about his middle, and fo wastriced up by it. Yet fome writers fay, and Feneftella among Marine fled to other, that Marins never faw the battell : for being wearied with labour, and very fleepy, he lay under Pranefic. fome tree in the shadow to rest a little, after he had given the signal and word of the battell, and slept so foundly, that he could feant awake with the noise and flying of his men. Sylla himself writeth, that he loft at this battell but three and twenty men, flew twenty thousand of his enemies, and took eight thoufand prisoners. His Lieutenants also had the like good success in other places, Pompeius, Crassus, Metellus, and Servilius : which without any loss of their men, or but with a very small, overthrew many great mighty Armies of their enemies. Infomuch as Carbo, the head and chief of all the contrary faction, and he that most maintained it, fled one night out of his Camp, and went beyond the feas into Africk. The last battell that Sylla had, was against Thelesinus SAMNITE, who coming Carbo Bed into like a fresh Champion to set upon him, when he was already wearied and had sought many battels, had almost slain him even at ROME Gates. For Thelesinus having gathered together a great number of Thelesinus the fouldiers, with one Lamponius Lucanian, marched with all speed towards the City of PRE. Samnite put NESTE, to deliver Marins the younger that was belieged there. But understanding that Sylla on Sylla in great the other fide came in great hafte also to meet him, and that Pomponius came behind him on the other danger. fide; and perceiving moreover that the way was to thut up, that he could go neither forward nor backward, being a valiant fouldier, and one that had been in many great foughten fields, most dangeroully ventured to go straight to ROME. And so stole away by night with all his whole power, and marching to Rom B-ward, had almost taken it at his first coming, for that there was neither watch nor ward kept; but he stayed happily ten furlongs from the Gate Collina, bragging with himself, and believing that he should do wonders, for that he had mocked so many great Captains. The next morning betimes came divers young Noblemen and Gentlemen out of the City to skirmish with Thelesinus : who slew a great number of them, and among o-others one Appine Claudine a young Gentleman of a Noble house, and very board. Whe (as you may easily imagine) the City trembled for fear, and especially the project, who fell a fifteening, and running up and down, as if they had been all taken. But in this great fear and trouble, Bulbus (whom Sylus had fent) came first with seven hundred horse upon the spur, and staying but a little to cool and give them breath, bridled straight again, and went to set upon the exemies, thereby to ftay then. Soon after him came Sylla allo, who commanded his men that came first, quickly to eat fomewhat, and that done, put them straight in battell ray : notwithstanding that Dolabella and Torquatus perswaded him to the contrary, and belought him not to put his souldiers wearied with their journey, to fo great and manifest a danger: and the rather, because they had not to fight with Carbo and Marins, but with the SAMNITES and LUCANS who were both warlike Nations and good fouldiers; and those besides that most deadly hated the ROMANS. But for all that, Sylla fent them back, and commanded his Trumpets to found the Alarm, being almost within four hours of night: and this battell was sharper and more cruell, then any other that ever he fought before. The right wing where Craffus was, had the better much: but the left wing was very fore diftreffed, and stood in great perill. Sylla hearing thereof, and thinking to help it, got up upon 97/lla's danger. 2 white courser that was both swift and very strong. The enemies knew him, and there were two that lifted up their Arms to throw their darts at him, whom he faw not : but his Page gave his horse such a lash with his whip, that he made him so to gird forward, as the very points of the darts came hard by the horse tale and stuck fast in the ground. Some say, that Sylla had a little golden image of Apollo, which he brought from the City of DELPHOS, and in time of wars wore it alwaies in his bosom, which he then took in his hand, and kissing it, said : O Apollo Pythias, haft thou so highly exalted Cornelius Sylla, so fortunate hitherto through so many famous victories, and wilt thou now with shame overwhelm him wholly, even at the very Gates of his own naturall City among his Countreymen? And fo crying out to Apollo for help, thrust into the prease among his men, intreating fome, threatning others, and laying upon the reft to fray them. But for all he could do, all the left wing of his Army was broken and overthrown by his enemies : and himself amongst them that fled, was compelled to recover his Camp with speed, having lost many of his friends and familiars. There were moreover many Citizens flain and troden under feet (both with horse and men) that came onely to see the battell fought : so that they within the City thought themselves verily undone. Lucretim Offella surthermore (he that besieged Marim in the City of PRENESTE) had almost raised his siege, upon the words of them that sled and came thither from the battell, who wished him to remove with all speed possible, for Sylla was slain, and Thelesinus Lucretius Ofhad taken ROME. Now about midnight came certain fouldiers from Crassius to Sylla's Camp, and asked for meat for Craffus tupper, and his mens, who having chafed his flying enemies whom he had Marius in Praoverthrown unto the City of ANTEMNA (which they took for refuge) had lodged his Camp reported contrary, there. Sylla understanding that, and being advertised that the most part of his enemies were overtrary, that 5/1. thrown at this battell, went himself the next morning betimes unto ANTEMNA, where three Labelieged Ma. thrown at this battell, went himself the next morning betimes unto ANTEMNA, where three thousand of his enemies sent to know if he would receive them to mercy if they yeelded themselves ger in Perufus, unto him. His answer was, that he would pardon their lives, so as they would do some mischief to their fellows before they came to him. These three thousand hereupon trufting to his promise, fell upon their companions: and for the most part one of them killed another. Notwithstanding Syland not in la having gathered all those together that remained of his enemies, as well the three thousand, as the reft, amounting in all to the number of fix thouland, within the shew-place where they used Three thoufand laved Antennas; and to run their horfes : whileft he himfelf held a councell in the Temple of the goddets Bellona, themselves in and was making his Oration there, he had appointed certain to fet upon those fix thousand, and put them to the fword every man. Great and terrible were the cries of fuch a number of men slain in yeelded to Sylfo fmall a room, as may easily be conjectured: infomuch as the Senators fitting in councell heard la upon promile of life. them very eafily, and marvelled what the matter was. But Sylla continuing on his Oration which Sylla against he had begun with a fer fleady countenance, without changing of colour, willed them onely to hearken what he faid, and not to trouble themselves with any thing done abroad, for they were mentobe flain but certain offenders and leud persons that were punished by his commandment. This was enough to shew the simplest ROMAN in ROME, that they had but onely changed the Tyrant, and not the tyranny. Now for Marim, that had ever been of a churlish and severe nature, even from his childhood, he never changed for any authority, but did rather harden his naturall stubborness. Where Sylla contrarily in the beginning, was very modest and civill in all his prosperity, and gave great good hope, that if he came to the Authority of a Prince, he would favour Nobility well, and yet love notwithstanding the benefit of the people. And being moreover a man in his youth given to all pleasure, delighting to laugh, ready to pitty, and weep for tender heart: in that he became after to cruell and bloudy, the great alteration gave manifest cause to condemn the increase of honour and authority, as the onely means whereby mens manners continue not fuch as they were geth conditions at the first, but still do change and vary, making some sools, others vain and phantastical, and Sylla the exothers extream cruell and unnaturall. But whether that alteration of nature came by changing his state and condition, or that it was otherwise a violent breaking out of hidden malice, which then came to shew it self, when the way of liberty was laid open : this matter is to be decided in some other Treatise. So it came to pass, that Sylla fell to shedding of bloud, and filled all ROME with infinite and unspeakable murthers : for divers were killed for private quarrells, that their wicked wills: untill at the length there was a young man called Caius Metellus, that was fo their wirked wans: until a cut rengal and these miseries should end, and when they should know the beldness of Caina Metelthat all the mileries were finished the which they daily faw. For, said he, we will not intreat you to last total sails pardon life, where you have determined death; but onely to put them out of doubt whom you his crueliv in have determined to fave. Whereunto Sylla made answer, that he was not resolved whom he would open Schate. fave. Metellus replyed, Then tell us (quoth he) who they are that shall die. Sylla answered, he would. Howbeit some say, it was not Metellus, but Ausidius one of his flatterers, that spake this last word unto him. Wherefore Sylla immediately, without making any of the Magistrates privy, caused sourscore mens names to be set up upon posts, whom he would put to death. Every man be- 8x11.4's prostriing offended with all, the next day following he fet up two hundred and twenty mens names more: Ption. and likewise the third day as many more. Hereupon, making an Oration to the people, he told them openly, that he appointed all them to die, that he could call to remembrance : howbeit that hereafter he would appoint them that should die, by days, as he did call them to mind. Whosoever saved an Outlaw in his house, for reward of his kindness, he himself was comdemned to die; not excepting them that had received their Brothers, their Sons, their Fathers, nor Mothers. And the reward of every homicide and murtherer that killed one of the Outlaws, was two Talents; though it were a flave that had killed his Mafter, or the Son that had flain the Father. But the most wicked and unjust Act of all was, that he deprived the Sons, and Sons Sons of them whom he had killed, of all credit and good name; and besides that, had taken all their goods as conflicate. And this was not onely done in ROME, but also in all the Cities of ITALY throughout : and there was no Temple of any god whatfoever, no Altar in any bodies house : no liberty of Hospitall, nor Fathers house, that was not embrued with bloud and horrible murther. For the Husbands were flain in their Wives arms, The murther and the children on their Mothers laps: and yet they which were flain for private hatred and malice, of Outlaws were nothing in respect of those that were murthered onely for their goods. And they that killed general them, might well fay, His goodly great house made that man die, his goodly fair Garden the other, Colonias American and his hot Bathes another. As amongst others, Quintus Aurelius, a man that never medled with livis a quiet man any thing, and leaft looked that thele evils should light upon him, and that onely pitied those that medled which he faw fo miferably murthered, went one day into the Market-place, and reading the Bill fet up not, flain for which he faw fo miterably murinered, went our tay into the Datace place, and reading the Diffict op his houle, of the Outlaws names, found his own name amongft the reft, and cryed out aloud: Alas the day Marius the that ever I was born, my houle of Alba maketh me be put to death. He went not far from the younger flew Market-place, but met with one that killed him prefently. In the mean time Marius the younger himself at feeing he could by no means escape if he were taken, slew himself. And Sylla coming to PRE. Pratielle. NESTE, did first execute them by one and by one, keeping a certain form of justice in putting Sylla flew them to death: but afterwards, as if he had no longer leifure to remain there, he caused them all twelve thou-fand men in to be put in a place together, to the number of twelve thousand men, whom he caused to be put to Pranctic being the fword every man, faving his Hoft onely; unto whom he faid, that he shewed him speciall favour all put into one to fave his life. But his Hoft answered him stoutly again, that he would not be beholding unto him place together. to fave his life. But his Hort answered mini towny again; that it would not be considered the Citi- Lucius Catilina for his life, feeing he had flain all the reft of his Countreymen: and for thrufting in amongst the Citi- flew his own zens. was willingly flain with them. They thought the Act of Lucius Catiline also very strange, brother. who had flain his own Brother before the Civil war was ended: and then prayed Sylla to put him in the number of the Outlaws, as if his Brother had been alive. Sylla performed his defire. Catiline thereupon to shew his thankfulness for the pleasure Sylla had done him, went presently and flew Marcus Marius, who was of the contrary faction, and brought him his head for a prefent before all the people, in the midft of the Market-place where he was fitting. When he had fo done, he went and washed his hands all bloudied in the hallowed Font of the Temple of Apollo, that was hard by. But befides fo many murthers committed, yet were there other things also that grieved the people marvelloufly. For he proclaimed himself Dictator, which Office had not been Sylla Dictator. of fixfcore years before in use, and made the Senate discharge him of all that was past, giving him free liberty afterwards to kill whom he would, and to confiscate their goods: to destroy Cities and to build up new as he lifted: to take away Kingdoms, and to give then where he thought good. And furthermore, he openly fold the goods confiscate, by the Cryer, fitting fo proudly and stately in his Chair of State, that it grieved the people more to fee those goods packt up by them to whom he gave and disposed them, then to see them taken from those that had forseited them. For some times he would give a whole Countrey, or the whole Revenues of certain Cities, unto women for their beauty, or unto pleasant Jesters, Minstrels, or wicked slaves made free : and unto fome he would give other mens wives by force, and make them to be married against their wills. For he desiring (howsoever it happened) to make alliance with Pompey the Great, commanded him to put away his wife he had married; and taking Amylia (the Daughter of Emylius Scaurus, and of Metella his wife) from the great Glabrio, caused him to marry her great with child as the was by Glabrio : but the died in childbed in Pompeys house. Lucretius Offelia also that had brought Marius the younger to that diffress at the City of PRENESTE, suing to be Confull, Sylla commanded him to cease his suit: but he notwithstanding that express commandment, went one day into the Market-place, with a great train of men following him that favoured his cause : whither Sylla sent one of his Centurions that slew Offella before all the people, Lucretin Offel. himself sitting in a Chair of estate in the Temple of Castor and Pollux, and seeing from above the mur- lassair. ther done. The people that were about Offelia, laid hold of the murtherer straight, and brought him before Sylla : but Sylla bad them be quiet that brought the Centurion with tumult, and that they should let him go, because he commanded them to do it. Furthermore, as touching his Triumph, it was a fumptuous fight to behold, for the rarenels of the riches, and Princely spoils which were shewed at the same. But yet was it so much the better fet out, and worth the fight, to see the banished ROMANS, who were the chiefest Noblemen of all the City of Rome, following his Chariot triumphant wearing Garlands of flowers on their heads, calling Sylla their Father and faviour : because that by his means they returned to their Countrey, and recovered their goods, wives and children. In the end of his triumph, he made an Oration, in open affembly of the people of ROME, in the which he did not onely declare unto them (according to the custom) what things he had done, but did as carefully tell them also as well of his good fortune and success, as of his valiant deeds befides : and to conclude his Oration, told them that by reason of the great favour fortune had shewed him, he would from thenceforth be called by them, Felix, to fay, happy or fortunate. And he himself when he wrote unto the Grecians, or that he had any thing to do with them, furnamed himself Epaphroditus, as who would say, a pleasant man, beloved and savoured of Venus. His tokens of triumph which are yet in our Countrey, have this superscription : Lucius Cornelius Sylla Epaphrodi-And when his wife Metella had brought him two twins, a Son and a Daughter : he named his Son Faultus, fignifying fortunate, and his daughter Faulta: because the Romans call Faultum named Fairflux and Failth that which falleth our proferously and happily. To be short, he trusted so much anto his good fortune and doings, that notwithstanding he had killed and put so many men to death, and had made so great a change and innovation in the Commonwealth, yet of himlelf he left off his Office of Dictator, and reftored the people to the authority of election of Confulls again, without his prefence at the election: and frequented the Market-place as a private man among the Citizens, offering himself to every man that would ask him account of his doings past. It happened that a stout and rath enemy of every man that would ask min account of man one of the people had his was chosen Confull against his will, called Marcus Lepidus, not for any devotion the people had ms was choicen Continul against time with, caned extension Deprime, not for any devotion the people had Mircur Lepidur, but onely to gratific Pompey, who gave countenance and favour unto him. Sylla feeing choicen Conful. Pompey come nerry homewards from the Election, and joyfull that he had obtained his friends fure from all other futers: took him afide, and told him: Indeed thou haft great cause to rejoyce, young man my friend, for thou hast done a goodly act, to choose Marcus Lepidus Confull, the veriest Ais in all ROME, before Carulus the honestest man. But I tell thee one thing, thou hast not need to sleep; for thou haft ftrengthened an enemy, that will be thy own destruction. And Sylla proved a true Prophet: for Lepidus being bent to all cruelty immediately after, flatly fell at defiance with Pompey. Now Sylla confecrating the diffuse of all his goods unto Hercules, made exceeding fumptious feafts unto the ROMANS, the provision whereof was so unreasonable great, that every day they threw a great deal of meat into the River, and they drank wine of forty years old and above. During these teasts which continued many days, his wife Mitella fickened, and died, and in her fickness the Priefts and Soothlayers willed Sylla he should not come near her, nor suffer his house to be polluted and defiled with mourning for the dead. Whereupon Sylla was divorced from her in her fickness, and caused her to be carried into another house, whileft the lived. And thus did Sylla curiously observe the superfittion and ordinance of the Soothlayers: but yet he brake the Law which he made himfelf, touching the order of Funerals, sparing no cost at Metella's buriall. So did he also break another order himself had made, touching the reformation of bankets: comforting his forrow with ordinary feafts, full of all vanity and lafeiviousnels. Within a few months after, he had Fencers games at the fharp: and the rooms of the Theater being open and unfevered, men and women fitting together, it fortuned that there was a fair Lady, and of a noble houle, that fate hard by Sylla, called Valeria: the was the Daughter of Melfala, and fifter of Hortenfius the Orator, that had been divorced not long before from her husband. This Lady passing by Sylla behind him, did foftly put her hand on his shoulder, and took a hair from off his Gown, and so went on to her place, and fate her down. Sylla marvelling at this familiarity, looking earneftly upon her: It is nothing my Lord (quoth she) but that I desire with others to be partaker a little of your happiness. Her my Lord (quotisme, out that racine wan outside that the had tickled him with them; for he words milliked not Sylla, but contrarily he shewed that she had tickled him with them; for he words minuscumor symm, our contrary in the fent straight to ask her name, and enquired of what house she was, and how she had lived. But after many flie looks between them, they turned their faces one to another upon every occasion, with prety fmiling countenances: so that in the end, they came to promise and contract marriage together, for the which Valeria was not to be blamed. For though she was as wife, as honeft, and as vertuous a Lady as could be possible, yet the occasion that made Sylla marry her, was neither good nor commendable, because he was taken straight with a look and a fine tongue, as if he had been but a young Boy : which commonly shew forth the filthiest pattions of the mind, to be to carried, and with fuch motions. Now, notwithftanding he had this fair young Lady in his house, he left not the company of women Ministrels and Tumblers, and to have pleasant Jesters and Musitians about him, with whom he would lie wallowing and drinking all the day long, upon little Couches made for the nonce. For, his companions that were in greatest estimation with him at that time, were these three: Roscim a maker of common Plays, Sorax a Prince of Scoffers, and one Metrobius a Singing man, whom he was in love withall while he lived, and yet did not diffemble his love, though he was past his Age to be beloved. This wicked life of his was cause of increasing his disease, the original cause whereof had light foundation at the first. For he lived a great time before he perceived that he had an Impostume in his body, the which by process of time came to corrupt his flesh in such fort, that it turned all to lice: fo that notwithstanding he had many men about him, to shift him continually night and day, yet the Lice they wiped away were nothing, in respect of them that multiplyed ftill upon him. And there was neither apparell, linnen, bathes, wathing, nor meat it felf, but was prefently filled with fwarms of this vile vernine. For he went many times in the day into the Bath to wash and cleanse himself of them, but all would not serve: for the changing of his sless into this putriture wan it straight again, that there was no cleanfing, nor thisting of him, that could keep fuch a number of lice from him. Some fay, that in old time (amongst the most ancient men, whereof there is any memory) Acastus the Son of Pelius, died of the lowsseevil : and long time after also, Divers samthe Poet Aleman, and Pherecides the Divine ; and fo did Callifthenes OLYNTHIAN in prison, and our men that Mutius a wife Lawyer. And if we shall make mention of those that are famous, although it be not in any good matter : we find that a bondman called Eurius, he was the first procurer of the wars of the bondmen in SICILIA, being taken and carried to ROME, died also of the fame disease. Furthermore. Sylla did not onely foresee his death, but he wrote something of it also: for he made an end of writing the two and twentieth Book of his Commentaries, two dates before he died. In that Book 57/1/34 Comhe faith, that the wife men of CHALDEA had told him long before, that after he had lived honourably, mentaries conhe should end his daies in the flower of all his prospectity. And there he faith also, that his Son (who departed a little before his Mother Metella) appeared to him in his fleep), apparelled in an ill layouwas dead apparelled. In an ill layouwas dead apparelled. red Gown, and that coming unto him, he prayed him he would go with him unto Metella his Mother, peared to him thenceforth to live in peace and reft with her. But for all his difease, he would not give over to deal in in his dream matters of State. For ten daies before his death, he pacified a fedition and tumult rifen among the in ill favoured inhabitants of the City of Puteola Num (in Italian called Pozzolo) and there he gave them apparell. Laws and Ordinances, whereby they should govern themselves. And the day before he died, hearing that Granius who was in debt to the Commonwealth, deferred payment of his money looking for itrangled in his death : he fent for him, and made him come into his Chamber, and there caused his men to com. Sylla stight, by and commanded them to ftrangle him in his fight. The paffion of his anger was fo his own comwhement against him, that by the extream straining of himself, he brake the Impostume in his body, fo as there gushed out a wonderfull deal of bloud : by reason whereof his strength failing him, he was full of pain and pangs that night, and fo died, leaving the two little children he had by Metella. Splis death. For Valiera, was brought to bed of a Daughter after his death, which was called Posthumia, because the ROMANS call those children that are born after the death of their Fathers, Posthumi. Now when Posthumi. Sylla was dead, many gathered about the Confull Lepidus, to let that his body should not be honourablv buried, as they were accustomed to bury Noblemen and men of quality. But Pompey, though he was angry with Sylla, because he had given him nothing in his Will, and had remembred all his oa ther friends : yet he made some for love, some by intreaty, and others with threatning to let it alone. and accompanying the Corps into Rome, gave both fafety and honour unto the performance of his funerals. And it is faid also, that the ROMAN Ladies amongst other things, bestowed such a quantity of perfume and odoriferous matter towards the same : that besides those which were brought in two hundred and ten great Baskets, they made a great image to the likeness of Sylla himself, and another of a Sergeant carrying the Axes before him, all of excellent Incense and Ginamon. When the day of sylla's funerals, the Funerals came, fearing left it would rain in the forenoon, all the Element being so cloudy, they deferred to carry forth the body to be burnt, untill past three of the clock in the afternoon. And then rose there such a sudden boisterous wind, that it set all the stake of wood straight on fire, that the body was burnt at a trice; and the fire going out, fell a great shower of rain that held on till night: so that it seemed, good fortune following him even to his end, did also help his obsequies after his death, His Tomb is to be feen in the field of Mars: and they fay that he himfelf made his own Epitaph that Sylla's Epitaph is written upon it, which was: That no man did ever pais him, neither in doing good to his friends. nor in doing milchief to his enemies.

den. For it is certain that Lyfander did great wrongs to gratifie his familiars : and the most part of them whom he put to death, was to establish the Tyrannicall power of certain his friends. Where Svilla fought for spite to take away his Army from Pompey and the Admiralty from Dolabella, which himself had given him , and caused Lucretius Offella to be slain openly in his own fight, because he fought to be Confull, for recompence of the good service he had done : for which cruelty of his caufing his own friends to be flain in fuch fort, he made every man afraid of him. Furthermore, chaftiry, himself in the mean time did nothing but follow love, and commit adulteries, as Salus writeth. By means whereof he so much impoverished Rome, and left it so void of Gold and Silver, that for ready money he fold absolute freedom unto the Cities their confederates, yet was it his daily study to confiscate and take forfeit, the richest and most wealthy houses in all the whole City of ROME. But all this spoil and havock was nothing in comparison of that which he daily cast away upon his jesters and flatterers. What spring, or measure may we think he kept in his gifts and private bankets, when openly in the day time (all the people of ROME being prefent, to fee him fell the goods which he had caused to be conflicate) he made one of his friends and familiars, to truss up a great deal of houshold stuff, for a very little price? and when any other had outbidden his price, and that the Cryer had cried it out aloud : then he was angry, and faid : My wealth of SPARTA, with other money, the very prefents that were given to himself. And yet I do not commend him in that deed. For, peradventure he did more hurt to SPARTA, bringing thither that Gold and Silver, then Sylla did to ROME, in wasting and consuming that he consumed, Howbeit i alledge this onely for proof and declaration, that Lyfander was nothing covetous. They both have done that unto their City, which never any other but themselves did. For Sylla being a riotous and licentious man, brought his Citizens notwithstanding to good order and government; and Lyfander contrarily filled his City with vice, yet not infected withall himself. Thus were they both offenders, the one for breaking the Law he commanded to be kept, and the other in making the Citizens worse then he was himself : for he taught the SPARTANS to desire those things.

which he above all things had learned to despise. And thus much concerning peace and Civil govern-

him) being rightly confidered, was no great exploit of war, howbeit it was a noble Act, con-fidering the fame he wan by it. And as for things which happened to him in BOEOTIA, hard by the City of ALIARTE; a man might fay peradventure that he had ill luck. But yet me thinks also there was a fault in him, for that he staied not for King Pausanias aid (the which came from PLATÆES immediately after his overthrow) and because he went in a gair , in fury , and in a vain ambition to run his head against a wall : so that men of all forts making a desperate fally out of ALIARTE upon him, flew him there to no purpose. Far unlike to Cleombrotus that died at the battell of LEUCTRES, refifting his enemies that diffressed his men : nor yet like Cyrus, nor Epaminondas, who to keep his men from flying, and to give them affured victory, received his deadly wound : for all these men did like noble Kings , and valiant Captains. Where Lyfander rashly cast hmfelf away, to his great difinonour, by too much venturing: proving thereby, that the ancient SPARTANS did like wife men, to avoid the fight with walls. For the nobleft and valiantest man that is, or possible can be, may easily be so slain, not onely by the first souldier that cometh, but by every filly woman or child. As they fay, that the worthy Achilles was killed by Paris within the very Gates of TROIA. Now to the contrary again, the victories that Sylla wan in fet battells, and the thousands of enemies which he slew, are not easily to be numbred, besides also that he took the City of ROME twice : and the haven of ATHENS, not by famine as Lysander did, but by force, after he had by many great battells driven Archelaus out of firm land into the main fea. It is to be confidered also, against what Captain they made wars. For me thinks it was but a pastime, as a man might fay, for Lyfander to fight with Antiochus, a Pilot of Alcibiades, or to furprise and deceive Philocles, a common Orator at ATHENS:

THE COMPARISON OF LYSANDER with SYLLA.

Ow that we have at large also set forth the Life of the ROMAN, let us come to compare them both together. In this they are both alike, that both of them grew to be great men, rifing of themselves through their own vertue: but this onely is proper to Lyfander, that all the Offices and Dignities which he attained unto in the Commonwealth, were laid upon him through the peoples good wills and confents: for he compelled them to nothing, neither ulurped he any extraordinary Authority upon them, contrary to the Law : for the common faying is:

Where partiality, and discord once do raign: There wicked men are most esteem'd, and rule with greatest gain.

As at that time in ROME, the people being corrupted, and the flate of Government utterly subverted and brought to nought : to day there rose up one Tyrant , to morrow another. And therefore we may not wonder if Sylla usurped and ruled all, when such fellows as Glauciae and Saturnius, did both banish and drive out of Rome such men as Metellus was : and where also in open assembly they flew the Confulls Son in the Marker-place, and where force of Arms was bought and fold for Gold and Silver, with the which the fouldiers were corrupted: and where they madenew Laws with fire and fword, and forced men to obey the same. Yet I speak not this in reproach of him that in such that in such that in such that it is the same time to make himself the greatest man: but to shew that I measure not his honefty by the dignity he grew unto in fo unfortunate a City, although he became the chief. And as touching him that came from Sparta (at what time it flourished most, and was the best governed Commonweal) he in all great causes, and in most honourable Offices, was reputed for the best of all bests, and the chief of all chiefs : whereof it came to pass, that the one did often refign up his Authority to his Citizens, which they had given him, who also restored it to him again many and fundry times; for the honour of his vertue did alwaies remain, and made him juftly accounted for the worthieft man : where the other being onely once chosen Generall of an Army, remained ten years continually in wars and hostility, making himself by force, sometime Confull, sometime Vice-confull, and sometime Dictator, but alwaies continued a Tyrant. Indeed Lyfander, attempted to change and alter the flate of Covernment in his Countrey, howbeit it was with great lenity, and more lawfully then Sylla did. For he fought it by reason, and good persuafion, nor by the fword: neither would he make a change of the whole at one felf time as Sylla did, but fought onely to reform the Election of Kings. The which thing according to nature, doubtlefs feemed very just: that he which was the best amongst good men, should be chosen King of that City, which was the chief over all GREECE, not for her Nobility, but for her vertue onely. For like as a good hunter doth not feek for the Whelp of a good Dog, but for the good Dog himfelf: nor a wife man of Arms also, the Colt that cometh of a good Horse, but the good Horse himself. Even so, he that taketh upon him to stablish a Civil Government, committeth a foul fault, if he look of whom his Prince should be born, and not what the Prince himself should be, considering that the LACEDEMONIANS themselves have deprived diverse of their Kings from their Crown and Realm, because they were not Princely, but unprofitable, and good for nothing. Vice, although it be in a Noble man, yet is alwaies ill of it felt : but vertue is honoured for her felf alone, and not because she is placed with Nobility. Now for the wrongs and injuries they both committed,

The chief perfon is not alwaies the honestest.

Which practed still, and honesty did never once esteem.

their behaviours touching coveronines and pleasure doth shew, that the intent of the one was the defire of a good Brince, and the other that of a Tyrant. For we'do not find that Lyfander, for all Lyfaniers tenhis great Princely Authority idid ever use any infolency or lasely outliefs in his deeds, but alwaies perance and avoided as much as a man might, the reproach of this common Proverb : Lyons at home, and Foxes moderate life abroad : he led such a true LAGO MIAN life, straightly reformed in all points. Where Sylla could Sylla clicentinever moderate his unlawfull hifts, neither for poverty when he was young; nor age, when it ous and prodicame upon him. But whileft he gave Laws to the ROMANS, touthing Matrimonial honefty and Sall life, friends, I have great wrong done me here, not to suffer me to sell the spoil I have gotten, at mine sylla's tyranniown pleasure, and dispose it as I list my self. Wherefore Lyfander contrarily fent to the Common-call saying.

ment. Now for matters of war and battells fought, there is no comparison to be made of Ly. Sylla for wars fander to Sylla, neither in number of victories, nor in hazard of battell. For Lyfander wan to be preferred analy by two barelle by Grander was before Lyfander with Calculate with the control of the City of Anymore which Calculate was before Lyfander with the control of the City of Anymore which Calculate was before Lyfander was to be preferred to the control of the City of Anymore which Calculate was before Lyfander was to be preferred to the control of the City of Anymore which Calculate was to be preferred to the control of the City of t onely but two battells by sea, befides the taking of the City of ATHENS: which (though I grant der.

ITALY, were there any ever more valiant, then Lamponius and Thelesimus: of the which Sylla drave the one away, and brought the other to obey him, and flew the two laft? But the greatest matter of all that we have spoken of yet, in my opinion was, that Lysander did all his Noble Acts, with the aid of his whole Countrey, where Sylla to the contrary did his (being banished from his Countrey) by his enemies. And at the felf fame time they drave Sylla's wife out of ROME, that they overthrew his houses, and slew his friends also in ROME: he notwithstanding made wars in the mean time with infinite thoulands of fighting men in BOEOTIA, and ventured his person in manifold dangers, fo that in the end he conquered them all, to the honour and benefit of his Countrey. Furthermore, Sylla would never stoop to King Mithridates, for any particuliar Allance he offered him, neither yeeld unto him for any aid of men, or money, to war against his enemies : but (a thing most chiefly to be noted above the reft) he would not vouchfase to speak to Mithridates, nor to take him by the hand onely, before he had spoken it with his own mouth, and faithfully promifed, that he would forgo Asia, deliver him his Gallies, and give up the Realms of BITHYNIA and CAPPADOCIA unto their naturall King. This methinks was the goodlieft Act that ever Sylla did, and proceeded of the greatest magnanimity, to have preferred the benefit of the Commonwealth in that fort, before his Sylla's magnaprivate commodity. For therein he was like unto a good Greyhound, that first pincheth the Dear, and holdeth him fast till he have overthrown him, and then afterwards followeth the purfuit of his own private quarrell. And lastly, me thinks it is easily judged, what difference there was between their two Natures, in that they did both towards the City of ATHENS. For Sylla having taken it, after the Citizens had made herce wars with him for the increase of King Mithridates greatness: yet he left it free unto them, enjoying their own Laws. Where Lyfander to the contrary, seeing such a mighty State and Empire as that overthrown from the great rule it bare, had no pity of it at all, but took away the Liberty of popular government, whereby it had been governed of long time before, and established there very cruell and wicked Tyrants. And therefore in mine opinion, we shall not much swerve from the troth, if we give judgement that Sylla did the greater Acts, and Lyfander committed the fewer faults. And that we give to the one the honour of a continent and modest man; and to the other, the commendation of a valiant and skilfull Souldier.

All they that came of that race, were commonly men of great courage, and naturally given to the wars: who were fo forward and adventurous in all dangers thereof (in the invalions of the MEDES into GREECE, and in the battells of the Gauls) that they were flain all of them, but onely Damon (a little child left fabatters of the Caulty that they were ham an of them, but onerly Damon (a interfact and in the there is and motherlefs, furnamed Periphus that effected, who for goodly personage and noble courage excelled all the lufty youths of his time, though otherwise he were very rude, and of a of Damon fevere nature. Now it fortuned, that when Damon was grown of full age, a ROMAN Captain of Peripolisis. an Enlign of footmen (lying in Garrison for the Winter season in the City of CHERONEA) sell in great love with Damon : and because he could not reap the fruits of his dishonest love by no intreaty nor gifts, there appeared vehement prefumptions, that by force he went about to abuse him. for that CH. ERONEA at that time (being my naturall City where I was born) was a small thing, and (being of no strength nor power) little regarded. Damon mistrusting the Captains villany, and detefting his abominable defire, watched him a shrewd turn, and got certain of his companions (not many in number, because he might the more secretly compass his enterprise) to be of counsell with him, and take his part against the Captain. Now there were sixteen of them in consort together, that one night blacked their faces all with foot, and the next morning after they had drunk together, by the break of day fet upon this ROMAN Captain, that was making facrifice in the Market-place, and flew him with a good number of his men : and when they had done, fled out of the City, which was ftraight in a great uproar for the murther committed. Thereupon they called a Counfell, and in the Market-place condemned Damon and his confederates to fuffer pains of death: hoping thereby to have cleared their innocency for the fact done unto the ROMANS. But the felf fame night, as all the Magistrates and Officers of the City were at supper together in the Town-house according to their cuftom: Damon and his followers stole upon them suddenly, slew them all, and fled again upon it. It chanced about that time, that Lucius Lucillus being fent on some journey, paffed by the City of CHERONEA with his Army, and because this murther was but newly done, he stayed there a few days to examine the troth and originall thereof : and found that the Commons of the City were in no fault, but that they themselves also had received hurt: whereupon he took Lucius Lucius the fouldiers of the ROMANS that remained of the Garrifon, and carried them away with him. examined the In the mean time, Damon destroyed all the Countrey thereabout, and still hovered near to the City, infomuch as the inhabitants of the fame were driven in the end to fend unto him, and by gentle words and favourable decrees handled him to, that they inticed him to come again into the City: and when they had him amongst them, they chose him Gymnasiarchus, to say, a master of exercifes of youth. But shortly after, as they were rubbing of him with oil in his stove or hot-house, flark naked as he was, they flew him by treason. And because there appeared Spirits of long time after in that place, and that there were heard groanings and fighings as our fathers told us, they caused the door of the hor-house to be walled up; yet for all that, there are visions seen, and terrible voices and cries heard in that felf place unto this prefent time, as the neighbours dwelling by do testifie. Now they that were descended of this Damon (for there are yet of his race in the Countrey of Phocides, near anto the City of Stiris, who do onely of all other both keep the Language and manners of the ÆTOLIANS) are called ASBOLOMENI, fignifying Black, and befineaguage and instances and that Damon and his fellows did black their faces with foot, when they flew the ROMAN Captain. But the ORCHOMENIANS being near neighbours unto the CHERO-NEIANS, and therefore their enemies, hired an informer of ROME, a malicious accuser, to accuse the whole City (asifit had been one private person alone) for the murther of the ROMANS, whom Damon and his companions had flain. The Inditement was drawn, and the case pleaded before the Governour of MACEDON, for that the ROMANS did fend no Governours at that time into GREECE: and the Counfellours that pleaded for the City of CHARONEA, relied upon the testimony of Lucius Lucullus, referring themselves to his report, who knew the troth and how it was. Thereupon the Governour wrote unto him, and Lucullus in his Letter of answer advertised the very troth: fo was our City cleared of the acculation, which otherwise flood in danger of utter destruction. The Inhabitants of the City of CHERONEA, for they had escaped the danger by testimony of Luciu Lucullus, to honour him withall, they fet up his image in stone in the Market-place, next unto the image of Bacchus. And we also that be living at this present, though many years be gone and passed fince, do notwithstanding reckon our selves partakers of his forepassed benefit. And because we are perswaded, that the image and portraiture that maketh us acquainted with mens manners and we are perimanen, that the manners and conditions, is far more excellent, then the picture that representeth any mans person or shape onely: we will comprehend his life and doings according to the troth, in this volume of Noble mens Lives, we will compare and fort them one with another. It shall be sufficient for us therefore, that we where we do compare and fort them one with another. where we us compare and the state of the state of the world milke, for reward of his fnew our felves thankfull for his benefit: and we think, that he himfelf would millike, for reward of his true testimony, to be required with a favourable lie told in his behalf. But like as when we will have a patting fair face drawn, and lively counterfeited, and that hath an excellent good grace withall, a parting that late drawn, and the perfection in it, we will not allow the drawer to leave it out altogether, nor yet too curioully to shew it, because the one would deform the counterfeit, and the other make it very unlikely. Even so, because it is a hard thing (or to say better, peradventure unpossible) to describe a man, whose life should altogether be innocent, and perfect : we must first fludy to write his vertues at large, and thereby feek perfectly to represent the troth, even as the life it felf. But where by chance we find certain faults and errours in their doings, proceeding either of passion of the mind, by the necessity of the time or state of the Commonwealth: they are rather to be thought imperfections of vertue not altogether accomplished, then any purposed wickedness proceeding of vice, or certain malice. Which we shall not need too curiously to express in our History, but rather to pass them lightly over, of reverent shame to the meer frailty of mans nature, which cannot bring forth a man of fuch vertue and perfection, but there is ever fome imperfection in him. And therefore, confidering with my felf unto whom I might compare Luculius. I thought it best to compare him with Cimon, because they have been both valiant souldiers against they were alike, their enemies, having both done notable exploits in wars against the Barbarous people : and moreover, they have both been courteous and mercifull unto their Citizens, and were both the onely men that pacified the Civill wars and diffention in their Countrey, and both the one and the other of them wan notable victories of the Barbarous people. For there was never GRECIAN Captain before Cimon, nor ROMAN Captain before Luculius, that had made wars fo far off from their Countrey, leaving apart thedeeds of Bacchus and of Hercules, and the Acts also of Perseus against the ETHIOPIANS, the MEDES, and the ARMENIANS: and the deeds of Jason also, if there remain any monument extant fince that time, worthy of credit in these our days. Furthermore, herein they are to be likened together, that they never ended their wars : they onely overthrew their enemies, but never overcame them altogether. Again, we may note in them a great refemblance of nature, for their honesty, curtesie and humanity, which they shewed unto strangers in their Countrey: and for the magnificence and sumptuousness of their life and ordinary expence. It may be we do leave out fome other fimiliaudes between them: howbeir in the discourse of their Lives they easily appear. Cimon was the Son of Miliades and of Cimons linage. Hegespyle, a THRACIAN woman born, and the Daughter of King Olorus, as we find written in certain Poeticall Verses which Melambius and Archelaus have written of Cimon. The father of Thucydides the Historiographer himself, who was of kin also unto Cimon, was called in like manner Olorus, shewing by the agreeing of the name, that this King Olorus was one of his ancestours, and did also possess Mines of Gold in the Countrey of THRACIA. It is said moreover, that he died in a certain place called the Ditchy Forrest, where he was slain : howbeit that his ashes and bones were carried into the Countrey of ATTICA, where his Tomb appeareth yet to this day, amongst the Tombs of them of the house and family of Cimon , near unto the Tomb of Cimons own Sifter called Elpinice. Notwithstanding, Thucydides was of the Village of Alimus, and Miltiades of the Village of LACIA. This Militades, Cimons Father, being condemned by the state to pay the sum of Militades died fifty Talents, was for non-payment cast into prison, and there died : and left Cimon and his Sifter in prison. Elpinice alive, both Orphanes, and very young. Now, Cimon in his first young years had a very Gimon defame in his youth. ill name and report in the City, being counted a riotous young man, and a great drinker, following his Grandfather Cimons fashions up and down, as he had also his name : faving that his Grandfather for his beaftliness was furnamed Coalemos, as much to say, as fool. Stefimbrotus THRASIAN, who Coalemos, fool, was about Cimons time, writeth, that Cimon never learned Musick, nor any other of the liberall Sciences. accustomably taught to young Noble mens Sons of GREECE, and that he had no sharp wit, nor good grace of speaking, a vertue proper unto children born in the Countrey of ATTICA : howbeit that he was of a Noble mind, and plain, without diffimulation, fo that he rather lived PELOPONNESIAN Cinonic condilike, then like an ATHENIAN. For he was even fuch as the Poet Euripides described Hercules to be : tions,

A simple man he was, and could not well disquise : As honest eke in things of weight, as wit could well devise.

This served fitly to be applyed unto Stesimbrotus words written of him : but notwithstanding , in his This served may to be applyed und of symmetric with his Sifter, who indeed otherwise had no very first young years he was suspected of incontinency with his Sifter, who indeed otherwise had no very good name. For fhe was very familiar with the Painter Polygnotus, who painting the TROIAN La-Eljinite Cidies prisoners upon the Walls of the Gallery, called the Plefanattion, and now Pacife (to say, set chaste, the Callery of the out and beautified with divers Pictures) he drew (as they) Landices face upon Elpinices Picture, Th s Painter Polygnotus was no common Artificer nor hireling, that painted this Gallery for monies fake, Polignotus the but gave his labour franckly to the Commonwealth, as all the Historiographers that wrote in that Painter. time do witness; and as the Poet Melanthius also reciteth in these verses;

> At his own proper charge, great cost he hath bestowed. In decking up our Temples here with gilded Roofs embowed . For honour of the Gods. And in our tonque likewife . He hath adorn'd the common place, with many a fine devise; Painting and fetting forth, in stately shew to fee . The images of demy-gods that here amongst us be.

Yet some say that Elpinice did not secretly company with her Brother Cimon, but lay with him open- Elpinice being ly as his lawfull married wife, because she could not for her poverty have a husband of like Nobility poor, had reand parentage to her felf. Howbeit, that a certain man called Callias, being one of the richeft men in gard to match the City, did afterwards fall in fancy with her, and defired to marry her, offering to pay her father and her state and Miltiades fine of fifty Talents, wherein he stood condemned a debter to the State, so that hemight calling, have her to his wife. Cimon was contented, and upon that condition married his Sifter Elpinice unto Callias: This notwithstanding, it is certain that Cimon was somewhat amorous and given to love women. For Melanthim the Poet in certain of his Elegies , maketh mention for his pleasure of one Cimon subject Asteria born at SALAMINA, and of another called Mnestra, as if Cimon had been in love with them. life, But undoubtedly, he loved his lawfull wife Isodice marvellous well, the Daughter of Euryptolemus, Megacles Son, and took her death very grievoully, as we may conjecture by the Elegies that were written unto him, to comfort him in his forrow. Panatus the Philosopher is of opinion, that Archelaw the Physitian wrote those Elegies: and sure it is not unlikely, considering the time in which they were written. But furthermore, Cimons nature and conditions deferved great commendation. For The praise of his valiantness he gave not place unto Miltiades, and for his wisdom and judgement, he was not Cimons condiinferiour unto Themistocles : and it is out of all doubt that he was a juster and honester man, then ei-tions. ther of them both. For he was equal with the best of either of both in the discipline of wars, and for the valiantness of a noble Captain: and he did much excell them both in properties of a good Governor, and in the administration of the affairs of a City, when he was but a young man, and had no experience of wars. For who Themistocles at the coming in of the MEDES, counselled the people of ATHENS to go out of he City, to leave their Lands and Countrey, and to ship into Gallies, and fight with the Barbarous peple by sea in the straight of SALAMINA: as every man was wondering at his bold and venturous ccinfell, Cimon was the first man that went with a life and jolity through the street Ceramicus, uno the Castle, accompanied with his young familiars and companions, carrying a bit of a Bridle in his hand confecrate unto the goddels Minerva, fignifying thereby, that the City had no need other femen at that time, but of Mariners and Seamen. And after he had given up his Offering, he too one of the Targets that hung upon the Wall of the Temple, and having made his prayer unto Minerva, came down to the Haven, and was the first that made the most part of the Citizens to taket good heart to them, and couragiously to leave the land, Cimous persons and take the Sea. Befides all this, he was anan of a goodly stature, as Ion the Poet testifieth, and had age commenda fair curled hair and thick, and fought fo viantly at the day of battell, that he wan immediately great reputation, with the love and good will of evry man. So that many were still about him to encourage him to be lively and valiant, and to thin thenceforth to do fome. Acts worthy of the glory that his Father had gotten at the battell of MARAHON. And afterwards, fo foon as he began to deal in matters of State, the people were marvellos glad of him, and were wearied with Themistocles: by means whereof Cimon was prefently advaced and preferred to the chiefest Offices of honour in

But how was it then, that Cimons service was so acceptable to the ATHENI- Olive boughts ANS? It was in mine opinion, because they had with other Captains fought to defend themselves and their Countrey onely: and that under the conduction of Cimon, they had affaulted and driven their Enemies home to their own doors, where they conquered the Cities of E10 NE and of AM-PHIPOLIS, which afterwards they did inhabit with their own Citizens, and wan there also the He of Scyros, which Cimon took upon this occasion. The Dolopians did inhabit it, who Isle of Scyros. were idle People, and lived without labour or tillage, and had been Rovers on the Sea of a wonderfull long time, using Piracy altogether to maintain themselves withall: so that in the end they spared not fo much as the Merchants and Paffengers that harboured in their Havens, but robbed certain-THESSALIANS that went thither to traffick. And when they had taken their Goods from them. vet would they cast them in Prison besides. Howbeit the Prisoners found means to escape, and after they had faved themselves, repaired to the Parliament of the AMPHICTYONS, which is a generall The Council Council of all the States and People of GREECE. The Citizens refused to be dions. contributaries to the payment of the Fine, and bad them that robbed the Merchants, and had the Goods in their hands, pay it if they would. And therefore, because there was no other likelihood, but that the Thieves themselves should be driven to answer the Fine, they searing it, wrote Letters unto Cimon. and willed him to come with his Army, and they would deliver their City into his hands: the which was performed. And thus Cimon having conquered the Island, drave out the DOLOPIANS thence, and rid the Sea ÆGEUM of all Pyrates thereby. That done, remembring that the ancient Thefeus, the Son of Ageus, flying from ATHENS came into that Illand of SCYROS, where King Lycomedes suspecting his coming, had traiterously slain him: Cimon was marvellous carefull to seek out his Tomb, because the ATHENIANS had an Oracle and Prophecy, that commanded them to bring his ashes and bones back again to Athens, and to honour him as a demy-god. But they knew not where he was buried, for that the Inhabitants of the Island would never afore confess where it was, These bones nor suffer any man to feek it out, till he at the last with much ado found the Tomb, put his bones brought to A. aboard the Admiral Galley sumptuously decked and set forth, and so brought him again into his them four hun-Countrey, four hundred years after Thefeus death. For this, the People thanked him marvelloully, dred years after and thereby he wan exceedingly the ATHENIANS good wills, and in memory of him they cele- hisdorth by brated the judgement of the Tragical Plays of the Poets. Jon written that he being bur ayoung Boy, newly come from CH10 unto ATHENS, supped one night with Cimon at Laomedons Houle, and that after Supper when they had given the god thanks, (imon was entreated by the Company to fing. And he did fing with fo good a grace, that every man praifed him that heard him, and faid he was more courteous then Themissocles far: who being in like company, and requested also to play upon the Cithern, answered them, he was never taught to sing or play upon the Cithern, howbeit he could make a poor Village to become a rich and mighty City. After that done, the Company discoursing from one matter to another, as it falleth out commonly in speech, they entred in talk of Cimoni doings: and having rehearfed the chiefest of them, he himself told one, which was the notablest and wifest part of all the rest that ever he played. For the ATHENIANS and their Confederates together, baving taken a great number of barbarous People Priloners, in the Cities of Sestos and of BIZANTIUM, the Confederates to honour him withall, gave him the preheminence to divide the Spoil amongst them. Whereupon he made the division, and set out the bodies of the barbarous People all naked by themselves, and laid the Spoils and their Apparel by themselves. The Confederates found this distribution very unequal : but neverthelefs Gimon gave them the choice to choose which of the two they would, and that the ATHENIANS should be contented with that which they lest. So there was a Samian Captain called Herophyrm, that gave the Confederates counfell, rather to take the Spoils of the Persians, then the Persians themselves, and so they did: for they took the Spoil of the Prisoners Goods and Apparel, and left the men unto the ATHENIANS. Whereupon Cimon was thought at that time Herophysus S1 of the common Souldiers to be but an ill divider of Spoil, because that the Consederates carried away great flore of Chains, Carkanets, and Bracelets of Gold, and goodly rich Purple Apparel after the PERSIAN fashion: and the ATHENIANS brought away naked bodies of men, very tender and unacquainted with pain and labour. But shortly after, the Parents and Friends of these Prisoners, came out of PHRY GIA and LYDIA, and redeemed every man of them at a great Ranfom: fo that Cimon gathered fuch a maffe of ready Money together by their Ranfom, as he defrayed the whole charges of all his Galleys with the same for the space of four Months after, and left a great sum of Money besides in the sparing Treasure of ATHENS. Cimon by this means being now become rich, bestowed the Gondar Hotels Goods which he had thus honourably gotten from the barbarous People, more honourably again, in relieving his poor decayed Citizens: for he brake up all his Hedges and Inclosures and laid them plain and open, that Travellers paffing by, and his own poor Citizens, might take as much Fruit thereof as they would, without any manner of danger. And furthermore, he kept a continual Table in his Houle, not furnished with many Dishes, but with Meat sufficient for many persons, and where his poor Country trey men were daily refreshed, that would come unto that Ordinary: so as they needed not otherwise care to labour for their living, but might be the readier, and have the more leifure to ferve the Commonwealth. Yet Arifiotle the Philosopher writeth, that it was not for all the ATHENIANS indifferently, that he kept this ordinary Table: but for his poor Townsmen onely in the Village of LACIA, where he was born. Furthermore, he had always certain young men waiting on him of his Houshold Servants well apparelled, and if he met by chance as he went up and down the City, any old Citizen Cimors charity poorly arrayed, he made one of these young men strip himself, and change Apparel with the old man, and that was very well thought of, and they all honoured him for it. Moreover these young men carried ever good frore of Money about them : and when they met with any honeft poor Cirizen in the Market-place, or elsewhere, knowing his poverty, they tecretly gave him Money in his hand, and said never a word. The hospitali. The Name of Lychas SPARTAN hath been famous amongst the GRECIANS: and yet we know no other cause why, saving that he used to feast strangers that came to LACEDEMON on their Festival day, to fee the Sports and Exercites of the young men dancing naked in the City. But the magnificence of Cimon, did far exceed the ancient liberality, courtefie, and hospitality of the ATHENI-ANS: for they of all other were the first men that taught the GRECIANS throughout all GREECE, how they should sowe Corn, and gather it to maintain themselves withall, and also shewed them the use of Wells, and how they should light and keep fire. But Cimon making an Hospital of his own Houle, where all his poor Citizens were fed and relieved, and permitting strangers that travelled by his Grounds, to gather such Fruits there as the time and season of the year yielded: Cimens godly he brought again (as it were) into the World, the Goods to be common amongst them, as the Po-Cimor brought ets say they were in the old time of Saturns Reign. And now, where some accused this honest little Golden berality of Cimen, objecting that it was but to flatter the common People withall, and to win their World again, good wills by that means: the manner of life he led , accompanying his liberality, did utterly confuse and overthrow their opinions that way of him. For Cimon ever took part with the Nobility, and lived after the LACEDEMONIANS manner, as it well appeared, in that he was alwaies against Themisfacles, who without all compass of reason increased the Authority and Power of the People: and for this cause he joyned with Aristides and was against Ephialtes, who would for the Peoples and for this caute he follows and abolished Areopagus Court. And where all other Governors in his time Cimens intewere Extortioners and Bribe-takers, (Arifides, and Ephialtes onely excepted) he to the contrary led an uncorrupt life in administration of Justice, and ever had clean hands, whatfoever he spake or did hands for the State and Commonwealth, and would therefore never take Money of any man living. And for proof hereof, we find it written, that a Nobleman of Persia called Refaces, being a Tray-Refaces attor to his Mafter the King of Persia, fled on a time unto Athens, where being continually bai- tempted to ted and wearied with the common acculations of these tale-bearers and pick-thanks that accused him bribe Cimon. to the People, he repaired at the length unto Cimon, and brought him home to his own door two Bowls, the one full of Daricks of Gold, and the other of Daricks of Silver, which be pieces of Daricks. Money to called, because that the name of Davius was written upon them. Cimon feeing this of- whereof focalfer, fell a laughing, and asked him whether of the two he would rather choose, to have him his led. friend or his hireling. The barbarous Noble man answered him, that he had rather have him his friend. Then faid Cimon to him again, Away with thy Gold and Silver, and get thee hence: A noble faying for if I be thy friend, that Gold and Silver shall ever be at my commandment, to take and dif- of Cimon. pole it as I have need. About that time began the Confederates of the ATHENIANS to be weary of the Wars against the barbarous People, defiring thenceforth to live quietly, and to have leifure to manure and husband their grounds, and to traffick also, considering that they had driven their Enemies out of their Countrey, and that now they did them no morehurt: by reafon whereof they payed the Money they were feffed at, but they would furnish no moe men nor Ships as they had done before. But the other Captains of the ATHENIANS compelled them to do it by all the means they could, and profecuted Law against them that failed payment, condemning them in great Fines, and that to cruelly, that they made the Seigniory and Dominion of the ATHENIANS hatefull unto their Confederates, Howbeit. Cimon took a contrary course to them: for he compelled no man, but was content to take Money and void Ships of them that would not or could not ferve in their persons, being very glad to suffer them to become slothfull Mongrels in their Houses, by too much rest, and to transpose themselves from good Souldiers which they had been, to Labourers, Merchants, and Farmers, altogether altered from Arms and Wars, through the beaftly flothfull defire they had to live pleafantly at home. And contrarily, causing a great number of the ATHENIANS one after another to ferve in Galleys, he fo acquainted them with conber of the Athenians one after another to serve in Ganeys, he to acquainted them with conpains and fertinual pains in his Voyage, that he made them in fhort space become Lords and Masters over them, vice, and the that gave them pay and entertainment. For they began by little and little to flatter and fear the A-difcommodity THENIANS, whom they faw trained continually in the Wars, ever bearing Armour, and carry- of eafe and ing their Weapons in their hands, becoming expert Souldiers at their charge, by reason of the Pay identification they gave them: fo that in the end, they became Subjects and Contributaries as it were unto them, where before they were their friends and companions. So as there never was GRECIAN Captain that bridled more the cruelty and Power of that mighty PERSIAN King, then Cimon did: for Cimon plagued after he had driven him out of all GREECE, he left him not so, but following him soot-hot, as the Persians we commonly fay, before the barbarous People could take breath, or give wife and direct order for their doings, he made to great speed, that he took some of their Cities from them by force, and other some by practice, causing them to rebell against the King, and turn to the GRECIANS fide: infomuch as there was not a man of War left for the King of PERSIA in all ASIA, from the Countrey of IONIA, directly down to PAMPHYLIA. And furthermore, being advertised that the Kings Captains were upon the Coast of PAMPHYLIA, with a great Army by Sea, because he would fear them in such fort, that they should not dare any more to shew themselves upon the Sea, on this side of the Illes of the CHELIDO NIANS: he departed from the Isle of GNI-Dos, and from the City of TRIOPIUM, with two hundred Galleys, the which at the first had been excellently well made and devised by Themistocles, as well for swift failing, as for easie turning. Howbeit Cimon made them to be enlarged, to the end they might carry the greater number of men of War in Battle, to affault the Enemies. And so went first against the PHASELITES (who were GRECIANS born, and yet notwithstanding would neither take the GRECIANS part, nor receive their Army into their Havens) landed there, destroyed all the Countrey, and then came and camped with his Army hard at their Walls. But the men of CH10 being ancient friends of the PHA- ChipanIste. SELITES, and in Cimon: Army at that Journey, did somewhat pacific his anger, and gave advertilement to them of the City of their doings, by Letters, which they tied to their Arrows, and shot over the Walls. So as in the end they procured their peace, with condition, that the PHASE-LITES should pay ten Talents for a Fine : and furthermore, should also follow the Army of the Cimon wantle GRECIANS, and from thenceforth fight with them, and for them, against the barbarous People. CIMON. The Son of Gobrias, was the Kings Lieutenant, having thief Authority over the whole Army that lay at Anchor before the River of Eurymedon, and had no defire to fight, because they looked for the Kings a new supply of fourscore Sail of the PHOENICIANS, that should come to them from Cyhis whole Ar. PRUS. But Cimon contrarily, fought to fight before these Galleys of the Phoenicians my by Sa, 11- came to join with them, and put his Galleys in order of Battle, determining to give a Charge, dig at Anchor and compell them to fight, would they, or would they not; which the barbarous People perceibetore the R1- ving, drew nearer into the mouth of the River Eurymedon, because they should not compass them ver of Eurymein behind, nor force them to come to Battle against their wills. Which notwithstanding, when they faw the ATHENIANS come to fet upon them where they lay, they made out against them a Fleet of fix hundred Sail, as Phanodemus declareth: or as Ephorus writeth, three hundred and fifty Sail onely. But they did nothing worthy of fo great a Power, at the leaft touching the Fight by Sea, but turned their Prores straight to the River: where such as could recover the mouth thereof in time, faved themselves, flying to their Army by Land, which was not far from that place, But the reft that were taken tardy by the way, they were slain, and Sea and Land, set also in order of Battle. But the reft that were taken tardy by the way, they were slain, and their Gallies funk or taken: whereby we may know that there were a great number of them: for many were faved, as it is likely, and many also were splitted to pieces, and yet the ATHENI-ANS took two hundred of them Prifoners. In the mean feafon, their Army by Land came near to the Sea fide: which Cimon perceiving, stood in fome doubt, whether he should land his men River of Eury- or not, because it seemed a hard and dangerous thing unto him, to land in spight of his Enemies. and to put forth the GRECIANS already wearied with the first Battle against the barbarous People, who were altogether whole, fresh, and lusty, and withall many in number against one. Nevertheles, perceiving that his mentrufted in their force, besides the courage which the first Victory gave them, and that they defired none other thing but to fight with the Enemies: he put them on Land while they were hot yet with the first Battle. And so with great fury and loud cries they ran immediately against the barbarous People, who stood still and stirred not, and received their first Charge very valiantly: by reason whereof, the Battle grewsharp and bloody, insomuch as there were slain all the greatest Personages and men of best account of all the ATHENIANS Army. But the other fought it out so valiantly, that in the end they wan the Field, and with marvellous difficulty made the barbarous People fly, whereof they flew a great number in the place, and took the rest Prisoners, with all their Tents and Pavillions, which were full of all sorts of Riches. Thus Cimon like a valiant Champion of the holy Games, having in one felf-day won two Victories, and having excelled the Battle by Sea also which the GRECIANS had won within the Channell of SALAMINA, with that which he wan then upon the Land: and the Battle which the GRE-CIANS wan by Land before the City of PLATERS, with that which he wan the day before on the Sea : yet was he not contented with all this. For after two fo famous Victories obtained, he would once again fight for the honour of the Tokens of Triumph : and being advertised that the fourscore Sail of the PHOENICIANS (coming too late to be present at the first Battle by Sea) were arrived at the head of Hydra, he failed thither with all possible speed. Now the Captains of this Fleet knew no certainty of the overthrow of their chiefest Army, but stood in doubt of it, and would not be perswaded that it was overthrown in that fort : and therefore were they so much the more afraid, when they discried afar off the victorious Army of Cinion. To conclude, they loft all their Ships, and the greatest part of their men, which were either drowned or flain. This Victory against the Persians did so daunt and pluck down the pride and losty mind Cimos brought of the barbarous Persian King, as he made that condition of Peace so much spoken of in the King of ancient Histories, in the which he promifed and sware, that his Armies thenceforth should come Perfia to con- no nearer to the GRECIAN Sea, then the cariere of a Horse; and that he would fail no fardition of peace, ther forward then the Isles CHELIDONIANS, and CYANEANS, with any Galleys or other Ships of War. Howbeit the Historiographer Califthenes writeth, that it was no part of any Article comprised within the Condition of Peace, but that the King kept it for the fear he had of this fo great an Overthrow : and that afterwards he kept fo far from the GRECIAN Sea, that Pericles with fifty Sail, and Ephialtes with thirty onely, did fail beyond the Iles CHELIDONIE, and no barbarous Fleet ever came against them. Yet notwithstanding all this, amongst the common Acts of ATHENS, which Crateron hath gathered together, the Articles of this Peace are found written at large, as a thing that was true indeed. And it is faid, that for this occasion the ATHENIANS built an Altar of Peace, and that they did Calls as great honour, for that he was Ambassador to fent Ambassador unto the King of Persia to take his Oath for confirmation of this Peace. So take the Oath when all these Spoils of the Enemies were fold to them that would give most, there was such of the King of store of Gold and Silver in the sparing Coffers of their Treasury, that there was enough to serve their turn for any service they would employ it to; and besides that, they had sufficient to build up the side of the Wall of the Castle which looketh towards the South, this Voyage and great Spoil did fo inrich them. And it is faid moreover, that the building of the long Walls that joyn to the City, with the Haven, which they call the legs, was built and finished afterwards: howbeit the first foundations thereof were built with the Money Cimon gave towards it, for that the Work met with Moorish and watry places, by mean whereof they were driven to fill up the Marshes with force of Flints and great Logs, which they threw unto the bottom. It was he also that first did beautifie and set forth the City of ATHENS, with places of liberal exercise and honest pastime, which shortly after were much efteemed. For he cauled plain Trees to be fet in the Market-place : and the Academy which before was very dry and naked, he made it now a pleasant Grove, and full of goodly Springs which he brought into it, and made fine covered Arbours to walk in, and goodly long smooth Alleys to run a good course in. On a time he had news brought him, that certain Persians dwelling in CHERRO NESUS (to fay, a demy Isle of the Countrey of THRACIA) would not be gotten out, but fent to the People of high THRACIA, to pray their aid to defend themselves against Cimon: of whom they made but little account, because he was departed from ATHENS with a very few Ships, who set upon them onely with four Galleys, and took thirteen of theirs. And so having driven the PERSIANS out of Cherron Esus, and fubdued the Thracians, he conquered all the Country of Cherro-the Profession NESUS. from THRACIA unto his own Countrey. And departing from thence, went against them of ont of Thracia the Isle of Thasos, that had rebelled against the ATHENIANS: and having overcome them in Battle by Sea, he wan three and thirty of their ships, and besides that took their City by Siege, and wan the Mines of Gold lying beyond the fame to the ATHENIANS, with all the Lands that belonged unto them. This Conquest made his way open into MACEDON, and gave him great opportunity to have taken the best part thereof at that present time. But because he let it alone, and followed not that opportunity, he was suspected to have taken Money, and to have been bribed by Presents of King Alexander : whereupon his secret Enemies laid their heads together, and accused him. But Cimon to clear Cimon accused himself before the Judges of this accusation, said unto them: I have practised friendship neither with and discharged the IONIANS, nor yet with the THESSALIANS, both which are very rich and wealthy People: neither have I taken their matters in hand, as some other have done, to receive both honour and profit by them. But indeed I am a friend to the LACEDEMONIANS; for I confess I love them, and desire to Cimon praiseth follow their fobriety and temperance of life, the which I prefer and efteem above any Riches or Trea- the temperate fure: although I am very glad notwithstanding to enrich our State and Commonwealth with the spoils life of the Laof our Enemies. Stefimbrotus reporteth this accusation, and saith, that his Sifter Elpinice went to ecdamonians. Pericles house, (who was the sharpest and straightest accuser of his) to pray him not to deal so extreamly withher Brother: and that Pericles laughing on her, faid: Alas, thou art too old, Elpinice, shou, now to overcome these matters. Yet for all that, when Cimons cause came to hearing, he was a * Arcopagus more gentle adverfary then any other of his accusers, and role up but once to speak against him, and was a Village of that for manners fake onely: fo that Cimon thereby escaped, and was cleared of this accusation. And Mars by Afurthermore, fo long as he was prefent in ATHENS, he always kept the feditious People in obedience, Judges called who would ever crofs and thwart the Authority of the Nobility, because they would have all the sway Arcopacita did and rule in their own hands. But when Cimon was fent abroad any whither to the Wars, then the fitto judge caucommon People having no body to gainfay them, turned and altered the Government of the City top. les of murder, fie turvey, and confounded all the ancient Laws and Customs which they had observed of long time, and weighty matthat by the procurement and fetting on of Ephialtes. For they took away all hearing of Causes in manner from the Court of * Areopagus, and put all Authority of matters judicial into the hands of the the Common-People, and brought the state of the City into a pure Democratia, to say, a Commonweal ruled by wealth, the sole and absolute power of the People, Pericles being then in great credit, who altogether savoured Democratia, who altogether favoured Democratia, who altogether favoured Democratia, to say, a Commonweal ruled Democratia, the sole of the People Democratia, to say, a Commonweal ruled Democratia, the sole of the People Democratia, to say, a Commonweal ruled Democratia, to say, a Commonweal ruled Democratia, the sole of the People Democratia, to say, a Commonweal ruled Democratia, the sole of the People Democratia, the sole of the sole of the People Democratia, the sole of the sole of the People Democratia, the sole of the sole the Peoples Faction. Wherefore Cimon at his return, finding the Authority of the Senate and Counmonalty cil fo shamefully defaced and trodden under foot, was marvelloully offended withall, and sought to re- Pericles in Ciftore the ancient State of Judgement again as it was before, and fet up the Government of the Nobility mons absence (called Optimatia) that was established in the time of Clisthenes. But then began his Enemies again with reduceth the open mouth to cry out upon him, reviving the old former naughty rumour that ran of him before, that weakbuntothe made against Cimon :

And if it be so, that being thus negligent and given to Wine, he have gotten so many Cities, and wor fuch fundry great Battles: it is out of doubt then, that if he had been fober and carefull, there had never been before him nor fince, any GRECIAN Captain that had paffed him in glory of the Wars. Indeed it is true, that from the beginning he ever loved the manner of the LACEDEMO-NIANS: for of two twins which he had by his Wife Clitoria, he named the one of them Laceda- Cimon followed monius, and the other Eleus, as Stefimbrotus writeth, faying, that for that cause Pericles did ever nian manner, twit them in the teeth with their Mothers stock. Howbeit Diodorus the Geographer writeth, that both these two, and another third called Thessalus, were born of Isodice, the Daughter of Euryptolemus, the Son of Megacles. Howfoever it was, it is certain that Cimons credit grew the greater, by the favour and countenance which the LACEDEMONIANS gave him, who had hated Themistocles of long time, and for the malice they bare him, were glad that Gimon being but a young man, did bear more fway in ATHENS then he: which the ATHENIANS perceived well enough, and were not offended withall at the beginning, because the good will of the LACEDEMONIANS towards him, did bring them great commodity. For when the ATHENIANS began to grow of great Power, and to practife fecretly, that the Confederates of the GRECIANS should for fake the LACEDEMONIANS to joyn with them; the LACEDEMONIANS were not angry withall,

A marvellous great Earthquake in Lace-Taygetum Mons

Archidamus Cadden policy faved the City Hota, Slaves men to the La-for the honour and love they bare unto Cimon, who did alone in manner and GREECE at that time, because he was very courteous unto the Consederates, and also thankfull unto the LACEDEMONIANS. But afterwards when the ATHENIANS were aloft, and of great Power, and that they faw Cimen stuck not for a little matter with the LACEDEMONIANS, but loved them more then they would have had him: they began then to envy him, because in all his matters he had to do, he ever highly praifed and extolled the LACE DEMONIANS before them. But specially, when he would reprove them of any fault they had committed, or that he would perfivade them to do any thing: The Lacedemonians (faid he) I warrant ye do not fo. That, as Stesimbretsus faith, made him marvelloully to be maliced of the People. But the chiefest thing they accused him of, and that most did hurt him, fell out upon this occasion. The fourth year of the Reign of Archidamsus, the Son of Zenzidamus King of Sparta, therefortuned the wonderfullest and most fearfull Earthquake in the City of LACEDEMON, and thereabouts, that ever was heard of. For the Earth in many places of the Countrey opened, and fell as into a bottomless pit. The Mountain Taygetum shook so terribly, that points of Rocks fell down from it. All the City was layed on the ground and overthrown, five Houses onely excepted, the rest being wholly destroyed. And it is faid also, that a little before this Earthquake came, the young men of that City were playing with the young boys, exercifing themfelves stark naked under a great Gallery covered over : and as they were sporting together, there started up a Hare hard by them. The young men fpying her, ran after the Hare flark naked, and oyled as they were with great laughter. They were no fooner gone thence, but the top of the Gallery fell down upon the boys that were left, and (quashed them all to death. And in memory of the same, the Tomb where they were afterwards buried, is called unto this day Sifmatian, as much to fay, as the Tomb of those which the Earthquake had flain. But King Archidamus foreseeing straight upon the sudden, the danger that was to come, by that he faw prefent, perceiving his Citizens busie in faving their houtholdftuff, and that they were running out of their Houles, made the Trumpeters to found a hot Alarm upon it, as if their Enemies had come ftealingly upon them to take the City, to the end that all the Inhabitants (hould prefently repair unto him (letting all business apart) with Armour and Weapon. That fudden Alarm doubtlefs faved the City of SPARTA at that time : for the ILOTA, which are their Slaves and Bondmen in the Countrey of LACONIA, and the Countrey Clowns of little Villages thereabouts, came running armed out of all parts, to spoil and rob themupon the sudden that were escaped from this Earthquake. But when they found them well armed in order of Battle, they returned back again as they came: and then began afterwards to make open Wars upon them, when they had drawn certain of their Neighbours unto their Confederacy, and specially the MESSENIANS, who made hot Wars upon the SPARTANS. Whereupon the LACED & MONIANS fent Periclidas unto ATHEMS, to demand aid : of whom Aristophanes the Poet in mockage, faid :

With visage pale and wan he on the Altar sate, In scarlet Gown requiring aid, to succour their estate.

Cimon procured aid for the Lacedamoni-

Against whom Ephialtes also spake very much, protesting that they should not aid nor relieve a City that was an Enemy unto ATHENS, but rather fuffer it to fall to the ground, and to spurn the pride and arrogancy of SPARTA under their feet. But Cimon (as Critical faith) being more carefull for the benefit of SPARTA, then for the enlarging and encreafing of his Countrey, brought it to pass by his perswasion, that the ATHENIANS fent him thither with a great Power to help them. And furthermore, Ion rehearfeth the very felf-words that Cimon spake to move the People to grant his request. For he belought them that they would not fuffer GREECE to halt, as if LACEDEMON had been one of her feet, and ATHENS the other: nor to suffer their City to lose another City their friend, and subject to the yoke and defence of GREECE. Having therefore obtained aid to lead unto the LACEDEMONI-ANS, he went with his Army through the CORINTHIANS Countrey: wherewith Lachartus 2 Captain of CORINTH was marvelloully offended, faying, that he should not have entred into their Countrey with an Army before he had asked license of them of the City. For (faid he) when one knocketh at a mans door or gate, yet he cometh not in before the Mafter of the house commandeth him. But ye CORINTHIANS (faid (imon to him again) have not knocked at the Gates of the CLEO-N.EIANS, nor of the MEGARIANS, to come in, but have broken them open, and entred by force of Arms, thinking that all should be open unto them that are the stronger. Thus did Cimon stoutly anfwer the Corinthian Captain again, because it steed him upon, and so went on with his Army through the Countrey of CORINTH. Afterwards the LACEDEMONIANS fent again unto the A-THENIAMS, to require aid against the MESSINIAMS and the ILOTES, (which are their Slaves) who had won the City of ITHOME. But when the ATHENIANS were come, the LACEDEMONIANS were afraid of the great Power they had brought, and of their boldness besides: wherefore they sent them back again, and would not employ them of all other their Confederates that came to their furcour, because they knew them to be men very tickle, desiring change and alterations. The ATHENI-ANS returned home, milliking much that they were fent back again, infomuch as ever after they hated them that favoured the LACEDEMONIANS in anything. And for the LACEDEMONIANS fake therefore, taking a small occasion of offence against Cimon, they banished him out of their Countrey Cimon basished for ten years: which was the full time appointed and limited unto them that were banished with the Oftracismon banishment. Now within the term of these ten years, the LACEDEMONIANS fortuned to undertake the delivery of the City of DELPHOS, from the servitude and bondage of the

PHOCIANS, and to purches from the custody and keeping of the Temple of Apollo, which is in the faid City. Wherefore to obtain their defire and purpole, they came to plant their Camp near unto the City of TANAGRE in PHOCIDE, where the ATHENIAN'S went to fight with them. Cimon understanding this, although he was in exile, came to the ATHENIANS Camp armed, with intent to do his dury to fight with his Countreymen against the LACEDEMONIANS, and so went into the Bands of the Tribe Oenide, of the which he was himself. But his own Countrey Enemies cryed out against him, and said, that he was come to none other end, but to trouble the order of their Battle, of intent that he might afterwards bring them to the City felf of ATHENS. Whereupon the great Council of the five hundred men were afraid, and fent to the Captains to command them they should not receive him into the Battle: Io that Cimon was compelled to depart the Camp. But before he went, he prayed Euthippus ANAPHLYSTIAN, and his other friends that were suspected as himself was to favour the LACEDAMONIANS doings: that they should do their best endeavour to fight valiantly against their Enemies, to the intent their good fervice at that battle might purge their innocency towards their Countrymen : and so they did. For the ATHENIANS keeping the Souldiers Cimon had brought with him, which were an hundred in all, they fet them apart by themselves in a Squadron, who fought it so valiantly and desperately, that they were slain every man of them in the Field, leaving the ATHENI-ANS marvellous forry for them, and repenting them that they had so unjustly mistrusted them as Traytors to their Countrey. Wherefore they kept not their malice long against Cimon, partly as I am perfwaded, because they called his former good service to mind which he had done to their Countrey aforetime, and partly also, because the necessity of the time so required it. For the ATHENIANS having loft a great Battle before TANAGRE, looked for no other about the Spring of the year, but that the PELOPONNESIANS would invade them with a great Power: wherefore they revoked Cimons banishment by Decree, whereof Pericles self was the onely author and procurer. So civil and temfrom exile. perate were mens enmitties at that time, regarding the common benefit of their publick State and Weal: and so much did their ambition (being the most vehement passion of all other, and that most troubleth mens minds) give place, and yield to the necessities and affairs of the Commonweal! Now when Cimon was again returned to ATHENS, he ftraight pacified the War, and reconciled both Cities together. And when he saw that the ATHENIANS could not live in peace, but would be doing still, and enlarge their Dominions by War, for lucres fake: to prevent them that they should not fall out with any of the GRECIANS, nor by fcouring and coafting up and down the Countrey of PELOPONNEsus, and the Isles of GREECE, with so great a Navy, should move occasion of Civil Wars amongst the GRECIANS, or of complaints unto their Confederates against them: he rigged and armed out two hundred Galleys to go again to make War in CYPRUS, and in ÆGYPT, because he would acquaint the ATHENIANS with the Wars of the barbarous People, and thereby make them lawfull gainers by the spoils of those their natural born Enemies. But when all things were in readiness to depart, and the Army preft to ship and fail away, Cimon dreaming in the night had this Vision: It seemed unto Gimon dreami

Come hardily, Spare not, for if thou come by me, My whelps and I which do here stand, will quickly welcome thee.

him that he faw a bitch angry with him, and barking earneftly at him; and that in the midft of her barking, the fpake with a mans voice, and faid unto him:

This Vision being very hard to interpret, A styphilus born in the City of Posidonia, a man expert in fuch conjectures, and Cimons familiar friend, told him that this Vision did betoken his death, ex. The interprepounding it in this fort: The Dog commonly is an enemy to him he barketh at. Again, nothing glad- tation of the deth more our enemy, then to hear of our death. Furthermore, the mingling of a mans voice with the Cimons death barking of a bitch, fignifieth nothing else but an Enemy of the MEDES: because the Army of the prognosticated. MEDES is mingled with the barbarous People and the GRECIANS together. Besides this Vision, as he did facrifice to the god Bacchus, the Priest opening the Beast after it was facrificed, about the blood that fell to the ground, there affembled a swarm of Ants, which carried the conjealed blood off from the ground by little and little, and laid it all about Cimons great toe, a great while together before any man marked it : Cimon at the last spied it by chance : and as he was looking on them to mark what they did, the Minister of the Sacrifice brought the Beafts Liver that was facrificed, to shew him, whereof the biggest end that they call the head was lacking, and this they judged for a very ill token. Notwithftanding, having all things ready for preparation of this Journey, so as he could not well go back, he launched into the Sea, and hoised Sail, and fending threescore of his Galleys into EGYPT, sailed with the rest upon the Coast of PAMPHILIA, where he wan a Battle by Sea of the King of PERSIA, overcoming the Galleys of the PHOENICIANS and the CILICIANS, and conquered all the Cities thereabouts, making the way very open to enter into ÆGYPT. For he had no small thoughts in his mind. but reached to high Enterprizes, and determined utterly to deftroy the whole Empire of the mighty King of PERSIA, and specially for that he understood Themistocles was in marvellous credit and reputation amongst the barbarous People, because he had promited the King of Persia to lead his Army for him, and to do him notable service whensoever he should have occasion to war with the GRE-CIANS. It is thought this was the chief cause that made Thems stocles poyson himself, because he despaired that he could not perform that service against GREECE which he had promised: affuring himipaired that he could not perform that betwee against GREECE which he had promined: and might have felf that it was no easie matter to vanquish Cimons courage and good fortune, who lay at that time with willing death. his Army all alongst the Isle of Cypnus, promising himself great matters at that instant. But in the mean Cimon fent certain of his men unto the Oracle of Jupiter Ammon, to ask him tone lecret question : for no man ever knew neither then nor fince, for what cause he had fent them thither, neither did they also bring back any answer. For they were no sooner come thither, but the Oracle commanded them ftraight to return: faying unto them, that Cimon was then coming to him. So Cimons men receiving this answer, left the Oracle, and took their Journey back to the Seawards: Now when they were come again to the GRECIANS Camp, which at that prefent lay in EGYPT, they heard that Giwere come again to the World: and reckoning the days fince his death, with the infrant of their answer mon was ucreated this Vertat Cimon was then coming unto him, they knew straight that darkly he had received from the Oracle, that Cimon was then coming unto him, they knew straight that darkly he had fignified his death unto them, and that at that very time he was with the gods. He died at the Siege of the City of CIT IUM in CYPRUS, 25 some report, or else of a hurt he received at a Skirmish, as other hold opinion. Whenhedied, he commanded them that were under his charge, to return intotheir Countrey again, and in no cafe to publish his death: which commandment was fo wifely and cunningly handled, that they all came home fafe, and not an Enemy, nor any of their Confederates, that once underftood any thing of it. So was the Army of the GRECIANS governed and led by Cimon, though himfelf was dead the space of thirty days, as Phanodemus writeth. But after his death, there was no GRE-No famous act CIAN Captain that did any notable thing worthy of fame against the barbarous People, because the Orators and Governours of the chiefeft Cities of Greece firred them up one against another, and Greeisastothe barbarous Peo- there was no man that would once step in as a Mediator to make peace between them, And thus the GRECIANS now did one destroy and spoil another by Civil War amongst themselves, which happily gave the King of Persia leilure and time to reftore himself again, and contrarily was cause of such utter ruine and deftruction of the whole power and force of GREECE, as no tongue can well express. Indeed a long time after, King Agefilana came with an Army of the GRECIANS into ASIA, and began a finall War against the Lieutenants of the King of PERSIA'S Governours of the lower Countreys of Asia: but before he could do any notable exploit, he was called home again by occasion of new troubles and Civil Wars rifing among the GRECIANS, and compelled to return into his Countrey, leaving the Treasurers of the King of Persia raising of Subsidies and Taxes upon the Cities of the GRECIANS in ASIA, although they were Confederates of the LACEDEMONIANS. Whereas in the time that Cimon governed, they never faw any of the Kings Serjeants at Arms, or Commissioner, that brought any Letters Patents or commandment from the King, or any Souldier that durft come near the Sea, by forty furlongs. The Tombs which they call unto this prefent day Cimonia, do wit-Cimons Monu- nels that his affres and bones were brought unto ATHENS. Nevertheless, they of the City of CI-Cimons Donubarrenness of the Earth, they had an Oracle that commanded them, not to neglect Cimon, as the Orator Nauficrates writeth it, but to honour and reverence him as a god. Such was the Life of this GRE-CIAN Captain.

S for Lucullus, his Grandfather was a Conful, and fo was Metellus (furnamed Lucullus Pa-Numidicus, because of his Conquest of Numidia) his Uncleby the Mothers rents. fide. His Father notwithstanding was convict of Felony, for robbing the Treafure of the State whilft he was Officer: and Cacilia his Mother was reported to have led an unchaste life. But for Lucullus felf, before he bare Office or Rule in matters of State, the first thing he touched and took in hand for the Cause of his Country, was the accusation of Servilim the Soothsayer (who before had accufed his Father) for that he also had dealt fallly in his Office, and deceived the feth Servilius Commonwealth. And this the ROMANS thought very well handled of him, infomuch as a pretty the Soothfay-Commonwealth.

While after there was no other talk in Rome but of that matter, as though it had been a notable valiant erract done by him. For otherwise, though privately they had no just occasion, yet they thought it a notable whough it is a notable with though it is a notable with the notable with th ble deed to accuse the wicked, and it pleased them as much to see the young men put Law-breakers in noble deed to fuir, as to fee a notable good course of a Dog at a Hare. Howbeit there followed such stir and banding accuse the upon this fuit, that fome were very fore hurt, and other flain in the Market-place: but in fine, Servilius wicked. was cleared and quite difmiffed. Lucullus was very eloquent, well spoken, and excellently well learned Lucullus eloin the Greek and Latin Tongues: infomuch as Sylla dedicated unto him the Commentaries of all his doings quence: which he himself had collected, as to one that could better frame a whole History thereof, and couch it more eloquently together in writing. For he had not onely a ready tongue to utter that he would speak, and plead his matters with great eloquence, as other be feen to do, having matters of fuit or open audi-Like Tonny Fish they be, which swiftly dive and dop

For Lucullus had studied humanity from his youth, and was well learned in all the liberal Sciences: but when he came to elder years, to refresh his wit (after great troubles) he fell to the study of Phi- Lucullus studilosophy, which quickned the contemplative part of his soul, and mortified, or at the least betimes ed Philosophy bridled the ambitious and active part, specially after the difference between thim and Pompey. But time, to acquaint you better with his Learning yer, it is faid, that when he was a young man, he layed a great wager with Hortensus the Orator, and Sisenns the Historiographer (in jeft as it were at the first, but asterwards it fell to good earnest) that he would write the Breviary of the MARSIAN Wars in Verse or Prose, in the Latin or Greek Tongue, which soever sell to his lot : and I think

Lucullus ftra-

LUCULLUS. his hap was to do it in Profe in the Greek Tongue, because we find a little Greek Story extant of the Wars of the ROMANS against the MARSIANS. He dearly loved his Brother M. Lucullus, as appeared by many manifest proofs; but the chiefest and most noted proof among the ROMANS was this. Himlelf was elder then his Brother Marcus, and yet for all that would never fue to bear Office in the Commonwealth, nor accept any before his Brother, but tarried always till he should be chosen, and let his own time pass over. This great courtesie to his Brother, so Marcus Lucius and Marcus Lucius wan the Peoples hearts, as Lucius being absent, they chose him Ædilis, and his Brother Marcus and Marcus Lucius was the Peoples hearts, as Lucius being absent, they chose him Ædilis, and his Brother Marcus and Marcus Lucius was the Peoples hearts, as Lucius being absent, they chose him Ædilis, and his Brother Marcus and column both with him for his fake. He was in the flower of his youth in the time of the Marstan Wars, cholen Ædiles, wherein he did many wife and valiant deeds. The cause notwithstanding that moved Sylla to make choice of him, was rather for his constancy and good courteous nature, then for any other respect. For when Sylla had once won him, he ever after employed him continually in his most weighty caules: as in Commission specially, he gave to him to Coin Money. For indeed part of the Money Spllagave Lu. 103. as in Committee specially, no Sart Committee and the special specia within the Countrey of Peloponnesus: whereupon they were called Lucullian pieces, and were currant a long time amongst the Souldiers, to buy such things as they stood in need of, and never refused by any. Sylla being afterwards at ATHENS, the stronger by Land, but the weaker by Sea, fo as his Enemies cut off his Victuals from him, fent Luculus into EGYPT and LYBIA, to bring him fuch Ships as he found in those parts. It was in the deep of Winter, and yet he spared not to fail with three Brigantines of GREECE, and as many Galliots of the RHODIANS, putting himself not onely to the danger of the Sea in 60 long a Voyage, but of his Enemies in like manner: who knowing themselves to be the stronger, went failing every where with a great Navy. But for all these Lumburgiveth dangers, he first arrived in the Isle of CRETA, and wantheir good wills. From thence went to the City of CYRENE, where he found the Inhabitants turmoiled with Civil Wars, and continuall oppressions of Tyrants: from which troubles he delivered them, and gave them Laws to establish Government among them, putting them in remembrance of Plato's words spoken to their Ancestors in old time, in the spirit of a Prophecy. For when they prayed Plato to write them Laws, and to A notable fay. appoint them fome form of Government for their Commonwealth, he made them answer: It was a hard thing to give Laws to fo rich and fortunate a People as they were. For to faytruly, as nothing is harder to be ruled then a rich man: so contrarily, nothing readier to receive counsell and government then a man in adverfity. This Lesson framed the Cyrenians at that time to be more civill and obedient to the Laws Lucullus gave them. When he departed thence, he coasted towards ÆGYPT, where he loft the more part of his Ships by Pyrates: but for his own person, scaping their Luculus Jour hands, he was very honourably received in the City of ALEXANDRIA. For all the Kings Army came to meet him at Sea, gallantly trimmed and appointed, as they were wont to welcome home the King when he returned from any Voyage by Sea: and King Prolomy himself being very young at that time, gave him as honourable entertainment as he possible could. For amongst other honours that he did him, he lodged him in his Court, and defrayed his ordinary diet, where never strange Captain was lodged before: and did not onely spend the ordinary allowance in feafting of him which he used to others, but commanded four times as much Provition more to be made as he had before. Notwithstanding, Lucullus took no more then was reasonable for his Person on yet would he receive any manner of Gift, although the King had fent him Prefents to the value of fourfcore Talents. And which is more, would not fo much as go fee the City of MEMPHIS, nor any other of the famous Monuments and wonderfull fights in ÆGYPT, faying, that it was for a man that travelled up and down for his pleasure, and had leisure withall, to see such things, but not for him that had left his Captain in the Field, at the Siege of the Walls of his Enemies. To conclude, this young King Prolomy would in no cafe fall in friendship with Sylla, fearing left he should thereby put himfelf into Wars, but gave him Men and Ships to bring him into Cyprus. And as he was ready to imbarque, the King bidding him farewell, and embracing him, gave him a goodly A notable rich rich Emerald fet in Gold, which Lucullus at the first resused, until the King shewed him his Pi-A notable rich that a surface in it: and then he accepted the Gift, fearing left the utter refusal might cause the King to think he went away discontented, and should perhaps therefore lay an ambush by Sea for King Prolomy. him. Thus having gotten a certain number of Ships together of the Port Towns thereabouts, over and befides such as the Pyrates and Sea-rovers had hidden, being part of their Spoils, and bestowed with their receitors, went on with them into CYPRUS, where he understood that his Enemies lay close in certain Creeks under the foreland, watching to board him as he failed by. under Sylla by Whereupon he unrigged and bestowed his Ships in Docks, and sent word to all the Port Towns thereabouts, that he was determined to Winter there : and therefore willed them to provide him Victuals and other necessary Munition to be in readiness against the Spring. But in the mean while, when he faw time convenient, he put his whole Fleet again to the Sea with all possible speed, went himself away, and in the day time carried a low Sail, but in the night packt on all the Cloth he could for life: fo that by this crafty fetch he wan RHODES, and loft not one Ship. The RHODIANS they also furnished him with Ships; and besides them, he so perswaded the GNI-DIANS and the Inhabitants of the Isle of Co, that they for fook King Mishridates, and went to make Wars with him against them of the Isle of Samos. But Lucullus himself alone drave King Mithridates men out of CHIO, restored the COLOPHONIANS again to liberty, and took Epigonus the Tyrant Priloner, who had kept them in bondage. Now about that time, Mithridates was compelled to forfake the City of PERGAMUS, and to retire to the City PITANE, within the which

Fimbria kept him belieged very straightly by Land. Wherefore Mitbridates having the Sea open Fimbria belieupon him, fent for his Force and Navy out of all parts, not during to hazard Battleagainst Fimbria, ged Mithridawho was very valiant, of a venturous nature, and at that time moreover was himself a Conqueror. tes in Pitane: Fimbria perceiving what Mithridates meant, and having no Power by Sea of his own, fent straight to Lucullus, to request him to come with his Navy into those parts to his aid, for the overcoming of this King, the greatest and most cruel Enemy that ever the ROMAN People had. Because that fo notable a prey, which they followed with such danger and trouble, should not escape the Ro-MANS, while they had him in their hands, and was come himfelf within their danger : and that therefore he should fo much the more hearken unto it, because that if it fortuned Mithridates to be taken, no man should win more honour and glory by his taking, then he that had stopped his paffage, and layed hands on him, even as he thought to have fled. And thereby should the praise of this noble Victory run in equality between them both : the one that had driven him from Land, and the other that had fropped his passage by Sea. And furthermore, that the ROMANS would nothing regard all the famous Battles and Victories of Sylla in GREECE, which he had won before the Cities of CHOERONEA and ORCHOMENE, in comparison of taking the King. This was the effect of Fimbria's Message sent unto Lucullus, wherein there was nothing, in the which there was not great likelihood. For there is no man that can doubt of it, but if Lucullus would have believed him at that time (and have gone thither with his Ships to stop the Havens mouth of the City, in the which Mithridates was belieged, confidering also that he was so near at hand) this War had taken end there, and the World besides had then been delivered of infinite troubles which fell out afterwards. But whether Lucullus preferred the confideration and respect he had unto Sylla, whose Lieutenant he was, before all other due regard of private or common benefit : or that he detefted and abliorred Fimbria as a curled person, who not long before had through his wicked ambition embrued his hands in the blood of his Captain : or elle, that it was through the secret Providence and permission of the gods, that he spared Mithridates at that time, to the end he might be referred as a worthy Enemy, against whom he might afterwards shew his valour. How- Lucultus would foever it was, it so fell out that he hearkened not unto Fimbria's Message, burgave Mithridates not aid Fimtime and leifure to fly, and finally to fcorn all Fimbria's Force and Power. But Lucullus felf briain befiegalone afterwards overcame the Kings Army by Sea, once near unto the head of Lectum, which is ing Mithrida. on the Coast of TROADE : and another time near unto the Isle of TENEDOS, where Neortelemus. Mithridates Lieutenant by Sea, lay in wait for him with a far greater number of Ships Neoptolemus: then he had. And yet so soon as Lucullus had descried him, he failed before all his Navy, being King Mithri-Admiral, in a Galley of RHODES, at five Oars to a Bank, whereof one Demagoras was Ma- dates Lieutes fter, a man well affected to the Service of the ROMANS, and very skillull in Battle by Sea. nantby Sea. And when Neoprolemus on the other fide rowed against him with great force, commanding his Pilot that he should so order his Galley, that he might stem him right in the Prowe: Demagoras fearing the full meeting of the Kings Galley, which wasvery strong and heavy, and furthermore, well armed with points and spurs of Brass before, durst not encounter her with his Prowe, but nimbly made his Galley to wind about, and turned his Poop towards him. Whereby the Galley being low at the end, received the blow without hurt, confidering that they hit upon the dead Works. and those parts which are always above water. In the mean time Luculins other Ships were come, Lucallus part to who commanding his Mafter to turn the beak-head of his Galley forward, did many famous acts: flight Neoptofo that he made his Enemies fly, and drave Neoptolemus away. And departing from thence, went to date: Lieute. feek out Sylle even as he was ready to pass over the Seas, about CHERRONE sus t holp him to nant by Sea. waft his Army, and so passed him over with safety. Afterwards when Peace was concluded, and that King Mithridates was come into his Realm and Countries again, which lie upon the Sea Maior, Sylla condemned the Province of Asia to pay the sum of 20000 Talents for a Fine, by reason of their rebellion. And for levying of his Fine, he left Lucullus there with Commission to cover Money: which was a great comfort and heartsease unto the Cities of Asia, considering the extremity that Sylla had used towards them. For in so grievous and odious a Commission unto them all, as that was, Lucullus did not onely behave himself uprightly and justly, but also very favourably and courteoutly. For, as touching the MITYLENIAN'S that were openly in Arms against him. he was very willing they should know their fault, and that for fatisfaction of the offence they had committed taking Marius part, they should suffer some light punishment. And seeing that they were furiously bent to continue in their naughtiness, he went against them, and having overcome them in Battle, compelled them to keep within their Walls, and laid fiege unto their City, where he used this policy with them. At noon days he launched into the Sea, in the view of all the MITYLENI- Lucullus fira-ANS, and failed towards the City of ELEA: howbeit in the night time fecretly returned back, and tagem at the making no noise, layed an Ambush near unto the City. The MITYLENIANS miltrusting no- Siege of the thing, went on the next morning very rashly without order, and without any manner of Watch or Mithenians, Ward, to spoil the Camp of the ROMANS, supposing every man had been gone: but Lucullus coming suddenly upon them, took a great number Prisoners, slew about five hundred such as relifted, and wan fix thousand Slaves, with an infinite quantity of other Spoil. Now did the gods happily preferre Lucullus, that he was no partaker at that time of the wonderfull mileries and troubles which Sylla and Marins made poor ITALY fuffer, even then when he was occupied in the

Wars of Asta: and yet notwithstanding his absence, he was in as good credit and favour with

Sylla, as any of his friends about him. For, as we have faid before, he dedicated his Commentaries Luculus hono- unto him, for the good will be bare him, and by his last Will and Testament appointed him Tutor unto his Son; leaving Pompey out: which feemeth to be the first occasion of the quarrel and grudge that fell out afterwards between them, because they were both young men, and vehemently defirous fion of quarrel of honour. Shortly after the death of Sylla, Lucullus was chosen Consul with Marcus Costa, about betwirt Pompey of honour. the threeCore Olympiade, and then they began to revive the matter again, that it was very need-full to make Wars against Mithridates, and specially Marcus Corta, who gave out that it was not Cotta, Confuls eitled, but onely flept for a while. Wherefore, when the Confuls came to draw Lots what Provinces they should take charge of, Lucullus was marvellous forry that the Province of Gaul, lying Between the Alpes and ITALY; fell to his lot, because he thought it no Countrey wherein any great Exploits were to be done: and again, the glory of Pompey grieved him greatly, whose honour daily encreased by the famous Battles he wan in Spain. So that it was most certain, that so soon as Pompey had ended the Wars there, they would have chosen him General in the Wars against Mithridates. Wherefore, when Pompey fent to ROME in earnest manner, to require Money to make pay to his Souldiers, writing to the Senate, that if they did not fend him Money the fooner, he would leave both Sertorius and Spain behind him, and bring his Army back into ITALY: Lucullus made all the means he could to have it quickly fent him, fearing left he should return into ITALY upon any occasion, while hewas Conful. For he thought that if he returned again to ROME with Cethegus a vi- fo great an Army, he would eafily do what he lift: and the rather, because that Cethegus and he could not agree, who at that time bare all the fway and rule at ROME, because he spake and did all that pleased the common People, being a vicious liver, and dissolutely given, for which cause Lu-Lucius Quinti- cullus hatedhim: But there was another common Orator among the People, called Lucius Quintitius, and he would have had all Sylla's doings revoked and broken: a matter to alter even the whole flate of the Commonwealth, and to turmoil the City of ROME again with civil diffention, which then lived quietly and in good peace. This Lucius Quintius Lucullus talked withall apart, to perfwade him, and openly reproved him with fuch words, that he was diffwaded from his evil purpole, and by reason ruled his rash ambition, handling it both wifely and cunningly as he could possible (for the fafety of the Commonwealth) because it was the beginning of a disease, from whence infinite troubles were like to grow. While these things were thus in hand, news came that Othevius the Governour of CILICIA was dead. Straight whereupon many put forward themselves to sue for this Charge, and to court Ceibeque, as the onely man who above all other might make any with Officer whom he thought good. Now for Lucullut, he made no great reckoning of the Government of CILICIA in respect of the Countrey, but because CAPPADOCIA was hard adjoyning to it: and perfuading himself that if he could obtain the Government thereof, they would Lucidlas ambi- give none other (but himfelf) the Authority to make Wars with Mithridates: he determined to procure all the means he could, that none should have it but himself. And having proved fundry waies, was compelled in the end against his own nature, to practife a mean neither comely nor honeft, and yet the readieft way he could possibly devise to obtain his desire. There was a Woman in Rome at that time called Pracia, very famous for her passing beauty, and also for her pleasant gracein talk and discourse, howbeit otherwise unchaste after Curtizan manner. But because she employed the credit and favour of them that frequented her company, to the benefit and fervice of the Commonwealth, and of them that loved her: she wan the report (besides her other excellent commendable graces) to be a very loving Woman, and ready to favour and further any good enterprise, and it wan her great fame and reputation. But after he had once won Ceshegus (who ruled all the Commonwealth at his pleasure) and brought him so far to be in fancy with her, that he could not be out of her fight: then had she all the whole Power and Authority of ROME in her hands, for the People did nothing but Cerhegus preferred it, and Cerhegus did whatever Pracia would will him to do. Thus Lucullus fought to come in favour with her, fending her many Presents, and using all other courtesies he could offer unto her; besides that it seemed a great reward for so proud and ambitious a Woman as she, to be sued unto by such a man as Lucullus was, who by this means came to have Cethegus at his commandment. For Cethegus did nothing but commend Lucullus in all Affemblies of the People, to procure him the Government of CILICIA: who after it was once granted him, had then no need of the help neither of Pracia, nor yet of Cethegus. For the People wholly of themselves with one consent did grant him the charge to make War with Mithridates, because he knew better how to overcome him then any other Captain, and because that Pompey was in the Wars with Sertorius in SPAIN, and Metellus also grown too old, both which two were the onely men that could defervedly have contended for this Office with him. Neverthelels, Marcus Cotta his fellow Confull, made fuch fuit to the Senate, that they fent him also with an Army by Sea, to keep the Coasts of PROPONTIDE, and to defend the Countrey of BI-THYNIA. Thus Lucullus having this Commission, went into Asia with one Legion onely, the which he levyed anew at ROME: and when he was come thither, he took the rest of the strength he found there, which were men marred and corrupted altogether of long time, through covetoulness Fimbrian Soul- and delicacy of the Countrey. For amongst others, were the Bands which they called the Fimbrian diers very dif- Bands, men given over to felf-will, and very ill to be ruled by Martial Discipline, because they had lived a long time at their own liberty, without all obedience to any man. They were those self Souldiers that together with Fimbria, flew their General Flaceus, Conful of the ROMAN People, and that afterwards betrayed Finbria himself, and forlook him, leaving him unto Sylla, being Mutiners, Traitours and wicked People, howbeit otherwise very valiant, well trained, and painfull Souldiers. Norwithstanding, Lucullus in short time bridled their boldness meetly well and reformed the othersalfo, who before had never proved (in my opinion) what the value of a good Captain and Generall meant, that knew how to command : but were used to flattering Leaders, that commanded the Souldiers no more then they themselves liked of. Now concerning the State of the Enemies, thus it was with them. Mithridates that in the beginning was very prave and bout (as these flourishing Sophisters commonly are) undertaking War against the ROMANS, with a vain Army against A Enemies, thus it was with them. Mithridates that in the beginning was very brave and bold (as unprofitable Army, but passing fresh and sumptuous to the Eye: after he was once foyled and overcome, with no less shame then loss, when he came to make his second War, he cut off all superfluous Pomp, and brought his Army into a convenient Furniture to ferve for Wars at all affavs. For he put by the confused multitude of fundry Nations, the fierce threatnings of the barbarous People in so many fundry Tongues, and clearly banish also the rich graven Armours with Goldsmiths Work, and fet with precious Stones, as things that more enriched the Enemies that wan them, then gave strength or courage to those that ware them. And contrariwise, caused long stiff Swords to be made after the ROMAN fashion, and great heavy Shields, and brought to the Field a marvellous number of Horse, more ready for Service then rich in Furniture. Then he joyned sixfcore Mithridates thousand Footmen together, appointed and set in order like unto the Battell of the ROMANS. Army, with fixteen thousand Horse of Service, besides those that drew his armed Carts with Sithes about which were in all to the number of an hundred. And befides all this Land preparation the brought also a great number of Ships and Galleys together, which were not decked with goodly Golden Pavilions, as at the first, neither with Stoves nor Bathes, nor with Chambers and Cabbins, curiously hanged for Ladies and Gentlewomen: but furnished full of Armour, Artillery, and Slings, and with Money also to pay the Souldiers. With all this Army and preparation, he went first to invade BITHYNIA, were the Cities received him very gladly, and not those onely, but all the other Cities of Asia wholly : the which were fallen again into their former miseries and diseases, by the Asia felling cruelty of the ROMAN Farmers and Uturers, who raising Taxes and Impost upon them, made former milethem abide untollerable things. It is true that Lucullin drave them away afterwards, like the ries by the Ro-Harpya, which took the meat out of the poor mens mouths: howbeit at that time he did man Usurers. no more, but brought them to be more reasonable by the perswasions he used unto them, and dualified a little the inclination of the People unto rebellion, being every one of them in manner willing to revolt. Now Lucullus being busie about these matters, Marcus Cotta the other full overcome Confull (and his companion) supposing that the absence of Lucullus was a fit occasion offered by Mithridates him to do notable Service, prepared to fight with Mithridages. And although he had Newes in Battell. brought him from fundry places, that Lucullus was with his Army in PHRYGIA, and coming towards him: yet notwithftanding, imagining that he had the honour of Triumph affured already in his hands, and because Lucullus should be no partaker of it, he advanced forwards to give Battell, But Mithridates overcame him both by Sea and Land: fo that Cotta by Sea loft threescore of his Ships with all the men in them, four thousand Footmen by Land, and was after with shame shut up and besieged in the City of CHALCEDON, remaining there hopeless to escape but by Lucullus onely aid and means. "Howbeit there were in Lucullus Camp, that were very earnest with him to leave Cotta, and to go further, affuring him that he should find the Realm of Mithridates both without men of War, or any defence at all : fo that he might eafily be Lord of the whole. And these were the words of the Souldiers that spited Cotta, because his foolish rashness and fond imagination had not onely brought those men to the shambles to be flain and cast away, whom he had the leading of ; but had let them also, that they could not overcome him, and end this War without blows, for that they were driven to go to his help. Howbeit Luculing making an Oration unto them, answered, that he had rather fave the life of one ROMAN Citizen, then win all that his Enemies had in their Power. And when ing of Lucullus Archelans (who had been Mithridates Lieutenant in BOEOTTA in the first Wars against Sylla, for the faving and now in the fecond War took part with the ROMANS I affored him that to foon as they faw of a Chizen. him in the Realm of PONTUS, they would all rife against Mithridates, and yeeld themselves unto him. Lucullus answered him thus, that he would not shew himself more fearfull then the good Hunters, which never fuffer the Beaft to recover his Den. And when he had to faid, he marched with his Army towards Mithridates, having in all his Camp thirty thousand Footmen, and two Luculius Atthousand five hundred Horse: When he came so near unto his Enemies, that he might easily at my Eye discern all their Host, he wondered at the great multitude of Souldiers that were in their Camp, and was in mind to give Battell, supposing yet that the better way was to prolong time, and draw these Wars out in length. But one Marine 2 ROMAN Captain, whom Sertoring had lent out of Spain unto Mithridates with a certain number of Souldiers, came forwards, and provoked him to Battell. Lucullus for his part did put his men also in readiness to fight : but even as both Battels were prepared to joyn , the Element opened upon the fudden . A flame of fire without any thew of change of weather differened before, and they plainely faw a great flake of fell between fire tall between both Armies, in forme and shape much like to a tun, and of the colour of both Armies, molten Silver. This Celestiall Sign put both the Armies in such a fear, as they both retired, and out of the Efought not a stroak : and this wonderfull fight fortuned (as they fay) in a place of PHRYGIA, lement called Otryes. Now Luculing afterwards confidering with himself, that there was no riches nor when the remover has an questioned with them all as he had done with the first. Then comparing the Lucusus post- envisance willed that one of the Prifoners should be brought into his Tent, and first of all he enquired of him, which che fee how many of them lay together in a Cabbin, then what Corn he had left in their Cabbin. And how many of them lay together in a Causin, then what Colline had a like the Energy when the Prifoner had answered to all his demands, he returned him to Prifoni, and fent for another:

Mithridates befiegeth Cy-fore of their Corn, and other proportion of Victuals they had, with the number of men the nore of their coin, and other proportion of the interest in three or four days at the uttermost, fame should maintain: he found that all would be spent in three or four days at the uttermost. Whereupon he relied on his first determination, to delay time without hazard of Battell. So he caused a marvellous deal of Wheat to be brought into his Camp out of every quarter, that the fame being throughly Victualled, he might earlily tarry the occasion which his Enemies necessity fhould offer him. Mithridates in the mean time, fought which way he might take the City of the CYZICENEANS, who had been overthrown before with Cotta at the Barrell of CHALCEDON, where they had loft three thousand men, and ten of their Ships. And because that Luculius should not understand of his enterprise, Mithridates stole away by night after Supper, taking the opportunity of a dark rainy night, and marched thitherwards with fuch speed, that he was before the City of Cyzicus by break of day, and pitched his Camp, where the Temple of the goddels Adrastria standeth, which is the goddess of fatall Destinies. Lucultur receiving intelligence of Mithridates departure from his Camp, followed him straight ways step by step, and being glad that he was not met withall of his Enemies in diforder, lodged his Army in a Village called THRA-CIA, in a place of great advantage for him, and commodioully feated also upon the high-ways, and through fear of the neighbours thereabouts, by the which they must come of necessity to Vithrough tear of the heighbours thereadours, by the which they much come or necessing to Vi-duall Mithridates Camp. Wherefore Luculus wifely forefeeing what would follow, would not keep his purpose secret from his Souldiers, but after he had well trenched and fortified his Camp, called them to Counfell, and there making an Oration unto them, told them openly by manifest demonstration of affured hope, that ere many days passed, he would give Victory into their hands, and that without loss of one drop of Bloud. In the mean feafon, Mithridates environed the GRECIANS round about by Land, having divided his Army into ten Camps, and Ropped up the mouth of the Arm of the Sea, which divided the City from firm Land with his Ships from one fide to another. Now the Cyzicenians were Valiant men, and determined to abide all extremity for the ROMANS faker! but one thing onely troubled them much, that they knew not what was become of Luculus, neither could they hear any news of him, though his Camp flood in such a place; where they might easily discern it from the City. But Mithrida-The first NANS, whom Tirrans hath fent to the aid of Misbridati. The words put the Cyzice-Souldier. MANS in a marvellous fear; freing fuch a multitude of Enemies dispersed round about them: that when Lucultum thould come to their aid, he could not well tell which way to pals. Yet at the length they leard of Lucullus approach, by one called Demonax, whom Architect fent unto the most they would not believe him at the first, taking it for a Tale, onely to make them to be of good courage, and Valiantly attide the futy of the Siege: untill fuch time as a little Boy of theirs escaped from the Enemies that before had riken him Priloner, was come again unto them. Of encaped from the entennes that octobe had tapped than Thomas, was come again onto them. Or whom they inquired where Litting was so the Boy laughed artilism, thinking they jefted to ask that whom they inquired where Litth Rim was into Boy langued artition, thinking they jeffed to ask that question of him. But when he faw they were in Bood earnest; he shewed them the ROMANS Camp with his firger; then they believed it indeed; and were couragious again. There is a Lake near unto the City of Cyzicus falled Dastylinde; and it is havingable with reconvenient big Boats. Luculum took one of the greatest of them; put it is a Cart, and so carried into the Sea, and Boats. Luculum took one of the greatest of them; put it is a Cart, and so carried into the Sea, and the season would be some the city the there put as many Souldiers in her as the could well carry, who by night entered into the City, the Skout of the Enemies never diffying them. This finall furply did marvelloully comfort the beliefed CYZICENIANS: and it feetheth that the gods, delighting to feetheir noble courage, would inther increase and assure the same, by many manufest tokens which they sent from Heaven, and specially by one, which was this. The day of the Feat. of Profernia was at hand, and the Citizens had A wonderfull never a black Cow to offer in foldin Sarrifice, as their antient Ceremonies required: to they made never a black Cow to oner in loienth Sacrince, as their animin Ceremonies required: to they made one of Pafte, and brought it hard into the Altar. Now, the Cow that was Vowed to this Sacrifice, and which they reared up of purpose to serve for that day, was feeding amongst the Heard of the City in the Fields, on the other fide of the Arm of the Sea. But that day the kept alone from all the rest of the Heard, and swam over the Arm of the Sea, and came into the City : where she went of her felf unto the place of the Sacrifice. Furthermore, the godders Proferpina her felf appeared unto Arifingorax in his dream, Secretary of the State and Common-wealth of the Cyzicenians, and faid unto him : 1 am come hither to bring the Plute of Ly BIA against the Trumpet of PONT, and therefore tell the Citizens from me, that I will them to be of good courage. The next morning when the Secretary had told them this. Ylfion, the CTZICENIAN's marvelled much at the goddesies words, and could not imagine what they meant. Howbeit at the break of day there arole a great whistling wind, that made the Sea-billows rife very high : and the Kings Engins of Battery which winning wonderfull Works that one Ni-were brought to the Walls of the City to pluck them down (being wonderfull Works that one Ni-west brought a THESSALIAN Engineer had made and devised) began to make such a noise, and to break in pieces by the roughness of the wind, that a man might easily judge what would follow upon it. Then all at one instant, the Southwind was become so vehement big, that in a moment it burfle all these Engines alunder, and specially a Tower of Wood of the height of an hundred Cubits, which the wind shook so vehemently, that it overthrew it to the ground. And it is said furthermore. that in the City of ILIUM the goddels Minerva appeared unto divers in their fleep, all in a sweat, and shewing part of her Veil torn, as if she had been newly returned from giving aid unto the CYZICENIANS: in confirmation whereof, the Inhabitants of ILIUM have a Pillar vet unto this day, whereupon this matter is written for a perpetual memory. Now was Mithridates marvellous forry for the breaking and lofs of his Engines, by means whereof, the CYZICENI-ANS had escaped the danger of affault, and of the Siege in like manner, until he truely understood Extrem Faof the great famine that was in his Camp, and the extream dearth to be such, as the Souldiers were dates Camp, compelled to eat mans Flesh, which (his Captains abusing him) had for a time kept secret proverb: from his knowledge. But when he was enformed of the troth indeed, he left off his vain am- He lept on his bition obstinately to continue Siege: knowing well that Lucullus made not Wars with threats belly with his and bravery , but (as the common Proverb faith) leapt on his belly with both his feet, that is to feet. fay, he did what he could possible to cut off all the Victuals from him. And therefore one day when Lucullus was gone to affault a Caffle that troubled him, very near unto his Camp, Mithridates because he would not lose that opportunity, sent the most part of his Horsemen to get Victualsin BITHYNIA, with all the Carts, and Beafts of Carriage, and his most unprofitable Footmen. Lucullus hearing thereof, returned again the felf fame night unto his Camp, and the next morning betimes being in the Winter feafon, followed them by the track with ten Enfigns of Footmen onely, and all his Horsemen. But the Snow was so deep, the cold so terrible sharp, and the Weather to rough, that many of his Souldiers not being able to abide it, died by the way. For all that, he marched on still, till he overtook his Enemies about the River of Rindacus, where he Rindacus st. gave them fuch an Overthrow, that the very Women came out of the City of Apollonia, and went to steal the Victuals they had loden, and to strip the dead, which were a marvellous and with to heat an may judge in such a case; and nevertheless there were taken six thousand Lucullus over-Horse of Service, and infinite number of Beasts for Carriage, and sisteen thousand men besides, threw Mithriall which spoil he brought to his Camp, and passed hard by the Camp of his Enemies. But dates Host-I wonder much at the Historiographer Sainst, who writing of this matter saith, that here was men. the first time that ever the ROMANS saw any Camels. Me thinks its strange how he should think fo , that they who long before had overcome Antiochus the Great under Scipio , and the others that a little before had fought against Archelam , near unto the Cities of ORCHOMENE and CHERONEA, should not have seen Camels. But to return again to our matter. Mithridates being feared with this Overthrow, refolved with himfelf immediately to flie, with all the fpeed he could possibly make : and to entertain and stay Lucullus for a time behind him . he determined to fend Ar florious his Admirall with his Arm; by Sea, into the Sea of GREECE. But as Aristonicus was ready to hoise fail, his own men betrayed him, and delivered him into the hands of Lucullus, with ten thousand Crowns which he carried with him, to corrupt (if he could) Mithridates part of the ROMANS Army. Mithridates hearing of this, fled by Sea, leaving the rest of his fled by Sea. Army by Land in the hands of his Captains, to be brought away by them as well as they could. Lu- Granicus fl. cullus followed unto the River of Granicus, where he fet upon them, and after he had flain twenty Lucullus overcellus followed unto the Arter of Granicus, where it retained by there died in that Wars, what throweth Mi-thoufand of them, took an infinite number Prisoners. And they say there died in that Wars, what throweth Mi-thoufand of them, took an infinite number Prisoners. And they say there died in that Wars, what the work of the composition of the composi ber of three hundred thousand People. This done, Luculius returned to the City of Cy zicus, where ver of Granien. after he had spent some days, enjoying the Glory due unto him, and received the Honourable entertainment of the CYZICENIANS: he went to visit the Coast of Hellespont, to get Ships to- Lucultus gether, and to prepare an Army by Sea. And passing by TROADE, they prepared his lodging with- Dream. in the Temple of Vonus : where, ashe flept in the night , it feemed to him he faw the goddess appear before him, which faid these Verses unto him:

O Lyon fierce and front, why fleepest thou fo found? Since at thy hand fo fair a Prey , is ready to be found.

Herewith he role incontinently out of his bed, being yet dark night, and calling his friends to him, told them the Vision he had in his Dream : and about that very time also there came some unto him from the City of ILIUM, that brought him news of fifteen Galleys of King Mithridates, having five Oars to every Bank , that were feen in the Haven of the ACHAIANS , and that failed towards the life of LEMNOS. Whereupon Lucullus took Ships straight, went and took them every one: for at his first coming he slew the Captain called Isidorus, and went afterwards to the other Marriners that lay at Anker on the Coast fide, who seeing him come drew towards Land with their Ships, in purpose to run them all ashore, and fighting above hatches, hurt many of Lucullus Souldiers, because they could not compais them in behind, and for that also the place where they had layed their Ships was fuch, as there was no way to force them before, their Galleys floting in the Sea as they did, and the others being faftned to the land as they were. Lucullus with much ado all this norwithft anding, found means in the end to put ashore certain of the best Souldiers he had about him, in a place of the Isle where they might eafily land. These Souldiers went straight and set upon the Enemies behind, slew some of them even at their first coming, and compelled the rest to cut afunder the Cables that fastned the Galleys to the Banks. But when they thought to flie from Land, the Calleys bruifed and broke one another: and that worst of all was, ran upon the Points and Spurs of Incultrs Galleys: and so many of them as stood above hatches were slaim, the rest taken Prisoners : amongst whom, EMarian the ROMAN Captain was brought unto Lucullin , whom Sertorise had fent out of Span S, unto Mitbridates. He had but one Eye, and Luculius had commanded his men before they fought, not to kill any of his Enemies that had but one Eye, because Marius should not dye so happy a death, as to be slain, but that he should dye some shamefull death, and be condemned by order of Law. That done, Luculus went in person with all the speed he could possible to follow Mithridaters: hoping to find him yet upon the Coaft of BITHYNIA, whiefe Poconius (hould have stayed him : for he had sent this Vocenius before with a great number of his Ships unto the City of NICOMEDIA, to stop him from flying. But he tarried fo long in the Isle of Samothracia factificing to the gods of the same, and to be received into the Frateristy of their Religion, that he could never after come near Milhridates to stop him from flying : having already made fail with all the whole Fleet , and hafting with all possible speed to recover the Realm of Pontus, before Lucillus could return from whence he went. But in failing thitherwards, he met with such a terrible from, that carried part of his Ships so away, that they ran straggling to seek their fortune, and part of them part of the only of away, that they fall the Coast and Riversthereabouts, for many days after, were full of dead Bodies and Shipwracks cast athore by waves of the Sea. Now for Mithridates own person, he was in a Ship of great burthen, the which for her greatness could not fail neer the shore, nor recover Land, she was also very evil so be guided by the Pilots in so boilterous a fform : the Marriners besides were put out of all their skill and knowledge: and the Ship herself moreover took in such store of water, and was so heavily charged withall, that they durst no more put her out to the Sea. By reason whereof Mithridates was compelled to go aboard a little pinnace of Pirats, and to put himself and his Life into their hands, by whose help in the end (beyond all expectation, but not without great danger) he got to Land, and recovered the City of HERACLEA in the Realm of PONTUS. Now here is to be noted, that the great bravery Lacultur shewed unto the Senate of ROME, fell out according to his imagination by the favour of the gods. For when the Senare had appointed for ending of these Wars, to prepare a great Na-Lucullar ambi vy of Ships, and therewithall had given order also for three thousand Talents: Lucullar stayed Lucinant amounts, them by Letters, that they should not do it, writing bravely unto them, that without all this Charge and great preparation he would be fitting enough to drive Mitbridates from the Sea, with the onely Ships he would borrow of their Friends and confederates. And indeed, through the special favour of the gods, he brought it to to pass : for they say, that this terrible from that defroyed the Army of Mithridates was raifed up by Diana, being offended with the men of the Realm of PONTUS, because they had destroyed her Temple in the City of PRIA POS, and had carried away her Image. Now there were divers that councelled Luculius to defer the reft of this War untill another feason: but notwithstanding all their perswasions, he went through the Luculus jour Countrey of GALATIA and BITHYNIA to invade the Realm of Mithridates. In the which encountry jour-voyage, at the first beginning he lacked Victuals, so that there were thirty thousand men of GALATIA following his Camp, that carried every one of them a bushell of wheat on their An Ox bought shoulders: howbeit entring further into the Countrey, and Conquering the whole, there was such for a Dischma exceeding plenty of all things, that an Ox was fold in his Camp but for a Drachma, and a Slave at four times as much. And of all other spoil there was great frore, that either they made no reckoning of it, or elfe they made havock of it, because there was no man to fell it unto, every man having fo much of his own. For they ran over all the Countrey unto the City of THEMISYRA, and The mutiny of to the Valleys that lay upon the River of Thermodon, and stayed no where longer then they were a fpoyling. Thereupon the Souidiers began to murmur at Lucullus, because he affured all the Cities upon Composition, and never took any of them by force, nor gave them any means to enrich themfelves by [poil : and yet faid they , he would make us now go further , and leave AMESUS 2 great rich City which we might eafily take by force, if it were but a little straightly besieged, and lead us into the Defens of the TIBARENIANS and the CHALDEANS to fight against. Mithridates. Lucullus passed over all these complaints, and made no reckoning of them, because he would never have thought that they would have fallen into fuch mutiny and fury, as afterward they did: and contrarily excused him telf the more carefully to them that blamed and reproved him, for his long tarrying upon Towns and Villages that were not worth the reckoning, and fuffering Mibridates in the mean time to gather a new force and Army together at his pleasure. "For, said he, that is the mark "I shoot at, and that maketh me linger time up and down as I do, wishing nothing more, then that "he might once again make himself strong, and bring a second Army to the Field, that might em-"bolden him to come eftions to fight with us, and run away no more. Do you not fee, faid he, that at his back he hath an infinite number of Defert Countries, where it is unpossible ever to fol-"low him by the track : and hard by him also the Mount Caucalus, and many other unpassible places, "which are sufficient not onely to hide him alone, but infinite number of other Princes and Kings "besides that would slie Battell, and not come to fight? Furthermore, it is but a little way from "the Countrey of the Cabirenians unto the Realm of Armenia, where Tigranes the King "of Kings inhabiteth, whole Power is fo great, that he driveth the PARTHIANS out of ASIA, "and carrieth whole Towns and Cities of GREECE unto the Realm of Media, and hath all Sy-"RIA and PALESTINE in his hands, and hath flain and rooted out the Kings and Succeffours of "the great Selenem, and hath carryed away their Wives and Daughters prisoners by force. This great

And thus, in making hafte to drive out Mithridates, we shall bring our selves into married Mi-" great danger, to provoke a new Enemy, even Tigranes against us, who of long time hath lurked Daughter. " for a just occasion to make Wars with us : and he can have no honester cause to take Arms, then "to defend and keep a King his neighbour, and so near a Kinsman, from utter destruction, and "one that is compelled to leek unto him for fuccour. What need we then to provoke him to "procure it, and teach Mithridates (which he purposeth not) to whom he should repair for aid, to "make Wars against our selves: and prick him forward, or to say better, put him with our own "hands into the way to go feek aid of Tigranes, which of himself he will never do (thinking "it a dishonour unto him) unless we drive him to it for very necessity? Is it not better for us to "give him leafure and time, to gather a fecond force again of himfelf, and his own People, that we might rather fight with the COLCHIANS, TIBARENIANS, CAPPADOCIANS, and with " fuch other People whom we have so many times overcome : then with the MEDES and ARME-"NIANS. With this determination Luculius tarried a great while before the City of AMISUS . continuing this fiege of purpole, without diffreshing them at all. Afterwards when Winter was past, he left Murana there to continue the fiege, and himself with the rest of his Army went to meet Mi- Mitbrillates thridates: who had planted his Camp near unto the City of CABIRA, determining to tarry the Camped at ROMANS coming, having gathered together again a new Army of forty thousand Footmen, dates Army, and four thousand Horsmen, in the which he put his most confidence and trust, so that he passed Lycus st. over the River of Lycus, and went and presented Battell to the ROMANS in the plain Field. There the Horsmen skirmished, and the ROMAN's had the worse : for there was one Pomponius a ROMAN taken, of great estimation, who was brought unto King Methridates hurt as he was. Mithridates asked him, if in faving his Life, and healing his wounds, he would become his Servant and Friend. Straight replied Pomponius, With all my heart, quoth he, so that thou make Peace with the ROMANS: if not . I will ever be thine Enemy. The King efteemed his courage much, and would do him no hurt. And as for Lucullus he was afraid to come into the Plain , because his Enemy was the The constancy ftronger of Horimen: and he doubted also on the other fide to take his way by the Mountain, be- of a Roman Souldier. cause it was very high, uneasie to climb, and full of Woods and Forrests. But as he stood thus doubtfull, they took certain GRECIANS by chance that were fled, and hidden in a Cave hard by, a- Mithridates mong the which there was an old man called Artemidorus, who promifed Lucullus, if he would be- Horimen. leeve and follow him, he would bring him into a fureftrong place to lodge his Camp, where was a Castle above the City of CABIRA. Lucullus beleeved the old mans words, wherefore so soon as night came, he raised great fires in the Camp, and went his way; and after they had passed certain straight and dangerous ways of the Mountains, he came in the morning unto the place where Artemido us had promifed to bring him. Now the Enemies were marvellously amazed when day light came, to see him there over them, in a place where if he lift to fight, he might come upon them with advantage : and if he liked not to stir, it was unpossible to compell him. For he stood indifferent then to hazard Battell, or not. But in the mean feafon, they fay certain of the Kings Camp by chance were a hunting the Hart. The ROMANS perceiving that, fell upon them to cut them off by the way: and they began by this mean one to charge another, in such fort (relief growing still on either fide) as Mithridates men grew the stronger. But the ROMAN'S seeing their men fly from the Trenches of their Campabove, were in such a rage, that they all ran in a choler to Lucallus to pray him he would lead them to Battell, and give them a fignall to fight. Lucal- The fight of Ins , because he would show them by experience how much the presence and eye of a good wife Ca- a Generall in ptain in time of need was worth: commanded them they should not once stir, and he himfelf in Person went down into the Valley, where he commanded the first of his men he met withall force. flying, to flay, and return to the fight again with him. Which they presently did, and all the other in like case: and thus gathering them together again, did easily make their Enemies return, that before had them in chase, and drave them back, fighting with them even hard to their own Fort. Afterwards upon his return again to his Camp, he fet his Souldiers that fled, unto a certain Apolitick piece of work to shame them withall, which the ROMANS are wont to use in such a case: and device of the that is, that he made them die a dirch of twelve foot long, being in their shire all pure that and Romans to that is, that he made them dig a ditch of twelve foot long, being in their fhirts, all untruffed, and punish cowtheir other Companions present seeing them do it. Now there was in King Mithridates Camp, one ardly Souldiers. Olthacus, Prince of the DARDARIANS (which are certain Barbarous People dwelling upon the The Dardari-Marishes of Maotin) a Noble Gentleman of his Person, Valiant and skilfull in Wars, and a man any what Peoof very good andgement to do any great enterprise, as any that was in all the Army, and further-ple they be: more a Prince of great good grace and entertainment in company, knowing how to fashion himself with all men. This Prince, being always at strife with other Lords of the Countrey, and contending who should have the first place of Honour and favour about the King : went unto Mitbridates, and promifed him that he would do him notable Service, and that was, that he would kill Lucullue. The King was very glad of this promife, and praifed him marvelloufly in fecret : howbeit openly of purpose he did him many injuries, because he might have some colour to counterfeit anger and displeasure, and to give way for him to go yeeld himself unto Lucullus, as he did. Lucullus was marvellous glad of him, because he was one of the chiefest men of Name in all his Camp; and to prove him withall, gave him charge immediately: in the which he behaved himself fo that he did him this Honour, to call him fometimes unto the Councell, and make him fit at his Boord. ger by Otthern One day when this DARDARIAN Prince Olthacus thought to have found fit occasion to execute his enterprise, he commanded his Footmen to be ready with his Horse out of the Trenches of the Camp : and at noon days when the Souldiers took reft, and slept here and there in the Camp, Olibacus Prince he went unto Lucullus Tent, thinking to have found no body there to keep him from coming in, confidering the familiarity Lucallus thewed him, faying also he had matters of great importance to talk with him of : and fure he had gone in immediately unto him, if sleep that casteth away fo many other Captains, had not then preferved and faved Lucullus that slept. For one of the Grooms of his Chamber called Menedamus, who by good Fortune kept the door of the Tent, told him that he came in very ill time, because Lacullus being wearied with travell and lack of sleep, was but then newly layed down to rest. Olthacu, whatsoever the other said to him, would not be so answered, but told him, he would come in whether he would or not, for he must needs speak with him in a matter of great importance. Menedemus answered him again, that nothing could be of greater importance, nor more necessary, then the preservation of his Masters Line and health, who had need to take reft: and with these words he thrust him back with both his hands, Olthacus was afraid then, and withdrew himself secretly out of the trenches of the Camp, took his Horse back, and rode straight to Mithridates Camp without his purpose he came for, which was to kill Lucullus. And thus it plainly appeareth, that occasion, and opportunity of time, even in great matters delivereth means to fave or destroy the Life of man, like as drugs and Medicines given unto the fick and diseased Persons. Shortly after, Luculius sent one of his Captains, called Sornation, to get Victuals, with ten Enligns of Footmen. Whereof Mishridates being advertised, sent presently at his tail one of his Captains also, called Menander, unto whom Sornation gave Battell, and slew him, with great saugher of his men beside. And afterward Lucuslins fent another of his Lieutenants, called Adrianus, with a great company of Souldiers, to get Vision and the saughest saughe Atuals into his Camp more then he should need. But Adrianus at his return passed by Mithridates Camp with great Pomp and Majefty, carrying a huge number of Carts loaden with Corn and Spoyls he had won: which drave Mithridages self into so great a dispair, and all his People into such a sear and trouble, that he presently determined to remove thence. Whereupon, the Nobility and such as had place of credit about him, began to fend before, and fecretly to convey their Stuff out of the Camp, but cause of muti-utterly prohibiting others to do the same. The rest of the Souldiers seeing the stoutness of the Kings Minions, began to fet upon them with open force, not suffering them on the other side once to iffue out of the Camp. This mutiny grew to fuch a fury, that they overthrew their carriages and sumpter Moyls, and slew them presently. Amongst others there was slain Derilans one of the chiefest Captains of all their Camp, who had nothing about him but a Purple Gown, for the which they killed him: and Hermans the Priest of the Sacrifiers was troden under foot, and smothered at the Camp Gate, by reason of the multitude of those that fled in so great disorder. The King himfelf amongst others fled, but having never a one of his guard about him, nor any Coretonness of the Squires of his Stable to bring him a Horse, Ptolimie, one of the Grooms of his Chamber, Coverounces covered him in the company of them that fled, lighted off his own Horfe, and gave him the of Souldiers. King, but even in manner too late. For the ROMANS that followed him were then even hard at his tail: and it was not for lack of speed they missed the taking of him, for they were very near him; but the coverounces of the Souldiers was the loss of the Prey they had so long sought for, with fo great pain and hazard of Battels, and deprived Luculus of the Honour and reward of all his Victories. For they were so near unto him, that if they had but followed Mithridates never fo little further, they had out of doubt overtaken him and his Horfe, and carried him away. But one of the Moyls that carried his Gold and Silver (whether by chance, or of pretended policy of Mithridates, as a matter purposely abandoned to them that pursued) was found in the middest of the high-way betwire him that fled, and the ROMANS that followed, who flayed there to rob the Gold and Silver, fighting about it, that Mithridates by that means wan ground fo far before them, as they could never after come near him again. And this loss was not all which the coverousness of the Souldiers made Luculius to lofe. For, one of the chiefest Secretaries of the King being taken, called Callistratus, whom Luculius commanded to be brought unto him to his Camp: they that had the charge of him, hearing tell that he had five hundred Crowns in a Girdle about him, for greedinels of them, flew him by the way; and yet notwithflanding Lucullus suffered them to spoil and destroy the whole Camp of their Enemies. After Mithridates flight, Lucullus took the City of CABIRA, and many other Castles and strong places, where he found great Treasure, and the Prilons full of poor Priloners of the GRECIANS, and many Princes akin unto the King himfelf, which were thought to be dead long before : and then feeing themselves delivered from this milerable bondage, by the grace and benefit of Lucullus, thought with themselves they were not onely taken out of Prison, but revived and turned again unto a second Life. There was also taken one of King Mithridates Sifters called Niffa, whose taking fell out profitable for her:

because all Mithridates other Wives and Sisters, whom they placed furthest off, as out of all danger (and fent into a Countrey of greatest fafety , near unto the City of PHARNACIA) died pitiful- Millridges ly and were miserably sain. For Mithridates sent one of the Grooms of his privy Chamberun. Sew his Sisters to them, called Bacchides, to bring them word that they must all dye. Amongst many other Noble and Wives, Ladies, there were two of the Kings Sisters, called Roxane and Statira, which were forty years old a piece, and yet had never been married: and two of his Wives also whom he had married. both of the Countrey of IONIA, the one called Berenice, born in the Isle of CHIO; and the other Monime, in the City of MILETUM. Monime the was very famous amongst the GRECIANS: for notwithstanding King Mithridates importunate dealing, being far in love with her, in so much as he sent her fifteen thousand Crowns at one time, yet she would never give ear unto his suit, untill such time as the marriage was agreed upon between them, and that he had sent her his Diademe or Royall band, and called her by the Name and Title of Queen. This poor Lady after the marriage of this Barbarous King, had long lived a wofull Life, bewailing continually her accuried beauty, that in flead of a Husband, had procured her a Mafter : and in flead of the matrimoniall company which a Noble Woman should enjoy, had gotten her a guard and Garrison of Barbarous men, that kept her as a Priloner, far from the fweet Countrey of GREECE: in change whereof, the had but a dream and shadow of the hoped goods she looked for, having unfortunately left them within her own Countrey she happily enjoyed before. Now when this Bacchides was come unto them. and had commanded them from the King to chuse what manner of death they would, and which every one of them thought most eatie, and least paintuil: Monime pucks on the Royau Dania from her head, and tying it on a knot about her neck, hung her felf, but the Band not being The courage of Monime, Mievery one of them thought most easie, and least painfull : Monime pluckt off the Royall Band firong enough, brake incontinently. Whereupon she cryed out : O cursed and wicked tiffue, Monime, MI-thridates Wife, wilt thou not yet serve me to end my sorrowfull days? And speaking these words, cast it on the ground, and spit upon it, and held out her throat to Bacchides to be cut asunder. These pitifull missortunes went thridates Sister. to Lucullus heart, who was courteous and gentle of nature: nevertheless he went on farther, still following Michidates at the heels: unto the City of TALAURA. And there understanding that he was fled four days before unto Tigranes in ARMENIA, returned back again, having first fubdued the CHALDEANS, and the TIBARENIANS, taken ARMENIA the less, and brought the Cities. Castles and strong places unto his obedience. That done, he sent Appine Cloding unto King Appine Cloding Tigranes to summon him to deliver Mithridates unto him: and himself took his journey towards fent unto Tithe City of Amisus, which was yet belieged. The caule why this fiege continued to long, was the granes from fufficiency and great experience of the Captain that kept it for the King, called Callimachus, who Callimachus understood fo well how all forts of Engines of Battery were to be used, and was so subtill besides in Governous of all inventions that might serve to defend a place besieged, as he troubled the ROMANS much in Amissia. this attempt: but afterwards he was not onely met withall, and payed home for all his labour. but also outreached by Lucullus for all his fineness. For where before he had always used to found the retreat at a certain hour, and to call his men back from the affault to rest them: one day he Lucultus wan brake that order on the sudden, and coming to affault the Wall, at the first charge wan a piece of it, Amisus. before those within could come in time to refift them. Callimachus seeing that, and knowing it was now unpossible to keep the City any longer, forfook it. But before his departing he fet the City Callimachus on fire, either for malice to the ROMANS, because he would not they should enrich themselves settleth fire on with the fack of fo great a City: or else for a policy of War to have the more leasure to fave flieth, himself, and fly. For no man gave eye to them that fled by Sea, because the flame was so great, that it dispersed it self even to the very Walls, and the ROMAN Souldiers, they onely prepared to Luculus courspoil. Lucullus seeing the fire without, had compatition of the City within, and would gladly have the City of Aholpen it, and for that purpose prayed the Souldiers quickly to quench it: but not a man would milus, hearken to him, every one gaping after the spoil, making great noile with clashing of Harnels, and being very loud befides otherwise, till at the length enforced thereunto, he gave the City wholly to spoil, hoping thereby to save the Houses from fire, but it fell out clean contrary. For the Souldiers themselves in feeking all about with Torches and Links lighted, to see if any thing were hidden, they fet a number of Houses on fire. So as Lucullus coming into the City the next morning, and feeing the great desolation the fire had made, fell a weeping, faying unto his familiar friends about Lucullus gentle him, he had oftentimes before thought Sylla happy, howbeit he never wondred more at his good For- faying. tune, then that day he did. For, Sylla faid he, defired to fave the City of ATHENS, the gods granted him that favour that he might doit: but I that would fain follow him therein, and fave this City, Fortune thwarting my defire, hath brought me to the reputation of Mummine, that caused Co-RINTH to be burnt. Nevertheless he did his best indeavour at that time to help the poor City as gain. For touching the fire, even immediately after it was taken, by Gods providence there tell a shower of Rain as it was newly kindled, that quenched it: and Lucuilus self before he lest the City, madea great number of the Houses which were spoiled by fire, to be built up again, and courteoully received all the Inhabitants that were fled , befides them , he placed other GRECIANS therealfo, that were willing to dwell amongst them, and increased the bounds and confines of the City which he gave them, one hundred and twenty furlongs in the Countrey. This City was a Colonie of the ATHENIANS, who had Built and Founded it, in the time that their Empire flouriflied, and that they ruled the Seas: by reason whereof, many flying the Tyranny of Arifica, went to dwell there, and were made free of the City, as the naturall Inhabitants of the fame. This good hap fell upon them, that forfaking their own goods, they went to possess and enjoy the goods of other men: but the very Citizens of ATHENS it felf that had escaped from this great defolation, Luculius cloathed them well, and gave them two hundred Drachmas a piece, and fent them again into their Countrey. Tyrannion the Grammarian was taken at that time, whom Min ana begged of Luculum and Luculum having granted him unto him, he made him free, wherein he dealt very discourteously, and did much abuse Lucullus liberality and Gift unto him. For in be-Tyrannion the Rowing this Priloner upon him, who was a famous Learned man, he did not mean Murena should Grammarian take him for a bondman, whereby he should need afterwards to make him free. For seeming to make him free, and reftore him to liberty, was no more then to take that Freedom and liberty from him, which he had from his Birth. But in many other things, and not in that onely, Murana laid himself open to the world, that he had not all the parts a worthy Captain should have in him. When Lucullus departed from Amssus, he went to vifit the Cities of Assa, to the end that whilest he was not now occupied with Wars, they might have fome refreshing of Laws and justice. For, by reason that Law was not executed of long time in Asia, the poor Countrey was fo afflicted and oppressed with so many evils and miseries, as no man living would scant beleeve, nor any Tongue can well declare. For , the extream and horrible covetouinels of the Farmers, Customers, and ROMAN Usurers, did not onely devour it, but also kept it in such bondage and thraldom, that particularly the poor Fathers were driven to fell their goodly young Sons and Daughters in marriage, to pay the interest and usury of the Money which they had borrowed to discharge their fines withall; and publikely the Tables dedicated unto the Temples, the Statues of their gods, and other Church Jewels: and yet in the end, they themselves were also to be judged bondmen and flaves to their cruell creditors, to wear out their Bodies in milerable fervitude. And yet the worst of all was, the pain they put them to before they were so condemned : for they imprisoned them, fer them on the rack, tormented them upon a little Brasen Horse, set them in the Stocks, made them stand naked in the greatest heat of Summer, and on the Ice in the deepest of Winter, fo as that bondage feemed unto them a relief of their mileries, and a rest of their torments. Luculus found the Cities of Asia full of fuch oppressions, but in a short timeaster he delivered them all that were wrongfully tormented. For first he took order, they should account for the utury that was payed monethly, the hundred part of the principall debt onely, and no liveth Afia more. Secondly, he cut offall usuries that passed the principall. Thirdly, which was the greatest from extream matter of all , he ordained that the creditor and usurer should enjoy the fourth part of the profits That is after and revenues of his debter. And he that joyned usury with the principall, that is to say , took the rate of usury upon usury, should lose the whole. So that by this order, all debts were payed in less then twelve in the four years, and the owners Lands and revenues fet clear of all manner of payments. This furhundred for charge of uluries, came of the twenty thouland Talents, wherein Sylla had condemned the Laws fet dowr Countrey of Asia: the which Sum they had payed twife before unto the Farmers and Collefor ulurers. ctors of the ROMANS, who had raifed it, still heaping usury upon usury to the Sum of six core thousand Talents. Wherefore these Collectors and Farmers ran to ROME, and cryed our upon Lucullus, faying, that he did them the greatest wrong that could be : and by means of Money, they procured certain of the common Counfellors to speak against him: which they might easily do, because they had divers of their Names in their Books that dealt in the affairs of the Commonwealth of ROME But Luculius was not onely beloved of those Countries whom he did good time, but was wifted for and defired also of others, who thought the Countries happy that might have Appins Cloding fuch a Governour. Now for Appine Cloding, whom Luculin had fent before from TALAURA Lucillus Vives unto King Tigranes in Armenia, and whose fifter at that time was Lucillus Wife: he first Brober. took certain of the Kings men for guides, who of very malice guided him through the high Countrey, making him fetch a great compass about, by many days journeys spent in vain: untill such time as one of his infranchized bondmen that was born in Syria, taught him the right way. Brother. Whereupon he discharged these Barbarous guides and leaving the wrong wayes they had led him, within few days past over the River of Euphrates, and arrived in the City of ANTIOCH, surnamed EPIDAPHNE. Where he had commandment to abide Tigranes return, who was then in the Countrey of PHOENICIA, where he subdued certain Cities, and had some other yet to Conalter any thing. For the rule of these ARMENIANS was intollerable to the GRECIANS, and fpecially the pride and arrogancy of the King. Who, by reason of his great prosperity, was Tigrange pride grown to fuch pride and prelimption, that whatfoever men did commonly efteem best, and make and power. most reckoning of, he would not onely have it, and use it as his own, but also took it that all was made for himself whatsoever : and this great overweening grew, by reason of fortunes special grace and favour towards him. For at the beginning he had but very little, and yet with this little (which few made reckoning of) he conquered many great Nations , and plucked down the Power of the Bersians as much as any man that ever was before him, He replenished the Countrey of Mesopoma acia with GRECIAN Inhabitants, which he brought by force out of CILICIA and CAPPADOCIA, compelling them to inhabit there. He made the A-RABIANS change their manner of living, who are otherwise called the SCENITES , as much to fav . as Tene dwellers , because they are vagrant People that dwell in no other Houses but Tents. which they ever use to carry with them; and brought them out of their naturall Countrey, and made them follow him, using them for his commodity in trade of Merchandize. There were ever many Kings in his Court that waited on him : but amongst others, he had four Kings that waited continually on his Person as his Footmen a for when he rode abroad any whither, they ran by his stirrop in their shirts. And when he was set in his Chair of State to give audience, they stood on their feet about his Chair holding their hands together, which countenance thewed the most manifest confession and tokens of bondage that they could do unto him: as if they had shewed thereby that they refigned all their liberty, and offered their Bodies unto their Lord and Mafter . thore ready to fuffer , then any thing to do. Notwithstanding , Applus Clidius being nothing abashed nor feared with all this Tragicall, Pomp, when audience was given him, told dru, Incallus King Tigranes boldly to his face, that he was come to carry King Mitbridates away with him, Ambashadour who was due to the Triumph of Lucullus: and therefore did Jummon him to deliver that King in- unto Tigranes. to his hands, or else that he proclaimed Wars upon himself. They that were present at this fummons, knew well enough, that Tigrases (although he fet a good countenance on the matter openly with a faint counterfeit laughing) yet hearing these words so boldly and gallantly spoken out of this young mans mouth, was galled to the quick, and hit at the heart. For Tigranes having reigned (or to fay better, Tyrannically governed) five and twenty years space, had never heard any bold or frank speech but that. Notwithstanding; he answered Appins, that he would not deliver Muhridates, and it the ROMANS made Wars with him, that he would defend himself. And being greatly offended that Lucultus in his Letters gave him not the Title. King of Kings, but onely King simply: in the Letters he wrote back to Lucullus again, he did not so much as vouchsafe to call him Captain onely. But when Appins took his leave, he sent him Appins abstigoodly rich Presents, which he resused. Whereupon the King sent others again unto him, nence from taof the which Appins took a Cup onely, because the King should not think he resused ought of king of Gists. anger, or ill will: and so sending all the rest again unto him, made great haste to return to his Captain Lucullus. Now Tigranes before that time would not once fee King Mithridates his to near kinfman, who by fortune of Wars had lost fo puitfant and great a Kingdom, but proudly kept him under, in Fenny Marith and unwholfome Grounds, without any Honour given Tigranes and unto him, as if he had been a very Prisoner indeed: howbeit then he sent for him honourably. Mithridates and received him with great courtesie. When they were near together in the Kings Pallace they meeting. talked fecretly one with another, and excusing themselves, clearing all suspicions conceived between them, to the great hurt of their Servants and Friends, whom they burthened with all Metrologue the occasion of unkindness between them : amongst which number Metrodorus the SCEPSIAN praise and was one, a man excellently well Learned, Eloquent in speech, and one whom Mithridates so much death. loved and effected, that they called him the Kings Father. Mithridates at the beginning of his Wars had fent him Ambassadour unto Tigranes, to pray aid of him against the ROMANS. At which time Tigranes said unto him : but what sayes thou to it Metrodorus: what advice wilt thou give me? Mesradorus exther because he had regard unto Tigranes profit, or else because he was loth Mithridates should escape, answered him again: As Ambassadour, O King, I would with you frould do it : but as a Counfellour, that you should not do it. Tigranes now reported this freech unto Michridates, not thinking he would have hurt Metrodorus for it, though indeed he prefently pur him to death upon it. Whereat Tigranes was heartily forry, and repented him greatly to have told him for much, although he was not altogether the occasion of his casting away, having but onely revived Mithridages evill will before conceived against him: for he had born him diffleature of a long time, as appeared amongst his fecret Papers and Writings that was forbidden to frequent the GRECIANS company any more, which grieved him to much that he familhed himself to death, and would eat no meat. And that man was also very honourably buried by the Queen Cleopatra, near unto a place called Sapha, as they call it in that Country. Now when Lucullus had quieted all things in Asia, and had eftablished good Laws among them, he was not carelets also of Games, Feafts, Wreftlings, and Fence-playes at the sharp for joy of his Victory, delighting all the Cities of Asia with them; the which in recompence thereof did institute a solemn Feast also in the Honour of him, which they called Lucullea, and did celebrate it with great joy, shewing a true and no fained friendship and good will towards him, which pleafed him better, and was more to his contentation, then all the Honour they could devise to give him. But after that Appin Clodin was returned from his Ambassade, and had told Luculius that he must make Wars with Tigrames: Luculius went back again unto the Realm of PONTUS, where he took his Army which he had left in Garrison, and brought it before the City of SINOPE to lay Siege unto it, or rather to befiege certain C111-Lucultur taketh CIANS that were gotten into the City in the behalf of Mithridates. Lucullus being advertised of it, entred the City, put eight thousand of the Cilicians to the fword which he found there, and reftored the natural Citizens and Inhabitants Sinope in Ponthereof to all that was theirs. But the originall cause that made him to be carefull to preserve the City, was this Vision he had. He thought in his nights Dream that one came to him, and said : go a little further Lucullum, for Antolyem cometh, who is desirous to speak with thee. This Dream awaked him, but being awake could not imagine what the Vision meant. And they report that at the return from this voyage, the Ship in the which Antolyem was imbarked, with Demoleon and Phlogim, made Shipwrack upon a rock of the Coast of CHERRONESUS, where the was cast away: howbeit that he and his men scaping with all their Furniture, came to the City of SINOPE, which he took from certain Strians, who came (as they fay) of one Syrue the Son of Apollo, and of the Nymph Synope Afopm Daughter. In the mean feason he was ad-Sylla's note for vertifed that Tigranes and Mithridates were ready to come down into Lycaonia and Ci-LICIA, because they might first enter ASIA. Lucullus marvelled much at Tigranes Councell, that sithence he was minded to War with the ROMANS, he did not use Mithridates aid in his Wars at such time, as when he was in his best strength and force: and that he did not then joyn his Power with Mibridates, rather then fuffer him to be destroyed and overthrown, and afterwards with a cold hope go now to begin a new War, hazarding himself with those that could not be the themselves. For when his men would have had him to have taken a Castle by force, where they said was great store of Gold and Silver, he shewed them Mount Taurus afar off, and told them, it is that which he must rather go to take: as for the things which be in this Castle, they be kept for them that vanquish. And going on still with great Journeys, passed over the River of Tigris, and so entred the Realmos Tigris st. ARMENIA with a main Army. Howbeit in the end, Mithrobarzanes, one of Tigranes Familiars, was the next man that enterprifed to tell him the truth : whole boldness had little better reward for his News Tigranes send then the first that was beheaded. For Tigranes sent him immediately with three thousand Horse, eth Mithrobarand a good number of Footmen, commanding him that he should bring Luculius alive onto him, games sgainst and that furthermore, he should march upon the bellies of his men. And hereupon Lucullus straighted the Siege as much as he could, perswading himself that Tigrames would never suffer that it should be taken, but C'though he had otherwife determined) yet for very anger would prefent him battell , thereby to enforce him to raife his Siege. And furely he gueffed right, had it not been that Misthridatts had differed him by express Letters and Medlengers that he should in no case hazard Battell, and persuaded him rather to cut off the Victuals on all fides from the ROMANS with his Horfmen. The feli fame councell and advice did Taxiles (the Captain whom Mithridates fent) give him in his Camp, and prayed him very earneftly, that he would not prove the invincible force of the ROMANS. tradeth Tigra- Tigrants patiently hearkned to their reasons at the first , but when the ARMENIANS were come , nemotto beh and all the force of the Countrey befide, and the GORDIÆNIANS, and that the Kings of the with the Pa MEDES and of the ADIABENIANS were come also with all their Power, and that on the other fide there came a marvellous great Host of the Arabians that dwell upon the Sea of Babylon, and a multitude of the ALBANIANS from the CASPIAN Sea, and of the IBERIANS their neighbours, besides a great company of free People living without a King, that dwell by the River of Araxes, fome coming freely to do him pleasure, other for their Pensions and Pay which he gave them : then was there none other talk neither at his Table, nor in Councell, but of affured hope of Victory, and of great brags and barbarous threatnings, fo that Taxiles was in great danger of himself, because he was againft the determination taken in Councell for giving of the Battell. Now was it thought that Mithridates did envy the Glory of King Tigranes, and therefore did thus diffwade him from Battell. For which respect Tigranes would not so much as tarry for him, and because also Mishridates should have no part of the Honour of his Victory : but went into the Field with all his great Army, vaunting amongst his Familiars as they report, that nothing grieved him but one, that he should fight with Luculius alone, and not with all other ROMAN Captains. Now this bravery was not lo fond, nor fo far out of square, but that there was great likelihood of it when he saw so many fundry Nations about him, fo many Kings that followed him, fo many Battells of armed Footmen, and fo many thoulands of Horimen. For he had in his Army of Bow-men, and Slings onely, twenty thoufand : five and fifty thousand Horsmen , whereof seventeen thousand men of Arms armed from top to toe, as Lucalim himself wrote unto the Senate; and an hundred and fifty thousand armed Footmen, divided by Enfigns and Squadrons: of Pyoners, Carpenters, Masons, and such other kind thousand men, of handicrafts men, to plain ways, to make Bridges to pass over Rivers, to ftop freams, to cut thousand men. of handicrafts men, to plain ways, to make fuch kind of Works, of this fort of People, the number of five and thirty Wood, and to make fuch kind of Works, of this fort of People, the number of five and thirty thousand, who followed in Battell ray in the rereward of the Army, making their Camp feelin far greater, and by so much the more stronger. When Tigrames shewed on the top of Mount Taurus, and that they might plainely fee his whole Army from the (ity, and that himself also might easily differn Lucullus Army that belieged TIGRANOCERTA: the barbarous People that were within the City were so glad of this fight, that they made wonderfull shouts of joy, and great clapping of hands, threatning the ROMAN's from their Walls, and shewing them the Army of the Ar-MENIANS. Luculius in the mean time fate in Councill to confider what was to be done: wherein some were of opinion that he should raise his Siege, and go with his whole Army undivided Lucallar Army against Tigranes. But others liked not that he should leave so great a number of Enemies at his against Tigrs back, neither that he should raise his siege. Luculius made them answer, that neither of them both did counfell him well, but both together did councell right. Whereupon he divided his Army, and left Murana at the Siege of TIGRANOCERTA with fix thousand men: and he with four and twenty Cohorts (in the which were not above ten thousand armed Footmen) and all his Horlmen, with a thousand Bow-men and slings, or thereabours, went towards Tigranes, and camped in a goodly broad Field by the Rivers fide. The ROMAN's feemed but a handfull to Tigrants Camp, so that for a while Tigranes Parasites made but a May-game of them to sport withall. For some laughed them to scorn, other drew Lots, and played away their part of the Spoyls, as if they had already won the Field : and every one of the Kings and Captains came and offered themselves to Tigranes, and befought him every man for himself, that he would give him the Honour alone to lead his Battell; and that it would please him to fit by in some place to fee the sport. Tigranes then, because he would shew that he could be as pleasant as the rest, fpake a thing known to every man: If they come as Ambaffadours (quoth he) they are very many: but if they come as Enemies, they be but few. And thus they played upon the ROMANS, and took their pleasure of them at that time: but the next morning by break of day, Luculius brought all his men armed into the Field, and put them in order of Battell. Now the Camp of the barbarous People lay on the other fide of the River towards the eaft, and by chance the Stream of the River turned suddenly towards the West, where there was a better Foord to pals over. Wherefore Luculium marching with his Army by the Rivers fide, following the Stream to meet with some Foord, casting to get over, Tigrames thought he had marched away, and called for Taxiles, and faid unto him, laughing Doeft thou fee Taxiles those goodly ROMAN Legions, whom thou praisest to be men so invincible, how they sie away now? Taxiles answered the King again: I would your good Fortune (O King) might work fome miracle this day: for doubtles it were a firange thing that the ROMAN'S should flie. They are not wont to wear their brave Coats and Furniture upon their Armour, when they mean onely but to march in the Fields: neither do they carry their shields and targets uncased, nor their burganets bare on their heads, as they do at this prefent, having thrown away their leather cases and coverings. But out of doubt, this goodly furniture we see so bright and glistering in our faces, is a manifest fign that they intend to fight, and that they march towards us. Taxiles had no fooner spoken these words, but Lacultus in the view of his Enemies, made his Enfign-bearer turn fuddenly that carried the first Eagle, and the bands took their places to pass the river in order of battle. Then Tigranes secretly come to himself, as out of drunkenness, cryed out aloud twice or thrice, Come they then to us? But then was there no small ftir and tumult, to put such a world of people in battle. The King Tigranes, himself undertook to lead the middle battle, gave the left wing unto the King of the ADIABENIANS, and the right The ordering to lead the middle battle, gave the left wing unto the King of the ADIABENIANS, and the right of treatment of the Complear armed men, who of treatment of the complear armed men, who of treatment armed men, who is battle. made the first front of all the battle. But as Lucullus was ready to pass the River; there were certain of his Captains that came unto him, to wish him to take heed that he fought nor that day, betain of his Cappanis that came unity man, and the state of the state o black: for upon one of those days, one Cepio was overthrown in a fet battle with all his Army by unfortunate the CIMBRES. But Lucullus gave them a pretty answer again, which is not forgotten to this days, day: I will make this a happy day (said he) for the Romans. It was the fixteenth, day of the moneth of October. And so with those words encouraging his men, passed over the River; and went himself the foremost man, and marched directly towards his enemy, armed with an Anima of steel, made with scallopshels, shining like the Sun, and upon that an arming coat fringed round about holding his fword drawn in his hand : to let his men understand, that they must suddenly joyn Lucullus battle with their enemies, and fight at the fwords point that were not acquainted to fight but a far off with Lucullus aguite thor and flings, and that he would so quickly win the distance of ground they had to march ere they could joyn, that they should have no leisure to shoot. And surthermore, perceiving that the strength of their men of Arms (whereof they made so great account) was ranged in battle under a hill, the top whereof was very plain and even, and the way up the hill not passing four furlongs travel, and not very hard nor fleep to climb : he fent thither certain horsemen of the THRACI-ANS and GAULS which he had in pay, and commanded them to give a charge on the flanck to disorder them, and affay to cut their launces with their swords. For all the strength of these men of Arms confifteth in their launces, and they can do nothing of themselves, nor against their enemies, they are so heavily armed and loden: so as it feemeth they are locked up in their Armour, as in an iron prison. And he himself therewithall taking two Ensignes of sootmen, strove also to gain the top of the hill: his fouldiers following him hard at the heels with a notable courage, because they faw him the foremost man travelling on foot, and digging against the height of the hill. When he had gotten up to the top, he stayed a little in the highest place he could find, and cryed out with a loud voice: O companions, the victory is ours. And as he spake those words, he led them against these men of Arms, commanding them they should not meddle with throwing of their darts, but taking their fwords in their hands they should strike at their thighs and leggs, because they have no other parts of their bodies naked. Howbeit, there was no need of fuch fight, for they tarried not the ROMANS, but with great crying out turned their horse heads immediately, and ran coward-out any stroke stricken, or any man hurt, or dee drop of blood seen to be spite. But the great slaughter was when they began to fly, (or to say better) when they thought to fly: for they could not fly, they ran so one upon anothers neck, by reason of the marvellous length and breadth of their battles. Tigranes, amongst the rest was one of the first that dislodged with a small company, and seeing who by chance was taken and brought unto Lucullus: so that amongst the other spoil and prisoners, there was taken Tigranes Diadem. It is thought that there were flain at this overthrow, above an hundred thousand footmen, and very few of all the horsemen saved. On the ROMANS side, there were about an hundred hurt, and five flain. Antiochus the Philosopher speaking of this battle in a Treatife he made of the gods, writeth that the Sun never faw the like overthrow. And Strabo another Philosopher in a certain abridgment he made of stories, said, that the ROMANS were alliamed and laughed at themselves, that they had drawn their swords against such dastardly flaves. And Tiem Livin declareth also, that the ROMANS were never in any battle with so small a number of fighting men, against so great a multitude of enemies: for the conquerors were dermined and confumed Mithridates by holding back and delaying, at that time when all his strength was whole : and to the contrary he destroyed Tigranes with great speed and haste. And thus did he that which few Captains could ever do: that is, tiled delay of time to execute, and valiant expedition to win the victory. This was the cause why Mithridates made no hast to come to the battle, thinking still that Lucullus had used his wonted policy, to delay and give back always and therefore he came by small journeys unto Tigranes Camp. But meeting at Wherefore Luculus praise: the oldest and best experienced Captains of the ROMANS did highly commend Lucullus, be-Kings overcause he had overcome two of the greatest and most mighty Princes of the world, by two fundry come by concontrary means; the one by tract and delay, and the other by speed and swiftness. For he un-trary means the first with a few of the ARMENIANS that fled as he came on his with the first with the fraget, he straight mistrusted the overthrow: but afterwards meeting greater Troops of them naked, and fore wounded, then he knew how the matter went. So he went to feek out Tigranes, whom he found alone, forfaken of his men, and in very poor efface, yet did not he require Tigrames in adversity with that pride and difdain he had ufed him before in his milery: but lighted off his horfe, to bewail with that price and unuantitie has direct than desired in managery on the more to devait with him their common misfortune, and gave him all his Officers, and train of a Kings Court, that followed him to ferve him, comforting him, and exhorting him to pluck up his heart again, and to be couragious thereforth. Hereupon they both levyied afresh the whole force and power they could from all the parts of their Dominion. In the mean feafon, there fell our great fedition in the City of TIGRANOCERTA, between the GRECIANS and the barbarous People : for the GRECI-ANS, they would have yielded up the Town into Lucullus hands. Whereupon Lucullus giving an affault to the City at that very inftant, won it, and feized upon the Kings treasure there, leaving all the reft to the spoil of the souldiers: in the which, besides all other riches, there was eight thousand talents in ready money. And yet befides all that, he gave of the spoil that was won upon the ene-Lucullus took mies, eight hundred Drachmaes unto every fouldier. And understanding that there were divers Munies, common players, Minstrels, and such kind of people meet for feasts and sport, whom Ti-Tigranecerta. granes had fent for thinher from all parts, to dedicate the Theatre he had made in this City: he cauted all them to ferveat the sports and feasts of this Victory. After the solemnization whereof, he sent the Grecians home again unto their Country, and gave them money to defray their charges the Way, and the Barbarous People also that were brought thither by force from their native Countries. And so it fortuned, that by the desolation and destruction of a City for saken, many others were built again, and flored with people: because those Cities had thereby recovered their natural inhabitants again, who ever after did love and honour Lucallus, as their benefactor and founder. All other things prospered also according to his vertue and merits. For Luculliu liked Lucullus iubetter the praife that came of bounty, of juffice, and of clemency, then that that came by force of flice and clemartial prowefs and Chivalry. For in deeds of Arms, he faid his Army partly deferved praife, and fortune also carried the best part away: but the praise of the other, was onely due unto himself. Whereby he shewed the valour of an exceeding good man, well taught and trained up in vertue: and fo reaped the fruit of his worthy deferts. For by those good parts, he wan the hearts of the Barbarous People in fuch fort, that the Kings of the ARABIANS came of good will to put themselves and their goods into his hands. So did the Nation of Sophenians also yield themselves unto him, The GORDIENTANS, in like manner, they liked Lucullus fo well, that they would willingly have for faken their Cities, houses and Country, to follow him with their wives and children, upon this occasion: Zarbienm King of these GORDIANIANS, as we have recited before, had privily entred amity with Luculum, by means of Appin Clodim, who could no longer away with the tyranny of Tigranes. This practife was bewrayed unto Tigranes, who put Zarbienus, his wife and children to death, before the ROMANS main Army came into the Country of ARMENIA. Howbeit Lucullus did not forget it, but paffing through this Realm, gave him very royal funerals: for having heaped flain by Tigra- up a huge pile of Wood, sumpruously fet our with cloth of Gold and Silver, and other rich spoils of Tigranes: he himself in person would needs set it on fire, and made the funeral essusions and accustomed iprinklings at funerals, with his friends and kinfmen, doing him this honour, as to call him friend and confederate of the ROMAN people, and appoint also a great sum of mony besides to creek a sumptions Tomb for him. For they found great store of Gold and Silver in the Kings Castle, and there was plenty of provision also of 300000 bushels of Wheat: the which did enrich his fouldiers marvelloully, and made Lucullus to be wondred at, that having received not one Drachma from the sparing coffers at Rome, he norwithstanding made the war entertain it self. About the same time also, the King of the PARTHIANS fent Ambassadors to him, to offer him friendship and alliance: which Lucullus willingly accepted, and fent Ambaffadors unto him alfo of acceptation, who made report to Lucullus at their return, that the King of the PARTHIANS frood doubtfull how to resolve which part he would take, and that fecretly he fent unto Tigranes, to ask the Realm of MESOPO-TAMIA for his reward to aid him against the ROMANS. Lucullus being truely informed of the King of PARTHIA's double dealing, determined to leave Tigrames and Mithridates, as two enemies wearied and overcome, and a little to prove the force and power of the PARTHIANS by making Wars upon them, thinking it great honour unto him, if he might discomfit and overthrow three io mighty Kings, one after another, like a valiant conqueror that had overcome three famous Capatins together, and had paffed through the Countries of three of the greateft Princes under the Sun, always a conqueror, and never conquered. Hereupon he wrote immediately unto Sornatius and other of his Captains which he had left to keep the Realm of PONTUS, that they should repair to him with all fpeed with the bands they had under their charge, for that he was determined to depart out of the Country of GORDLENA, to go against the PARTHIANS: howbeit his purpose altered by occasion. For his Lieutenants that had many times before found their fouldiers mutinous, and rebelling at their commandments, knew plainly then their cankred fromachs, and in-corrigible disobedience. For they could not possibly get them from thence, by any compulsion or persuaffions they could use: but contrarily they cryed out, and told him plainly, that they would no longer tarry where they were, but would go home to their Country, and leave the Realm of Pontus without guard or garrifon at all. And further, that worft of all was, when these news were brought to Lucullus Camp, they gave a full example of boldness to his fouldiers there, to

Lucullus hearing of this their talk, and many other their words, worse and fuller of sedition then these, brake off his enterprize against the PARTHIANS, and went again in the midst of Summer to meet with Tigranes. But when he was come to the top of mount Taurus, it grieved him to see the fields so full of wheat yet standing, which came by the season of the year, and coldness of the air, being so slack and slow in all those parts. Nevertheless, he came down into the valley, and at two or three skirmishes overthrew the Armenians, that ventured to abide his coming down: and ran over all the valley, and destroyed the whole Countrey without let or stop of any man, taking away the provision of Corn that was made for Tigranes Camp, whereby he straightned his enemies unto that need and neceffity of victuals which himself feared, and yet ceased not to provoke them (by all other means) to come to battle: fometime inclosing their Camp with trenches about, as if he meant to famish them : fometime again destroying and spoiling the whole Country before their face. But because they had so oft been discomfitted, they would no more stir, nor once move against him. Lucullus perceiving that, in the end railed his Camp, and went and laid fiege unto ARTAXATA, the chief feesth Artaxis-City of the Kingdom of ARMENIA, in the which were Tigranes lawfull Wives and young children, hoping that Tigranes would rather hazard another battle, then fuffer that City to be loft. It City of Armeis faid, that Hannibal of CARTHAGE (after King Amiochus was overthrown in battle by the Ro- nia MANS) went unto King Artaxes, whom he taught many necessary and profitable things for his Artaxes King Realm, and amongst others, considering that one of the goodliest and pleasantest places of all his of Armenia. Kingdom lay wafte and no reckoning made of it, drew a plot of a City, brought the King thither, and caused it to be built and inhabited. The King liked his device marvellous well, and prayed him to take the charge upon him to fee the work finished. And thus was this noble and famous City built, and cal- Hannibal builled after the Kings name, ARTAXATA; and held ever after the reputation of the chiefest place of the ded Artaxata whole Realm of ARMENIA. Tigranes being advertised that Lucullus went to lay siege thereunto. could not endure it, but went with all his Army to follow the ROMANS, and the fourth day came and Camped hard by them: infomuch as there was but the River of Arfanias between them, which the ROMANS of necessity must pass over to go to ARTAXATA. Lucullus having first facrificed unto the gods, affuring himself of the victory, as if he had it already in his hands, made his Army pass over in order of battle, putting twelve Cohorts in the front, and the other behind, fearing left the Lucultus order enemies having a great number of men of arms should environ them at their backs. They had a of his Army, gainst them also the MARDIAN bowmen on horseback, and the IBERIANS with their Lances, in whom Tigranes trufted more then in any other, as in the best fouldiers he had in pay : and ver for all that they did no notable fervice. For when they had skirmished but a little with the horsemen of the ROMANS, they durst not tarry the legionaries or footbands that came behind them, but dispersed themselves, some flying one way, some another; which inticed the ROMAN horsemen to follow the chase. But when the men of Arms that were about Tigranes person, saw the horsemen so scattered abroad, they began straight to break upon the footmen. Lucullus seeing the great multitude of them, and how passingly they were armed and appointed, being somewhat afraid thereof: sent in hafte to call in his horlemen that followed the chafe, and in the mean time himself marched foremost, against these Lords and Satrapes, which were in the front before him with all the Nobility of their hoaft, whom he put in such a fear, that before he could come to hand strokes, they all turned tail Other do read and fled. There were three Kings ranged in battle one hard by another, howbeit of the three, he that in this place, fled most shamefully and cowardly, was Mithridates King of Pontus, who had not the heart fo much egainst the Aas to abide the cries of the Romans. The chase was very long: for it continued all night, untill tropatenians. fuch time as the ROMANS were wearied with killing, taking of prifoners, and packing up of all which are peokinds of spoils. Titus Living faith, that there were flain moe men in the first battle, but greater Three Kines personages in the second : and the chief of the Enemies were all taken. After this battle Lucullus ranged in batheart being big, and fearing nothing, determined to go farther into the Country, even unterly to de-tle stroy this barbarous King. But in the time of the equinoctial Autumn (when the weather waxed more Lucullus mabitter then any man would in that feafon have thought) there fell out to great a cold, that for the fly again. most part, it did nothing but snow: and if the element did any thing clear, then froze it so hard, that the horse could come by no water, the Rivers were so extreamly congealed with ice. And there could no man pass over by foard: for they did not so soon enter, but the ice brake and cut the veins and finews of the horse legs asunder, they were so hard and thick withall. And furthermore the Countrey being full of Trees, Woods and Forrests, and the ways very narrow, not being able to pass by the fields, they were through wet with snow that fell upon them: and when they came to their lodging, then it was worfe, for there they were constrained to lye in fost and moist places. And therefore the fouldiers had followed but few days after this battle, but they refused to go any farther. And first they sent their Colonels and Captains to, entreat Lucullus to leave off this journey. Afterwards they gathered together more boldly in Troops, and in the night time began to murmure and groin in their Tents (which is a certain fign and token of a mutinous Army, that hath a mind to rebell against their General) although that Luculius used all gentle perswasions to win them with patience to abide this journey, at the least, till time they might take the City of CARTHAGE in ARMENIA: to the end they might there destroy the work and memory of the greatest enemy that ever the ROMANS had in the world, meaning Hannibal. But when he faw all this would not prevail, he brought them back again, and passed over mount Taurus ano-The Country ther way, and came down into the Country called My GDONIA, a very hot and fertile foil, where there is a great City, and marvelloufly replenished with inhabitants: who call it NISIBIS, and the GRECIANS CAll it ANTIOCH OF MYGDONIA. In that City Gourge was Governour, who was Tigranes own brother: but for experience in Engines of battery, and for sufficiency and skill in fuch matters, there was Callimachus also, he that so marvellously troubled Luculius before at the Lucular taketh frege of the City of Amisus. Lucular placing his Camp before this City befreged the same by all Lucusuartuseen mage of the Congression of the Congr And as for Gouras who submitted himself to Lucullus mercy, he was very courteoully intreated. But for Callimachus, he would not once hear him speak, notwithstanding that he promised, if they would did fet the CI- fave his life, he would tell them of coffers full of great treasure hidden, which no man knew but himfelf onely. But Lucullus commanded them to bring him with gives to receive the punishment he had justly delerved, for fetting the City of AMISUS on fire, and taking from him the mean to shew the GRECIANS his goodnels, affection and liberality towards them. Untill this prefent time, it might be truely faid, that good fortune ever favoured and followed Lucullus in all his enterprises and affairs: The alteration but from that time forwards, it was quickly feen that the favourable blaft of fortune failed him, he did all his things with fo great pain, and all that he did, fell out contrary unto him, and to very ill purpose. Indeed he did ever shew the valiancy, patience, and great courage that should be in a valiant General, or Lieucenant of an Army. But his exploits and doings had never after, that easie grace, nor fhining glory they were wont to have: but to the contrary, he was like to have loft all that he had won before, Lucultus caufe through the misfortunes that fell upon him, and for the brawls and vain contention he had with his people to no purpose. But the worst was, that they made himself the onely Author of all these evils: because he could not, or would not entertain the good-will of the multitude of his fouldiers: thinking that whatfoever a General, or any other Officer of state or calling doth to please and content them he hath under his charge, is to dishonour himself, and to give cause unto his souldiers to despise his authority. But that which made most against him was this: that he gave no estimation to Gentlemen, and men of like quality to himself, but diffdained them, and thought them unworthy to be e-Lucularitailes, qual with him. For these they say were his faults and imperfections, but otherwise that he wanted noverties; nor generall gifts and good conditions that could be possibly wished for or defired. For he was a tall Gentlemen, of goodly prefence, well fpoken, wife and discreet, as well in matters of government, as in Wars: and as well to perswade the people in peace, as to encourage his fouldiers in War. Saluft writeth of him, that his fouldiers began to millike with him, even from the first entry into these Wars, because he made them lie out two Winters together in the field, one after another: the one before the City of Cizicus, and the other before the City of Amisus. And even as much did the other Winters following yex and trouble them: for either they lay in their enemies Countrey, or elfe if they lay in their friends, yet he made them Camp abroad in the field, and shrowd Lucultus Army themselves in their Tents: for Lucultus never entired with his Army into any City or confederate everlay in the Town of GREECE. Now if the fouldiers of themselves milliked Lucullus, the Orators at ROME that were his enemies, and enwyed his prosperity and glory, gave them yet greater occasions to muriny against him. For they continually accused him to the People in their Orations, that he drew our his War in length, purporely because he would always have occasion to rule, and means to get, having in his hands in manner all CILICIA, ASIA, BITHYNIA, PAPHLAGONIA, GALATIA, PONTUS, ARMENIA, and all the Provinces and Regions as far as to the River of Phasis: and yet he had not long before spoiled the Princely houses of Tigranes, as if he had been fent thither onely to fack and spoil; and not to destroy and overcome those Kings. And they say that it was Lucius Quintius, one of the Prætors that spake these words. It was he also that most moved the People to take order that Lineulius should be called home, and other sent to succeed him in the charge and Government of the Countries he had fubdued. By the felf fanie mean it was also ordained, that divers which were under his charge, should be dispenced withall for their Oaths, and licenced to leave the Wars when they thought good. But befides these and fuch like great causes, there was yet another more dangerous plague, and that most overthrew Lucullus proceedings, passing all the other evils being put together: and that was Publim Cladus, a wicked, licentious, and a hairbrained man. He was Luculus wives brother, and flie was fo light of her body, that Clodius her brother was accused of incominency with see. This Codies being at that time in Lawillus Camp, carried not that estimation and credit he thought himself worthy of. For he took shimself equal with the best, and would needs have been holden for chief; when indeed there were many of far better defert, he being noted both for a vicious and ill disposed person. Whereupon he began for spite to Suborn the band called FIMBRIANS, and to stir them up against Lucullus, fowing sweet and pleasant words amongst the fouldiers, which being wonted thereunto, looked still to be flattered. For they were those whom Fimbria had procured to kill the Consul Flaceus, and chuse him in the fouldiers - his fleed for their Captain. By reason whereof they gave good ear to Clodius words, and called gainst Lucultur him a Noble Captain, and a lover of footldiers. For when he spake onto them, he made as though he had pitied them, for that they should never fee an end of their great pains and Wars, but should miserably confume their days in fighting continually, sometime with one Nation, and fometime with another: and that they wandred through all the Countries of the World, receiving no worthy reward of fo long and painfull fervice, ferving onely to guard. Lucullus Carts and Cammels loden with plate and veffels of gold and filver, and other precious stones. Where the fouldiers that had ferved under Pompey, took now their eafe at home in their Country with their wives and children, and were landed men, dwelling in goodly fair Cities, as rich Burgeffes and wealthy Citizens: and yet they had not driven Mitbridates and Tigranes out of their Kingdoms, into defert places unhabitable, nor had destroyed the Princely houses of ASIA, but onely made a little War in SPAIN against those that were banished, and in ITALY against fugitive slaves. Shall we then, said he, carry harnels on our backs all the days of our life? Is it not better that we which are escaped untill this present, reserve our selves, our bodies and lives for that Noble Captain, who esteemeth the greatest honour and glory he can atchieve unto, is to make his fouldiers rich that ferve under him? Lucullus Army was so seduced and corrupted with these mutinous and seditious accusations, that the fouldiers would no longer follow him, neither against Tigranes, nor against Mithridates who went presently out of ARMENIA into his Realm of PONTUS, and began to conquer it again, whilest the ROMAN fouldiers mutining against their General, remained idle in the Province of GORDIA-NA, excusing themselves by the Winter season, and tarrying untill Pompey or some other Captain should quickly come to raise the fiege, and succeed Lucullus. Notwithstanding, when they underflood that Mithridates had overthrown Fabius, one of Lucullus Lieutenants, and that he went a- Mithridates gainst Sornatius and Triarius: they were then ashamed of themselves, and became contented to be victory of Luled by Lucullus. But Triarius in a bravery, when he heard that Lucullus drew near, made haft to cultus Lieurewin the victory, as if it had been cock-fure before Lucullus came, and was himself overthrown in a nants. win the victory, as it it had been constitute before Emerging cane, and was minuted overtinown in a Mithilities ogreat battle, where fome fay there died above feven thouland ROMANS, amongst the which were vercame Trisa hundred and fifty Centurions, and twenty four Captains or Colonels of a thousand men apiece, and rius, Lucullus yet besides, Methridates took their Camp also. Shortly after this overthrow, Lucullus came thither, Captain. who hid Trigrius, whom the fouldiers fought in their anger by all the means they could to kill. Now when Lucullus was come, he proved fundry means to procure Mithridates to battle : but Mithridates would not once ffir abroad, because he looked for Tigranes that came down with a mighty power. Whereupon he determined again to go against Tigranes to fight with him, before Mithridates and he joyned forces together. But as he was in his journey towards him, the FIMBRIAN The Fimbrian bands began to rebell anew, and would not follow his Enfigns, faying, and alledging for themselves, fouldiers forthat by decree of the people they had leave to depart, and were discharged from their oath: and furthermore that Lucullus had no more ado to command them, confidering that the Government of the Provinces which he had, was given unto others. Lucullus perceiving this, did so humble himself Lucullus forced unto them, supposing that way to win them, as there was no kind of uncomely humility, but he submitted himself unto it: insomuch as he went into their Tents to pray and entreat them one after a mutinous soul nother, with water in his eyes, and with fo great lowliness, as even to shake hands with them. But diers. they fiercely rejected all his courtefies and fair entreaties, cafting their penniless purses before him. and angrily bad him fight with his enemies alone, fince he had with the spoil of them all so well enriched himself alone. Nevertheless, at the intercession and earnest request of the other souldiers, these FIMBRIAN bands were compelled to promise, that they would yet tarry all that Summer, so that if no man in the mean time offered them battle, at the end of the term they might go where they would. Lucullus was forced to accept this condition, or else to remain alone, and confequently to forfake the Countrey of the Barbarous People. With much ado thus he kept them together, but in The Fimbrian fuch fort, as he durft no more venture to compell them to come to battle, contenting himfelf that fouldiers tarry tuch tort, as he durit no more venture to compen them to band, containing minited that out the Sumthey were willing onely to ftay with him, being forced to fuffer Tigranes in the mean time to demonstrate upon constroy and over-run the Countrey of CAPPADOCIA, and Mithridates also to brag again, of dition to dewhom he had before written to the Senate that he had utterly overcome him: infomuch as there came part when Sum Commissioners and Deputies from Rome by his own procurement, to order the state of the Realm met was done. of Pontus with him, as of a Kigdom already won to the Roman Empire. But when they were come, they found him not mafter of himself, and that his own souldiers flouted him, and did him all the spite and injury they could. For they were so unruly towards their Captain, and did so much disdain him, that when the end of Summer was come, they Armed themselves with Armour and weapon, and drawing out their swords in mockery, challenged their enemies to battle which were gone out of the field: and after they had made the noise and cries accustomed when they joyned battle, and made as though they fought, hurling and fwinging their fwords in the air, they went from the Camp, declaring openly that their time was expired, which they promifed Lucullus to tarry. On the other fide, Pompey had written unto the other fouldiers that were yet in Camp, Pompey, Luculto come unto him: for through the peoples favour at ROME, the practiles and flatteries of the lus fuccessor in Common-Countellers there, he was substituted General in Lucullus place: which much misliked Asia. the Senate and Nobility, for they thought Lucullus greatly wronged to have a successor sent, not to succeed him in troubles and dangers, but in glory and honour of triumph. And that they should compell him not onely to refign up the Office of a General to another, but (for the good service he long time had done) the reward of his honour due for the same: and this also more misliked them that were then about him. That so soon as Pompey was arrived in Asia, he took all power and authority from Lucullus, to punish or reward any manfor good or ill service done to the Common- Injuries offerwealth in those Wars; and did moreover prohibite by publick Bills set up in every common ed Lucullus by place, that they should no more repair unto him, nor obey ought that he, or any of the ten Pompey.

Commissioners sent to dispose of the state of the Provinces won by him, Sould command or ordain : and because Pompey came with a greater power and Army then his, he was in some sear of him. Their friends thought good nevertheless they should meet together: and so they did incontinently, in a village of GALATIA, where at the first meeting they saluted each other very courteoully, rejoycing together of the noble Victories that either had won. Lucullus was the elder man, but Pompey of greater dignity, because he had been General of the ROMAN People in many Wars, and had already triumphed twice. The bundles of Rods which the Sergeants carried before them, were wreathed about with Laurel branches for the Victories they had both atchieved: but Pomrey's bundles were withered away, because they had come a long journey through hot and dry Countries. Lucullus Officers feeing theirs withered, courteoully gave them of theirs fresh and new gathered: which Pompey's friends took for a fign of good luck. For to say truely, the things that Lucullus did in the time of his charge, were cause of the honour that Pompey alterwards wan. Howbeit'in the end, for all their talk, they were no whit the better friends : but depart-Missikings be- ed the one from the other more strange than they met. For Pompey by a plain Edict, brake, revoked and difannulled all Lucullus Ordinances, and taking from him all his other fouldiers, left him but only fixteen hundred to accompany his Triumph, and yet they followed him with unwilling minds: such was Luculin imperfection and maim, either by nature or frowardness of fortune, that he lacked the chiefest thing a General should have, which was, to be beloved of his fouldiers. For if he had attained to that perfection, amongst many other his excellent vertues, magnanimity and wisdom, judgement and justice, the River of Euphrates had not been the uttermost confines of the Empire of ROME on ASIA fide, but it had extended as far as the fea Hyrcane, yea even unto the utmost part of the world. For King Tigranes had already conquered the other Nations that lie beyond that, faving the Country of PARTHIA, which then was not fo great nor strong, as it appeared afterwards in Craffus time: nor so joyned and knit together, but (what through civil diffentions amongst them at home, and forrain Wars of their neighbours abroad) was fo weak, that with great difficulty they could defend themselves from the Armenians, that continually harried them out of their skins. But to take things rightly as they be indeed, methinks that Lucullus did more hurt unto his Countrey by other, then he did benefit the fame by himfelf. For tokens of triumph and victories which he wan in ARMENIA fo near unto the PARTHIANS, the Cities of TIGRANOCERTA and of NISI-BIS, which he had sacked and spoiled, the great treasure that he brought to ROME, and the Diadem also of Tigranes, which was shewed in triumph as a prisoner with the rest : moved (rassum with fuch a marvellous defire to pass into AsaA, as if all the barbarous people had been nothing but an fit, upon fight affured fpoil, and a prey exposed unto all those that would come to take them. But Crassus far otherwise finding himself gauled and troubled with the Arrows of the PARTHIANS, knew then by proof, that Luculius had not fo much overcome his enemies for that they wanted skill, or were a cowardly people, as he had done through his wisdom and valiantness. But that shall be seen hereas-Craffur, what cowardly people, as he had done through nis windown and variable from first of all his brother Marcus ac-fuccess he had ter. Furthermore, Lucullus being now returned to Rom E, found first of all his brother Marcus ac-ture. Furthermore, Lucullus being now returned to Rom E, found first of all his brother Marcus ac-ture. Furthermore, Lucullus being now returned to Rom E, found first of all his brother Marcus accufed by one Gaiss Memmiss, for that he had done in his Office of Treasurer in Sylla's time, and by his commandment, whereof he was cleared by fentence of the Judges. But Memmisus of spite turned his anger against Lucullus self, stirring up the People against him, and letting them underfland that Luculim had kept back and robbed much part of the Treasure, which should have come to the Commonwealth; and that to work his feat the better, he had prolonged these Wars as he did: wherefore he periwaded them flatly to deny him thehonour of his triumph. And truely Lucullus was in great danger to have lost it utterly, but that the Noblemen of the City, and they that were of greatest authority, intermedied themselves with the Tribes when they came to pass it by voices of the People; whom they entreated so much through fute and persuation, that in the end, with much ado, the People fuffered him to enter the City in triumph. So Lucullus made a triumphantentry, not terrible nor troublesome for the long shew or fight thereof, nor for the multitude of things that he had brought thither with him, as many other Captains had done before him. For he caused the Shew-place (which they call Circus Flaminius at ROME) to be set out and furnished chiefly with Armour and Weapons of the Enemies to a marvellous number: and with the Kings Engines and Inventions of battering pieces, which was a pleafant fight to behold. And in this thew, there was a certain number of his men of Arms bravely armed, ten Carts of War armed with Sythes that passed by, and threescore of the chiefest friends and Captains of the two Kings that were led prisoners through the City. And there were also drawn after them, an hundred and ten Gallies all armed in the Prores with strong spurs of Copper, and a statue of Mithridate; all of clean gold, fix foot high, with a rich Target fer with precious stones. Besides all that, there were twenty Cupboards as full of filver Plate as could be, and thirty Cupboards full also of golden Velfels, Armour and Coin of gold, carried upon mens thoulders. After them followed eight Mules laden with golden beds, and fix and fifty other Mules that carried filver Bullion, and a hundred and feven other Mules that carried filver Coin, amounting to the fum of two hundred threefcore and ten thousand Sestertias. Furthermore, there were books of account carried also, wherein were particularly written the sums of money which Lucullus had delivered before unto Pompey for the War against Pirates on the Sea, and unto the Treasurers and high Treasurers, to put into the sparing coffers of the Commonwealth at Rome. And afterwards in an Article by it felf, that he had given nine hundred and fifty Drachma's to every fouldier by the poll. After the flew of this triumph was ended, he made a general Feaft, in the which he feafted all the City and Villages thereabours, which the ROMANS call Vicos. And afterwards for fook his wife Clodia for her Lucultus for-12gs increasous, which the roams of the control of the control of the carbange, taketh Civilia, Cato's fifter: howbeit he wan nothing by the exchange, taketh Civilia, taketh Civilia, Cato's fifter: for he sped as evil with the second as he did with the first. For, saving that the was not slandered with and marrieth the incest of her own brethren, otherwise she was as dishonest and unchaste as Clodia: and yet he Serville. bare withall a while for her brothers sake, but at the length grew weary of her, and put her away as Cato's fifter, as he had done Clodia. Now when he had filled the Senate with a marvellous hope and expectation of dia. him (who thought they had now got one to encounter and withfrand Pompey's tyranny, and to uphold and maintain the Authority of the Nobility and Senate against the People, for that by his noble deeds he had atchieved to great fame and reputation) he fuddenly gave over all dealings in the affairs of the Commonwealth: either because he faw it so best, being a hard thing now to keep it from ruine: Lucullus givor elfe (as other faid) for that he felt himself sufficiently furnished with honour and wealth, and there- eth over gofore determined from thenceforth to live quietly all at his eafe, after fo great pains, travels and trou-vernment of bles, the end whereof fell not out over fortunately. And furely fome were of his mind, and liked the Commonthis great change of his marvellous well, because he did not as Marius did, neither happened on the ill success and end that Marine had. For Marine after the notable victories which he brought from the CIMBRES, and after his valiant Acts in Wars which had won him great honour, yet would he not so leave off, when he might have been Chronicled to his wonderfull glory: but of an unfatiable mind, and ambitious defire to rule and bear fway (being withall a very old man) went and forted himself amongst young men desirous of Government, who brought him not onely to commit many outrages, but made himself also to suffer greater cruelties. It is thought also that Ciccra had ended his aged course more happily, if afterwards he had quenched Catilines conspiracy, he had then taken his ease. And so had Scipio in like case, if when he had joyned NUMANTIA unto CARTHAGE, he would then have quieted himself. And therefore, some fay, that there is a certain revolution and time appointed, beyond the which no wife man should meddle any more with the affairs of the Commonwealth: no more then a man whole youth and strength is gone and decayed, is any more fit to just, wrastle, or enter into such exercises of the body. But contrarily Crasfus and Pompey mocked Lucullus, because he gave himself so much to pleasure and pastime: as if to live pleafantly and delicately did not worse become his age, then to command an Army, or to govern the affairs of a Commonweal. And for my part, reading Lucullus life, methinks that I read an ancient Comedy, the beginning whereof is tedious, and the latter end joyfull. For at the begins ning of his life, you find notable exploits, done by him in Wars, and great good government alfo in peace: but in the end they all turned into feafts and bankets, and lacking little of masks and mummeries, dancing with torches, and all other such delights fit for young men. For I bring within the Lucutlus build: compass and reckoning of his fineness and pleasures, his sumptuous buildings, his stately walks and ings and pleasures, Galleries, his hot-houses and stoves, his tables and pictures, his statues also, and the great workman-sures. ship and curiofity he had besides of all other Arts by him gotten together out of all parts, to his infinite charge: abusing therein the world of goods and treasure gotten and won in the Wars, in time of his charge and Office of General, and otherwise. Infomuch, that notwithstanding excess and superfluity hath ever since increased untill this present time, yet they reckon the gardens Lu- Lucullus Garcullus made, to be the most sumptuous and delicatest places that the Emperors have. And therefore dens of great clamation against superfluity, saying that men think that a poor house where there is no more were not given to pleasure, could not Pompey live? And so willed them to get him some other such thing, as they might more eafily come by. Cato was Lucullus friend and kinfman both, and yet he fo much miliked his manner of living and ordinary expense, that one day a young man making a long and tedious Oration in open Senate (out of time, and to no purpose) touching mean diet, sobriety, and temperance of life; Cato could no longer abide him, but rofeup, and faid unto him: What, wilt thou not leave babling to us all day; thou that art rich as Crassus, that livest as Lucullus, and speakest as Cato? Other affirm that these words were spoken thus, but that it was not Cato that spake them: nevertheless it is certain, by the noble fayings they have gathered of Lucullus, he did not onely delight to live so delicately, but also he gloried in it. Some write that he feathed certain GRECIANS many days together in his house, that were come out of GREECE to ROME: and that they being men brought up with the fobriety and fimplicity of GREECE, after they had been feafted there divers times, were alhamed, and refused to go thither any more, being afterwards entreated to come to Lucullus, supposing that he had made them this great chear for their own sakes. Lucullus hearing of it, ings of Lucultus told them: My Lords, I pray you refuse not to come to me for that; indeed I must needs grant that there is fomewhat more then ordinary to welcome you withall; but I tell you truly, the most part is for Lucullus sake. Another time when he supped all alone, and his men had laid but one board, and prepared but a reasonable supper for him, he was very angry with them, and called for his steward, to know why he was fo ferved: the Steward answered him: My Lord, because I saw you fend for no body, I thought this supper sufficient. What said he again, knewest not thou that Lucullus should fup to night with himself? In fine, Lucullus fare was so well known through Rome, that there was no talk but of Lucullus noble house-keeping. Whereupon, Cicero and Pompey being desirous to fee the proof thereof, came one day to him in the Market-place feeing him at leasure: for Cicero was Lucullus very good friend, and Pompey (though there was some jar between them for matters of Wars) did not let for all that to come unto him, and to speak gently one to another. And Cicero after he had faluted him, asked him if he would be contented they should come and see him. Oh, faid he, with all my heart: I pray you come to me. Well then, faid Cicero, Pompey and I will come and tup with you to night, with condition that you provide no more then your ordinary:

Luculus told them again, they should then fare but badly, and therefore it was better they tarried till to morrow. But they would none of that, no nor fuffer him to fpeak with his men, for fear he should command them to provide somewhat more then for himself. Nevertheless, at his desire they suffered him onely in their presence aloud to tell one of his men, that he would sup that night in Apollo: ing divers halls (for fo was one of the most stately and sumptuous halls of his house called) and with that word onely he finely deceived them both, and they never found him. For every Hall had his certain fum and rate appointed for the charge and expence of every supper they made in them, and the ordinary furniture and fervice for the fame. So that when his fervants had their watch-word but in what Hall he would fup, they knew straight what charge he would be at for his supper, and what orders What Lucullus should be observed therein. Now Lucullus manner wasto spend when he made any feast in the Hall of Apollo, fifty thousand pence, and that felf day the supper was prepared according to that value: infomuch as Pompey marvelled how it could be possible that a supper of so exceeding great charge could be fo fuddenly prepared. In fuch things therefore did Lucullus lavishly and riotoully spend his goods, like spoils gotten of slaves and barbarous people. But that especially which he bestowed up-Lucallar Libra on Books, was a very commendable and honest expence. For that he gathered together a great number of notable Histories, the use whereof was more honour unto him, then the having of them. For his Library was ever open to all comers, and they suffered the GRECIANS to come into his goodly tarraffes and fairwalks, or other pleasant places thereabouts convenient to fit and reason together, and never thut door against them: where Learned men met commonly, and oftentimes fpent the whole day in conference together, as in the house of the Muses; being very glad when other matters were dispatched, they had so much leisure as but to go thither. And Lucullus selfwould also many times be amongst them, in those tarraffes and pleasant walks, delighting much to talk with them: and he did ever help to dispatch them that had any business with him, and granted the thing they requested of him. To conclude, his house was a common receipt for all them that Lucultus loved came from Greece to Rome. He loved all manner of Philosophy, and refused no Sect of the fame. But from his youth upward, he ever loved and esteemed best the ACADEMICK Sect, not that which they call the new ACADEMICK (although it flourished 2t that time through Carneades works, which Philo made such estimation of) but the old ACADEMICK, which the Philosopher Antiochus of the City of Ascalon did defend and maintain at that time, being an Eloquent Rhetorician and well spoken, whom Lucullus sought to win by all means, to make him his friend, and to have him in house with him: because he might inveigh against Philo's hearers and followers, whole Scholer Cicero among the reft was, that wrote a notable book against this old ACADEMICK feet. And in the same he reciteth Luculius, maintaining the opinion of the old ACADEMICKS: who hold, that a man may certainly know and comprehend fomething, and called that Catalepsin: but Cicero desended the contrary. The book is intituled Lucullus: for they were (as we have rehearled before) very good friends, and had both one felf defire for Government in the Commonwealth. For Lucullus did not fo withdraw himfelf from matters of state, that he would no more meddle at all, nor hear speak of them: but he betimes gave over all ambition and contention, as a thing of no small danger, and breeding great reproach and dishonour to Marcus Crassus, and Cato, to be chief in authority. And these two were they that defended the Senate, and whom they raifed up to withfrand Pompey's greatness, being affraid of him, after that Lu-Marcus Crafcullus had refused the chief place of authority. But otherwise, Lucullus would be in the Market-place fus, Cato, Luat Courts and Common-councils, to pleasure his friends when they requested him: and would go to cultus, against the Senate alfo, when there was occasion to break any new practife, or to overthrow Pompey's ambitious policy. For he overthrew all the orders and conftitutions that Pompey had made, after he had overcome the Kings Mithridates and Tigranes: and with the help of Cato hindred a distribution of mo- Pompy, ney which Pompey had written for to Rome, to be bestowed amongst his fouldiers. Whereupon Pom- Pompey, Crasfpey fell in friendship (or to speak more plainly, in conspiracy) with Crassus and Casar, by whose help sus, Casar, con and affiftance, he filled Rome with Arms and Souldiers; and made the people by force to pais and against the confirm what he would have done, after he had violently expulsed Lucullus and Cate out of the Mar- State, ket-place. Whereat the Noble men were much offended, and milliking the great wrong they had offered Lucullus and Cato, Pompey's followers suborned a BRUTIAN, and faid he was taken lying in wait to kill Pompey. Whereupon the faid BRUTIAN being examined by the Senate, named certain; but when he came before the People, he named Luculus, faying that he had hired him to still Pampey. But Circo calls him on man believed him: for they perceived openly in the Market-place, that he was procured by themfelves falfly to accuse Lucullus, and Pompey's other adversaries. And this was proved more plainly it may be that within a few days after, when they threw the body of this BRUTIAN dead in the midft of the ftreet, he was a Bruout of the prison, who they faid died of himself with sickness. Howbeit the marks being plainly seen tianborn. of the halter wherewith they had strangled him, and the stripes appearing also which they had given him, did plainly flew that they themselves did it, whom after they had suborned to accuse Lucullus, they flew in this manner. This was the cause why Lucullus did more then before absent himself from meeting in publick causes: but after, when he saw that they had so wickedly exiled Cicero, and found means also to convey Cato far enough off, under pretenced colour to fend him with charge into the Isle of CypRus: then he gave up altogether. Some write that a little before his death, he was not per- Lucultus fell fect in his wits, decaying through age by little and little. Howbeit Cornelius Nepos faith, that it was out of his wits not for age nor fickness that his wits did alter, but through poison which one of his slaves had given before his him, whom he had made free, called Califibenes: who gave it him, not of any evil intent, but became death.

Lucullus death, ple ran to honour his Funerals, and his body was carried to the place, by the young Noblemen of the City. The People would in any case have buried him within the field of Mars, as they had before buried Sylla. But because no man thought of it before, and also for that things necessary were not easily to be provided for the place : his brother Marcus belought the People they would be content his funerals might be at a Town of his own near unto the City of Thus Culum, where his Tomb was prepared: and he himself lived not long time after. Cimon returned again, comminding them that were lent tout with him to obey others; and had at one time done for his Country Three mitable dakes and hard for thing to have compared : to wir, made peace with the enemies, given them authority and rule over their controls; and joyned friendthip with the LAGED amon in the Bolt of them undertook to delicity great Empires, and conquer all ASIA: but mantered them controls their their enterprite to pals. The other can hardly be exclifed, that there was not a great fault in him : either in that he could not, or because he would not sause the complaints and griefs of his men, which caused them to much to hate and millike him. And yes a might be said also, that in this fault he was like unto Cimon: who was oftentimes accured by his Cinzens; and at the length banished his Country for the space of ten years, because that in ten years space (as Place faith) they should no more hear him speak. For to say truely, it feldome times happeth, that the grave wits of Noblemen CABIRA, SINOPE and NICIBIS. Towards the North, he went as far as the River of Phasis: towards the Eaft, into MEDIA, and Southward, even to the Red Sta, and unto the Realms of ARABIA, fubduing all unto the ROMAN Empire. And having overthrown all the power of these two mighty Kings, he took from them all, but their persons onely : who fled and hid themselves like wild beasts, in infinite Deferts and unpaffable Forreits. Wherein is eafily discerned the difference betwirt the doings of the one, and of the other. For the PERSIANS, as if they had had no hurt nor overthrow at all by Cimon, fought a battle immediately after against the GRECIANS, and overthrew the greatest part of their Army in EGYPT: where Mithridate, and Tigranes, after Lucullus victories, did never any notable act. For the one finding himself altogether pulled down on his knees, and broken by the former battles: durft never once onely shew his Army unto Pompey, out of the strength of his Camp, but by many great battles they had loft before unto Themistocles, King Pansanias, and Leotychides, who had overthrown them: and going now again to fight afresh with them, it was an easie thing to overcome the bodies of those, whose hearts were already vanquished. Where Luculius to the contrary, affailed Tigrames, that had never been overcome, but bare a marvellous Jofty mind with him, for the many great battles and conquests he had won. And for the multitude of enemies, there was no compa-rifon between those that Cimon overthrew, and those that were ranged in battle against Lucullus. So that all things weighted and confidered, it were hard to judge which of them two proved the worthieft man: for that it feemeth, that the gods did favour both the one and the other, telling the one what he should do, and the other what he should not do. And thus it appeareth by testimony of the gods, they were both good men, and that they both obtained everlatting glory.

THE COMPARISON OF

LUCULLUS with CIMOX.

Lucullus dent bleffed.

Othing (in my opinion) made Lucullus more happy, then to die when he did, before he faw the change and alteration of the Commonweal, which the fatal destinies plagued the ROMANS withall, with sedition and civil Wars: and that he died in his Country yet enjoying her liberty, but beginning then to fall to decay. And in that (above all other things) he was likeft unto Cimon; who died whilft the GRECIANS were in good love and peace with other, and nor in broil of discord and Civil Wars. Indeed Cimon died in his Camp, being General of his Country, at the fiege of the City of CITIUM in CYPRUS; not withdrawn to his home, as one wearied, living idly, or leading a voluptuous life in feafts and banquets, making that the end and reward of his Wars, victories and triumphs: but as Plato faid (when he wifely blamed and reproved Orphem, who promifeth perpetual drunkenness in the world to come, for reward of their vertue, that lived well in this life) merrily. And truely it is a great comfort and converted to the converted of their vertue, that lived well in this life) merrily. tentation of mind, for an old man feebled with age, and compelled by weakness, to withdraw himself from the world, as well in matters of government in Peace, as in Wars: and quietly to pass his time in fludy, where delight is joined with honest contemplations. But to finish his vertuous deeds, by referring them to pleafure, as unto their onely end, and moreover, to grow old by pleafure and vanity, following in the pleafure and vanity and in the pleafure and vanity of the pleafure and vanity and commanded fuch Arabical states and the pleafure and vanity and commanded fuch Arabical states and the pleafure and vanity and mies: that methinks a thing unworthy of an honest ACADEMICK, and altogether unmeet for one profeffing old Xenocrates doctrine, but fit rather for a man given over altogether to Epicarsu discipline. There is a wonderfull thing to be confidered of in these two men, that the ones youth was altogether vicious and reproachfull, and the others to the contrary, honeft and vertuous. But he is the better that changeth for the better: and that nature is always more commendable, in whom vice decayeth, and verthey both grew rich by one felf mean: but they did not both alike nie their riches. For it were to no purpole to compare the buildings of the Wall that standeth South within the Castle of ATHENS, which was built with the money (imon brought thither, with the fine built Chambers, and high raifed Turrets to gaze afar, and environed about with conduits of water, which Lucullus erected by NAPLES, with the spoils of the barbarous people. Neither is Cimons table also of moderate fare and diet, but yet open to every man, comparable to Lucullus board, which was sumptuously furnished, and shewed the greatness of his Lord. For Cimons board sed many mouths daily with a small charge: and Lucullus rable exceeded in expence, to feed a few, with superfluous dainties. Unless they will say, that time cauled this difference between them. But who cantell, if Cimon had been at leifure to have withdrawn himself to quiet in age from Government and Arms, he also would not have led a more sumpruous and diffolute life, given to all pleasure, then Luculin did? For of his own nature he loved wine, banquets, and plays, and was also given to women, as we have told you before. But prosperity, and fortunate fuccets of things do bring such delights to ambitious men of nature, and born to great enterprizes, that they make them forget to run after their other voluptuous vain defires. And therefore had Lucullus died abroad in the Wars, whileft he commanded armies, there had not been that living man, how curious soever he had been to reprove other mens faults, that could have detected him of any reproachfull vice. And thus much for their manner of life. Now furthermore, touching the flate of their Wars: no doubt both the one and the other were excellent Captains, as well by sea as by

N. ICIAS.

Ant. Christ. 424.

Have reason (as I think) to compare Nicial with Crassiu, and the events that happened to the one in PARTHIA, with those that beiell the other in CICILE: yet am I to pray them that shall happen to read my writings, not to think me in entermeddling with those matters (in the describing and reporting whereof, Thueydides hath gone beyond himself, both for variety and liveliness of narration, as also in choice and excellent words) to have the like intent and opinion, that Timess the Historiographer had. Who, hoping by the gravity and life of his words and reports, to darken the glory of Thurydides, and make Philifus (in comparison of himfelf) appear ignorant, and without any grave of historical narration: hath in his. History of purpose sought occasion to enter into the describing of those battles by sea and by land; and the report of those speeches and narrations, which are delivered by them with great judgement and eloquence. Wherein he cometh as near them whom he contends to pass, as dourthe Footman to the Ly-DIAN Coach, as faith Pindarus: and befides sheweth himself fond and of small judgement, or as Diphilus faith:

Timeus follies

The praile of

A lubber laden with Sicilian greafe. And in divers places he falleth into Xenarchus follies. As where he faith, that he thinks it was an evil token for the ATHENIANS, that Wieiss the Captain (whose name was derived of this word Nice, lignifying victory) diffwaded their attempts against SICILE: and that by throwing down and mangling of the Herms (to fay, the images of Mercury) it was foreshewed that they should receive great overthrows by the General of the SYRACUSANS, called Hermocrates, the ion of Hermon. And further, that it was not unlikely that Hercules did favour the SYRACUSANS, by reason of the goddess Proferpina (protector and defender of the City of SYRACUSA) to requite her for that she gave him Cerberus the dog, Porter of hell: and that he did malice the ATHENIANS besides, because they took the EGESTEANS parts (who came of the TROIANS, whom he much hated) for breaking their promife and faith with him, whose City himself had overthrown in revenge of the wrong that Laomedon King of TROY had offered him. Howbeit Timeus shews as much wit and judgment, in delivering Timess repro- us such toys in an history, as he doth in correcting the stile of Philistus, or in condemning and railing vech Plate and on Plate and Ariffeele. But in my farcy, this ambition and contention to write or to speak more clearly then others, theweth always a base envious mind, like a Scholler full of School points. But when it striveth with things that for their excellency are past imitation, then is it extream folly and madnels. Since therefore I may not pals over nor omit certain things, which Thucydides and Philifins have already fet down, and especially those wherein they open Nicias nature and qualities, which the variety of his successes and fortune did cover: I must lightly touch them, and report so much as is necessary and convenient, left men condemn me for sloth and negligence. And in the ling endeavoured to gather and propound things not commonly marked and known, which collected as well out of many old Anti-ellected as well out of fundary mens Works and ancient Records, as out of many old Anti-es and of them all compiled a Narration, which will serve (I doubt not) to decipher the Man and his Nature. Of Nicias therefore may be faid that which Aristotle hath written of him, that there were three famous Citizens of ATHENS, very honest men, and which favoured the Commonalty with a naturall fatherly love: Nicias the Son of Niceratus, Thucydides the Son of Milefins, and Theramines the Son of Agnon. But of the three, this last was of smallest account : for he is flouted as a Forreigner born in the Isle of CEOS, and challenged besides for inconstant and irrefolute in matters of State and Government : and inclining fometimes to one Faction , fometimes to another: he was called Cothurnus, a kind of Buskin indifferently ferving for both legs, and in old time was used of common Players of Tragedies. Of the other two, Thucydides being the elder, did many good acts in favour of the Nobility against Pericles, who alwaies took part with the inferiour fort. Nicias that was the younger, had realonable estimation in Pericles life time ; for he was joyned Captain with him, and oftentimes also had charge by himself alone without him. After Pericles death, the Nobility raifed him to great Authority, to be as a strong Bulwark for them. against Cleans insolency and boldness: and withall he had the love of the People to advance and prefer him. Now this Cleon in troth could do much with the People, he did so flatter and dandle them. like an old man, still feeding their humour with gain : but yet they themselves whom he thus flattered, knowing his extream covetousness, impudency and boldness, preferred Nicias before him, becaule his gravity was not fevere nor odious, but mingled with a kind of modefly, that he feemed to fear the presence of the People, which made them thereby the more to love and esteem him. For Niciss a timobeing (as he was) of a fearfull and mistrustfull nature and disposition, in Wars he cloaked his fear rous man. with good Fortune, which ever favoured him alike in all his Journeys and Exploits that he took in hand, where he was Captain. Now being much afraid of Accusers, this timorous manner of his The nature of proceeding in the City, was found to be popular, whereby he wan him the good will of the People; the People and by means thereof role daily more and more, because the People commonly fear those that hate them, and advance them that fear them. For the greatest honour Nobility can do to the Commonalty, is to shew that they do not despise them. Now Pericles, who through his perfect vertue onely, and force of his great eloquence ruled the whole State and Commonwealth of ATHENS, he needed no counterfeit colour, nor artificiall flattering of the People, to win their favour and good wills : but Nicias lacking that , and having Wealth enough , fought thereby to creep into the Peoples favour. And where Cleon would entertain the ATHENIANS with pleasant toys and devices. pies rayour. And where Caron would construct the piece of the property of the piece of the property of the piece of the property of the piece of the encounter, crept into the Peoples favour with liberality, with charges of common Plays, and with fuch like sumptuousness, exceeding in cost and pleasant Sports, not onely all those that had been be-ficence. fore him, but fuch also as were in his time. There yet remain Monuments of his confectating unto the gods, as the Image of Pallas in the Castle of ATHENS, the gilt being worn off: and the Chappell which is under the Festivall Table of Bacchus . for he many times had the chief price in Bacchie Dances, and never went away without fome gain. And touching this matter, there goeth a report, that at certain Plays, whereof Nicias defrayed the charges, one of his men came forth upon the Players Stage before the People, apparelled like Bacchus: and being a goodly tall young man, without any hair on his face, the ATHENIANS took fuch pleasure to see him so attired that they made a clapping of their hands a long time together for joy. Therewithall Nicias stood up, and told them, that it were a shame for him to leave the body of a man in bondage, that openly was effeemed as a god : and thereupon forthwith made this young Slave a Freeman. Men write also of certain sumptuous and devout acts he did in the Isle of DELOs, where the Dancers and Singers which the Cities of GREECE fent thither to fing Rhimes and Verles in the honour of Apollo, were wont before to arrive diforderly : and the cause was, for the numbers of People that ran to see them who made them fing straight without any order, and landing in haste out of their Ships, they left their Apparell, and put on fuch Vestments as they should wear in Procession, and their Garlands of Flowers on their heads, all at one prefent time. But Nicias being commanded to go thither to present the Singers of ATHENS, landed first in the Isle of RENIA, hard adjoyning to the Isle of Delos, with his Singers, his Beafts for Sacrifice, and with all the reft of his Train.

carrying a Bridge with him, which he had caused to be made at ATHENS, upon measure taken of the Channell, betwixt the one and the other Isle, set out with Pictures and Tables, with gilding, with Nofegays and Garlands of Triumph, and with excellent wrought Tapiftry, which in the night he fet up upon the Channell, being not very broad, and the next morning by break of the day caufed his Singers to pass over upon it, singing all the way as they went in his Procession so nobly let forth; even unto the very Temple of Apollo. And when the Sacrifice, the Feast, and Games that were to be played were finished, he gave a goodly Palm-tree of Copper, which he offered up to Apollo, bought Lands besides that cost him ten thousand Drachma's, which he consecrated also unto the god Patron of the Isle; and ordained, that the profits of the same should be yearly bestowed upon the DELIA'NS, upon an open Sacrifice and Feast, in the which they should pray to their god, for the health and prosperity of Nicias: and so caused it to be written and graven upon a Pillar he lest in DELOS, as a perpetuall Monument and Keeper of his Offering and Foundation. Afterwards, this Copper Palm-tree being broken by winds, it fell upon the great and act of his, there was a marvellous pomp, and great the lot pool that shall consider of his Life and Actions, may easily perfixed hunter that the property pure zeal and devotion, and secondly, to give pleasure and patime to the lot of the on. We find written in one of the Dialogues of Paliphoon, that Nicias did facrifice daily to the gods, on. We man wanted money to the gous, and kept a Soothfayer continually in his House, giving out abroad, that it was to counfell with him what should happen about the affairs of the Commonwealth: but in troth it was to enquire of his own business, and specially of his Mines of Silver. For he had many great Mines about Laurion side, that were very profitable to him: but withall they digged with great danger, and he was driven continually to keep a marvellous number of Slaves at work there. The most part of Nicias Riches was in ready Money, and thereby he had many cravers and hangers on him, whom he gave Money unto: for he gave as well unto the wicked People that might do mischief, as unto them that deserved reward, Niciss for fear and were worthy of his liberality. Thus was his fear a Rent to the wicked, as his liberality was also a Revenue to the good: and hereof the Comical Poets do deliver us ancient testimony. For Teleslides Speaking of a certain Informer, said thus:

gave to the wicked.

Caricles did refuse to give one Mina, for to stay The bruiting of his secret birth, conveyed close away: But Nice, the Son of Nicerate, did willingly beftow Abrace of Mina's double sold. And shough I well do know The cause of his so doing, yet I will not him bewray:

For why? the man is my good friend, and wife, I dare well fay.

And he, whom Eupolis mocketh in his Comedy intituled Maricas, bringing a plain simple man upon the Stage, doth ask him: The Informer:

How long is it ago since thou didst speak with Nicias?

The plain Man:

I saw him standing even right now upon the Market-place.

The Informer:

This man affirms he saw him there. And wherefore should be say He saw him, but of some intent his lewdness to bewray? Now Sirs, ye fee how Nicias here is taken in the trip, For all his walking close in clouds, to give the privy flip.

The Author:

O foolish folk, sappose ye that so good a man as he, In any fault or shamefull fact will tardy taken be? And Clean threatning in the Comedy of Ariftophanes, intituled the Knights, faith these words:

The Orators if by the throat I take,

Then sure I am, that Nicitis straight will quake. Physnic us felf telleth us also glauntingly, that he was so timorous and easie to be frayed, when he said, speaking of another man:

A good front man (I know full well) he was, And not a coward, like to Nicias.

Niciss warinels to offend.

Thuries,

Now Nicias being thus timorous of nature, and fearing to give any little occasion to the Orators to accuse him, kept himself so warily, that he neither durft eat nor drink with any man in the City, nor yet put forth himself in company to talk, or pass the time amongst them, but altogether avoided such Sports and pleasures. For when he was in Office, he would never out of the Council house, but still busted himself in dispatching Causes, from morning till night, and was ever the first that came, and last that went away. And when he had no matter of State in hand, then was he very hardly to be spoken withall, and would suffer no access unto him, but kept close in his Houle: and fome of his friends did ever answer them that came to his Gate, and prayed them to pardon him, faying: that he was buffe then about Affairs of the Commonwealth. One Hisron, whom Nicias Miss Hierons had brought up in his House, and had himself taught him both Learning and Musick, was his grea-NIGHT HISTORY HAN OF THE BOOK AND THE BOOK A cus Founder of rain number of men that were fent to dwell in ITALY, did build there the City of THURIBS. Hieron I fay did ferve his turn, and holp him fecretly to enquire what he would understand of the Soothfayers, and gave out these words among the People : that Nicias led too miserable and painfull a life, for the over-great care he took to serve the Commonwealth; insomuch, as though he were in his Hot-house to wash him, or at his Table at Meat, his mind ran still of some matters about the Commonwealth, and to ferve the State did neglect his own private Affairs: so that he scant began to sleep and take reft, whenothers commonly had sleet their first sleep, and that he looked like no body. Furthermore, that he was grown crabbed and uncourteous, even to such as before had been his familiar friends : so that, said he, he loseth them together with his Goods, and all for fervice of the Commonwealth; where others grow rich, and win friends, by the credit they have to be heard of the People, and can make merry among them, and sport with the matters of State which they had in their hands. Now in troth, such was Niciae life, that he might truly lay, that which Against an inches of himself in the Tragedy of Euripides, called Ephigenia

In outward hew of stately pomp, all others I exceed, And yet the Peoples underling I am in very deed.

And Nicias perceiving that the People in fomethings did ferve their turns with the experience of them that were eloquent, and wifer then others, although they yet mistrusted their sufficiency, and had a special eye to them, plucking down their courage, by taking their Authority from them : as for proof. the condemnation of Pericles, the banishment of Damon, and the mistrust they had of Antiphon RHAMNUSIAN, and moreover by what they did unto Paches (that took the Ille of LESBOS) who being brought before the Judges in open Council to give up an account of his charge, drew out his Sword, and flew himself in presence of them all. Wisias, I say, remembring these examples, sought ever to fly from those Offices which were either too great or too small; and when he accepted any, had special regard to work surely, and to venture nothing. Whereby all his Enterprizes that he took in hand, as we may eafily conjecture, prospered marvellous well: but yet he imputed nothing to his own wildom, nor yet to his vertue and fufficiency, but thanked Fortune ever for all, and praying diligently to the gods, contented himself to leffen his glory, and that onely to avoid envy : as the event of things falling out even in his time do fufficiently witness unto us. For the City of ATHENS having fuftained many great losses and overthrows, he was never a Party, nor had ought to do in any of them. As once for example: the Athenians were overcome in Thracia by the Chalcidonians, howbeit it was under the leading of Calliades and Xenophon, who were their Captains. Another time, the loss they had in Etolia under the charge of Demosthenes. Moreover, at Delium, a City of Boe-OTIA, where they loft a thousand men at one Conflict, Hippocrates then being General there. And as touching the Plague, the greatest number laid the fault thereof to Pericles, who by reason of Wars kept the men that came out of the Country, within the Walls of the City of ATHENS; and fo by changing of air, and their wonted manner of life, they fell into it. Now with none of all these great troubles and misfortunes, was Nicias ever burthened : but contrariwise he being Captain took the Isle of CYTHERA, which the LACEDEMONIANS inhabited, being an excellent place for fcituation to moleft and destroy the Country of LACONIA. He wan divers Cities that had rebelled in THRACIA. and brought them once more under the obedience of ATHENS. At his first coming, having shut in the MEGARIANS within their Walls, he took the Isle of MINOA: and at his departure thence, shortly after wan the Haven of NISEA also. Furthermore, landing in the Country of the CORINTHIANS. he overcame them that offered him Battle, and flew a great number, and among others Lycophron the Captain. At this Battle he chanced to forget to bury two of his men that were flain, whose bodies could not be found in gathering up of the reft: howbeit, fo foon as he heard of it, he caufed all his Fleet to flay, and fent an Herauld to the Enemies, to pray leave to fetch away those two bodies. Now, though by Law of Arms, they that fent to ask leave to take away their dead to bury them, did thereby Arms. lofe the honour of their Victory, and werebarred to fet up any Mark or Token of Triumph, because it feemed by the Suit, that they which had them in their power were Conquerors, and not the Petitioners that made request for them, which otherwise needed not to have made demand of them: Nician notwithflanding was contented rather to forfake the honour of his Victory, then to leave the bodies of two of his Countrymen in the Field without burial. So, after he had destroyed all the Coast of LACO-NIA, and had overcome certain LACEDEMONIANS that came against him in Battle, he took the City of THYREA, which the ÆGINETES kept at that time, whom he brought Priloners unto A-THENS. And when the PELOPONNESIANS had prepared great Armies both by Sea and by Land to beliege the Fort of PYLE, the which Demosthenes the Captain had fortified : Battle being given by Sea, it chanced there remained four hundred natural Citizens of SPARTA within the Isle of SPACTE-RIA. Now the ATHENIAN'S thought it a notable exploit of them (as indeed it was) to take those four hundred alive : howbeit the Siege was very fore, because they lacked water even in the midst of Summer, and were forced to fetch a marvellous compals to bring Victuals to their Camp; which when Winter should be once come, would be very dangerous, and almost an impossible thing to do. Whereupon they then became forry, and repented them much that they had fent away the Ambaffadors of the LACEDEMONIANS which came to them to treat of Peace, and that they had (through Clons procurement) fuffered them to depart in that fort without resolution taken : who was against them altogether onely to do Nicias a delpight, being his Enemy, and did earneftly folicite the matter the LACEDAMONIANS requested. This was the cause why Cleon perswaded the ATHENIANS to refuse their offer of Peace. But when the People faw that this Siege drew out in length, and that their Camp fuffered grievous wants and necessities, then they fell out with Cleon, and he again burthened Nician, faying, that through his fear he would let the besieged SPARTAN'S escape, and that if he had been Captain, they should not have holden out so long. Thereupon the ATHENIANS said aloud to Clean: And why doft thou not go thither then to take them? Moreover Nicias felf also rifing up, openly gave him his Authority to take this PYLE, and bade him levy as many Souldiers as he would to go thither, and not to brag with such impudent words where was no danger, but to do some notable service to the Commonwealth. Cleon at the first shrunk back, being amazed withall, little thinking they would have taken him to fuddenly at his word : but in the end, Qq2

And so, upon a meeting together to talk of many matters, they made an universall Peace throughperceiving the People urged him to it, and that Niciaa also was importunate with him; ambigion to inflamed him, that he not onely took the charge upon him, but in a bravery laid, That within twenty daies after his departure he would either put all the SPARTANS to the Sword, or bring them Prisoners unto ATHENS. The ATHENIANS hearing Clean fay so, had more lust to laugh a good, then to believe that he spake : for it was their manner ever to laugh at his anger and folly, A jeft of Clean. For it is reported of him, that the People on a time being folemnly affembled in Councell early in the morning, to hear what Cleon would fay, and having tarried long for him, at the length he came with a Garland on his head, and prayed the Affembly to difmifs the Court till the next morning: for (quoth he) I shall not be at leisure to day, because I have factificed, and do feast also certain strangers my friends that are come to fee me. So the People burst out in a laughing, and brake up the Affembly. This notwithflanding, Fortune favoured him at that time, and he handled himself of the Laceds fo well in this charge with Demofibenes, that he took all the SPARTANS that they belieged, within the time he had appointed, faving such as were slain : and having made them yeeld, brought them Prifoners to ATHENS. This fell out greatly to Nieise shame and reproach. For it appeared not onely a casting away of his Shield, but worse then that, a voluntary fortaking of his Province upon a base timorous mind, giving his Enemy occasion thereby to do some noble Exploir, depriving himself of his honourable charge. Wherefore Aristophanes mocketh him again, in his Comedy of Birds, faying:

It is no time to fleep and linger still, As Nicias doth , without good cause or skill.

Also in another place of his Comedy of Plowmen, he faith: I fain would follow husbandry. Who less thee? Marry you. A thousand Drachma's I will give to be discharged now Of Office in the Commonweal. Content fo shall we have Two thousand Drachma's just, with those which Nicias lately gave.

But herein Nicias did great hurt to the Commonwealth, fuffering Cleon in that fort to grow to credit and estimation. For after that Victory, Cleon grew to so haughty a mind and pride of himself, that he was not to be dealt withall : whereupon tell our the occasion of the great miseries that happened to the City of ATHENS, which most grieved Nicias of all other. For Cleon amongst other things took away the modesty and reverence used before in publick Orations to the People: he of all other was the first that cried out in his Orations, that clapped his hand on his thigh, threw open his Gown, and flung up and down the Pulpit as he spake. Of which example afterwards followed all licentiousness, and contempt of honesty, the which all the Orators and Counsellours fell into, that dealt in matters of State and Commonwealth, and was in the end the overthrow of all together. In that very time began Alcibiades to grow to credit, by practice in the State, who was not altogether fo corrupt, neither simply evil, but as they say of the Land of ÆGEPT, that for the famels and

It bringeth forth most wholsome herbs, and also noysome weeds. Even so Alcibiades wir excelling either in good or ill, was the cause and beginning of great change and alteration. For, it fell out, that after Nicias was rid of Clean, he could not yet bring the City of A-THENS again to peace and quietnels. For when the Commonwealth began to grow to fome reft and reasonable good order, then was it again brought into Wars, through Aleibiades extream Gleonand Brd fury of ambition. And thus it began. The onely Peace-breakers and diffurbers of common quiet gefider, the two nerally throughout GREECE, were these two persons, Cleon and Brasidas: for War cloaked the Peace-breakers wickedness of the one, and advanced the valiantness of the other, giving to either occasion to do Reace-breakers wickedness of the one, and advanced the valiantness of the other, giving to either occasion to do Reace-breakers wickedness of the other, giving to either occasion to do Reace-breakers wickedness of the other, giving to either occasion to do Reace-breakers wickedness of the other, giving to either occasion to do Reace-breakers wickedness of the other, giving to either occasion to do Reace-breakers wickedness of the other, giving to either occasion to do Reace-breakers wickedness of the other, and advanced the valiantness of the other, giving to either occasion to do Reace-breakers wickedness of the other, and advanced the valiantness of the other, giving to either occasion to do Reace-breakers wickedness of the other, and advanced the valiantness of the other, giving to either occasion to do Reace-breakers wickedness of the other, and also opportunity to work many noble explosits. Now Clean and Brasidas being given the other occasion to the occasion to the other occasion to the occasion to both flain together at a Battell fought by AMPHIPOLIS, Nicias straight perceiving, the SPAR-TANS had long defired Peace, and that the ATHENIANS were no more so horly given to Wars, but that both the one and the other had their hands full, and were willing to be quiet, devited, what means he might use to bring Sparta and Athens to reconciliation again, and to rid all the Cities of GREECE also from broyl and mifery of War, that thenceforth they might altogether enjoy a peaceable and happy life. The rich men, the old men and the Husbandmen, he found very willing to hearken to Peace, and talking privately also with divers others, he had so perswaded them, that he cooled them for being defirous of War. Whereupon, putting the SPARTANS in good hope that all were inclined to Peace, if they fought it, the SPARTANS believed him, not onely for that they had found him at other times very four and courteous, but also because he was carefull to see that their Priloners of SPARTA (who had been taken at the Fort of Pyle) were gently intreated, cileth the spare and had made their miterable Captivity more tolerable. So, Peace was concluded between the SPARTANS and the ATHENIANS for a year, during which abilinence; they frequenting one another again, and beginning to tafte the sweetness and pleasures of Peace, and the safety of free access one to fee anothers friends that were strangers, began then to with that they might still continue in Peace and Amity together, without estudion of bloud of either Party, and took great delight

They did also with great joy and gladness remember him which said, that in Peace no sound of Trumper, but the crowing of a Cock doth wake them that be alleep; and on the other fide; they curfed and took on with them that faid it was predefined, the War should continue thrice nine years. out all GREECE. Now most men thought, that surely all their forrows and miseries were come to an end, and there was no talk of any man but of Nicias, faying, that he was a man beloved of the gods, who for his devotion towards them, had this speciall gift given him, that the greatest bleffing that could come unto the World, was called after his Name. For to confess a troth . every man was certainly perswaded, that this Peace was Nicias work, as the War was Pericles procurement. who upon light causes perswaded the GRECIANS to run headlong into most grievous calamities ; and Wicias on the other fide had brought them to become friends, and to forget the great hurts the one had received of the other in former Wars. And even to this present day that Peace is called Nicium, as who would fay, Nicias Peace. The Capitulations of the Peace were thus agreed Nicias Peace. upon : That of either fide they should alike deliver up the Cities and Lands, which each had taken from other in time of Wars, together with the Prisoners also: and that they should first make restitution, whose lot it was to begin. Nicias (according to Theophrastus report) for ready Money secretly bought the lot, that the LACEDEMONIANS might be the first that should make re-Stitution. And when the CORINTHIANS and BOEOTIANS that disliked of this Peace, Sought by the complaints they made, to renew the War again, Nicias then perswaded both the ATHE. NIANS and LACEDEMONIANS, that they should add for strength unto their Countrey, the Alhance and Peace offensive and defensive made between them, for a more fure knot of friendship, whereby they might be the better affured the one of the other, and also the more dreadfull to their Enemies that should rebell against them. These things went clean against Alcibiades mind : who befides that he was ill born for Peace, was enemy also unto the LACED. EMONIANS, for that they fought to Nicias, and made none account of him, but despised him. Here was the occasion that caufed Alcibiades to prove from the beginning what he could do to hinder this Peace, wherein he prevailed nothing. Yet shortly afer, Alcibiades perceiving that the ATHENIANS liked not so well of the LACEDEMONIANS as they did before, and that they thought themselves injured by them, because they had lately made League with the BOEOTIANS without their privity, and had not wholly rendred up the Cities of PANACTUM and AMPHIPOLIS, according to the Conditions articled between them : began then to inlarge and aggravate the Peoples complaints, and to make them offended with every one of them. And furthermore he procured Ambaffadours from the City of ARGOS to come to ATHENS, and fo handled the matter, that the ATHENIANS made League offensive and deffensive with them. While these matters were thus in hand, there came to ATHENS alfo Ambassadours from LACEDEMON, with full Power and Authority to set all things at stay, and to compound all controversies: who having first spoken with the Senate, propounding things unto them both very honest and reasonable. Whereupon, Alcibiades being asraid that they letting the Ambassidours People understand so much, should thereby bring them to yeeld to what they defired; he finely defent from soar-ceived the poor Ambassadours by this device. He promised upon his Oath to help them in that tato Athens. they went about, fo far forth as they would not confels themselves to have absolute power from and deceit. the Ephores: making them to believe it was the onely way to bring their matters to pass. The Ambaffadours giving credit to his words, relied upon him, and fo for look Nicias. Whereupon Alcibiades brought them before the People, being fet in Counsell, and there demanded openly of them. whether they had full Power and Authority to accord all matters, yea or no? Whereumto they make him answer with a loud voyce, that they had not. Thereupon Alcibiades, contrary both to their ex- Alcibiades pectation, and his own Oath and Promife made unto them, began to call the Councell to witness, perjured. whether they did not in open Senate say the contrary, and so advited the People not to trust nor give credit unto fuch men, as were openly taken with so manifest a lie, and that in one self-matter would one while fay one thing, another while another. It boots not to ask whether the Ambassadours were much amazed to hear Alcibiades words : for Nicias himself wift not what to say to the matter, the fuddennels of the cause did so consule and grieve him, being a thing he least looked for, Now the People they were fo moved befides, that they became indifferent whether to have fent for The Farththe Ambassadours of Argos presently to have made League with them, or not: but there fell quake holo out an Earth-quake upon this matter, that greatly ferved Nicias turn and brake up the Affembly, Nicias. The People meeting again in Councell the next morning, Nician withall that he could do or say, could seant with-hold them from making League with the Argues: and to get leave in the mean time to go to the LACEDEMONIANS, promiting he would make all well again. Thereupon, Niciae going to SPARTA, was received and honoured there like a Nobleman, and as one whom they thought well affected towards them : but for the rest, he prevailed nothing, and being Nicias tent overcome by those that favoured the BOEOTIANS, returned again to ATHENS as he departed unto Sparia. thence: where he was not onely ill welcomed home, and worse esteemed, but was also in danger of his Person, through the fury of the People, that at his request and councell had redelivered fuch men Prisoners, and so great a number of them. For indeed, the Prisoners which Cleon had brought to ATHENS from the Fort of Pyle, were all of the chiefest Houses of SPARTA, and their Kinimen and Friends were the nobleft men of the City. Notwithflanding, the People in the end did none other violence to him, faving that they chole Alcibiades their Captain, and made

League with the ELIANS and MANTINEANS (which had revolted from the LACEDEMO-NIANS) and with the ARGIVES also : and sent Pyrates to the Fort of Pyle, to spoil the Countrey of LACONIA. Upon these occasions the ATHENIANS fell again into Wars. Now when the quarrell and controversies was greatest between Nicias and Alcibiades, the Ostracismon (to wit, the banishment for a time) came in , by the which the People banished for ten years any such of The ule of the their Citizens as they thought either of too great Authority, or that was most envied for his Wealth Ourseilmon. and Substance. Alcibiades and Nicias, were then not a little perplexed, considering their present danger, being fure that the one of them two should not fail but be banished by this next banishment. For the People hated Alcibiades life, and were afraid of his valiantines: as we have more amply declared in the description of his life. And for Wicias, his wealth made him to be envied: besides they milliked his strange manner of dealing, being no more familiar nor conversant with the People then he was, and counted him too stately: moreover they hated him also because in many matters he had spoken directly against the thing the People defired, and had enforced them against their wills to agree to that which was profitable for themselves. In fine, to speak more plainly, there sell our great frise between the young men that would have Wars, and the old men that coveted peace, some desirous to banish Nicias, and some others Alcibiades, but

Where discord reigns in Realm or Town, The wicked win the chief renown.

And so it fell out then. For the ATHENIANS being divided in two Factions, gave authority to certain of the most impudent and infolent persons that were in all the City: and among them was one Hyperbolus of the Town of PARITHUS, a man of no behaviour nor value, why he should be bold: but yet one that grew to some credit and power, dishonouring his Countrey by the honour they gave bin. Now Hyperbolm thinking himfelf free at that time from any danger of banishment, (having rather deferved the Gallows) hoping that if one of them two were banished, he should match him rather deferved the Gallows) hoping that if one of them two were banished, he should match him rather deferved the Gallows) hoping that if one of them two were banished, he should match him rather deferved the Gallows) hoping that if one of them two were banished, he should match him rather deferved the Gallows) hoping that if one of them two were banished, he should match him rather deferved the Gallows) hoping that if one of them two were banished, he should match him rather deferved the Gallows) hoping that if one of them two were banished, he should match him rather deferved the Gallows) hoping that if one of them two were banished, he should match him rather deferved the Gallows) hoping that if one of them two were banished, he should match him rather deferved the Gallows) hoping that if one of them two were banished, he should match him rather deferved the Gallows) hoping that if one of them two were banished, he should match him rather deferved the Gallows) had been deferved the Gallows had been def and bufily firred up the People against them both. Nicias and Alcibiades being acquainted with his wicked practifes, having fecretly talked together, joyned both their factions in one; whereby they brought it so to pass, that neither of them were banished, but Hyperbolm self for ten years. Which matter for the present time made the People very merry, though afterwards it grieved them much, seeing their Ordinance of the Oftracismon blemished by the unworthiness of the person : which punishagainst Hyper. ment was an honour unto him. For this banishment was thought a meet punishment for Thucidides, Arifider; and fuch like men of accompt as they, or their like : but for Hyperbolus, it was thought Hyperbolus batoo great an honour, and too manifest an occasion of glory to be given to him, that for his wickedness n fhed for ten had the felf-same punishment, which was to be inflicted upon the chiefest Estates for their greatness.

And the Comicall Poet Plato himself saith in a place: Although his level behaviour deferv'd as much and more, Tet was not that the punishment he should have had therefore, The Oftracy devised was for men of noble fame,

And not for varlets, whose lewel life deserved open shame. For himself was the After this Hyperbolus, there was never man banished with the Ostracismon. For himself was the laft, as Hipparchus Cholargian, and nearest Kinsman to the Tyrant was the first. Sure, Fortune is a very uncertain thing, and without conceit of reason. For had Nicias frankly put himself to the hazard of this banishment against Alcibiades, one of these two things must needs have happened to him: either to have remained in the City with Victory, his adversary being banished: or being convict by his banishment, to have scaped those extream mileries and calamities the which be afterwards fell into, befides the fame he had won of a wife Captain, though he had been overcome, I know notwithstanding that Theophrass writeth, how Hyperbolus nor Nicias was banished through the diffention that fell betwixt Pheax and Alcibiades: albeit most Writers agree with that I have told you before. Now the Ambassadours of the EGESTANS and LEONTINES being come to A-THENS, to perswade the ATHENIANS to attempt the conquest of Sicilia, Nicias being against it, was overcome by Alcibiades crast and ambition. For he, before they were called to Councell, had already through falle furmizes filled the Peoples heads with a vain hope and perswassion of conqueft. Infomuch as the young men meeting in places of exercise, and the old men also in Artificers Shops, and in their compaffed Chairs, or half circles where they fate talking together, were every one occupied about drawing the Platform of SICILIA, telling the nature of the SICILIAN Sea, and reckoning up the Havens and places looking towards AFRICK. For they made not their accompt that SICILE should be the end of their Wars, but rather the Store-house and Armoury for all their Munition and Martiall Provision to make War against the CARTHAGINI-ANS, and to conquer all Africk, and confequently all the Africk Seas, even to Hercules Pillars. Now all their minds being bent to Wars, when Wicias Ipake against it, he found very few men of quality to stand by him. For the rich, tearing left the People would think they did it to avoid charge and the cost they should be at about these Wars, they held their peace, though indeed not contented withall : yet would not Niciae leave still to countell them to the contrary. But when they had past the Decree in Counsell for the Enterprize of SICILE, and that the People had chofen him chief Captain, with Alcibiade; and Lamachus, to follow the same : at the next Sellion of the Counsell holden in the City, Nicias rose up again, to see if he could turn the People from this Journey with all the Protestations he could possibly make, burdening Alcibiades, that for his own ambition and private commodities, he brought the Commonwealth into fo far and dangerous a War. But all his words prevailed not. Himfelf before all others was thought the meetest man for this Charge, partly, because of his experience, but chiefly for that they knew he would handle their matters with greater fafety, when his timorous forefight should be joyned with Alcibiades valiantness, and with Lamachus softness, which indeed most confirmed the Election. Now after the matter thus debated, Demostratus one of the Oratours that most procured the A-THENIANS to undertake this Enterprize, stepped forth, and said : It were good that Wicias left off and fet afide all these excuses and devices, and preferred a Decree, That the People should throughly authorize the Captains that were chosen, to set forward and execute what they thought good, as well here as there, and so perswaded the People to pass and authorize it. Yet it is faid that the Priests objected many things to hinder the Journey. But Alcibiades also having suborned certain Soothfayers alledged in like case some ancient Oracles that said the ATHENIANS should have great honour from Sicile; and further had entited certain Pilgrims, who faid they were but newly come from the Oracle of Jupiter Ammon, and had brought this Oracle thence : That the Athenians (hould take all the Syracufians. But worst of all, if any knew of contrary figns or tokens Signs to feat to come, they held their peace, left it should seem they intermedled to prognosticate evil for affe- the Athenians ctions fake, feeing that the figure themselves, which were most plain and notorious, could not re- not to attempt move them from the Enterprize of this Journey. As for example, the hacking and cutting of the the Enterprise Hermes and Images of Mercury, which in one night were all to be mangled, faving one Image onely Statues mancalled the Hermes of Andocides, which was given and confecrated in old time by the Tribe of the gled at Athons. ÆGEIDES, and was fet up directly over against a Citizens House called Andocides. Furthermore, the chance that happened by the Altar of the twelve gods: where a man leaping fuddenly upon it. after he had gone round about it, cut off his Genitories with a stone. And in a Temple also in the City of DELPHOS, where was a little image of Minerva of Gold, fet upon a Palm-tree of Copper, which the City of ATHENS had given of the Spoils won of the MEDES. Upon that Palm-tree fate certain Crows many daies together, and never left pecking and jobbing at the Fruit of it, which was all of Gold, untill they made the same to fall from the Tree. But the ATHE-NIANS faid, that the DELPHIANS (whom the SYRACUSIANS had subdued) had finely feigned this device. There was a Prophecy also that commanded them to bring one of Minerva's Nuns to ATHENS, that was in the City of CLAZOMENES. So they fent for this Nun called Helychia, which is, reft : and it feemeth it was that which the gods by this Prophecy did counfell them chia, which is, rest: and it teemeth it was that which the Astronomer having charge in the Army The madness unto, that for that time they should be quiet. Meton the Astronomer having charge in the Army of Meton the leavied for the War of Sicile, being atraid of this Prophecy, or otherwise milliking the Celea Astronomer, still light and fuccess of the Journey, reigned himself mad, and set his house on fire. Others say he counterfeited not madness, but did one night indeed fet his house on fire, and that the next morning looking rufully on it, he went into the Market-place as a man brought to pitifull state, to sue to the People, that in confideration of his great misfortune hapned him, they would discharge his Son of the Voyage, who was to take charge of a Galley at his own cost, and ready to make sail. Moreover, the familiar spirit of wise Socrates, that did use to tell him before what should happen, told him then, that this Journey would fall out to the destruction of ATHENS. Socrates told it to certain of his very familiar friends: and from them the rumour became common. And this also troubled a number of them, for the unlucky daies on the which they did imbarque. For they were the very days on the which the women celebrating the Feaft and year-day of Adonis death: and there were also in divers parts of the City, Images of dead men carried to buriall, and women following them, mourning and lamenting. So that fuch as did put any confidence in those figns, faid they milliked it much, and that they were afraid left the fame fignified, that all the goodly preparation of this Army, (the which was fet out with fuch pomp and bravery) would come to nothing. Now for Nicias, that he spake against this War in open Councell, whilest they were deliberating upon it, and that he was not carried away with any vain hope, nor puffed up with the glory of fo honourable a charge to make him change his mind : therein furely he shewed himself an honest man, wise and constant. But when he faw plainly that he could by no perswasions remove the People from the Enterprize of this War. neither yet by fuit nor intreaty get himself discharged from being a Captain thereof, but that they would in any casemake him one of the Heads of the Army: then was it out of time to be fearfull and still giving back, turning his head so oft like a child to look upon his Galley behind him, and ever to be telling that no reason could be heard in determining of his Journey. For indeed this was chough to discourage his companions, and to marre all at the first setting out : where, to say truly he should suddenly have set upon his Enemies, and have gone to it with a lusty courage, to have asfayed Fortune. But he took a clean contrary course. For when Lamachus thought good at their first coming to go straight to SYRA CUSA, and to give them Battell as near the Walls as might be, and that Alcibiades, on the other fide was of opinion, first of all to go about to win the Cities that were in league with the SYRACUSIANS, and after that they had made them rebell, then to go against the SYRACUSIANS themselves: Niciai to the contrary spake in Counsell, and thought it better to go on fair and foftly, discrying the Coasts of Sicile round about, to view their Galleys and preparation, and so to return straight to Athens again, leaving onely a few of their men with the Nicias count EGESTANS, to help to defend them. But this from the beginning marvelloufly cooled the courage fell for invaof the Souldiers, and quite discouraged them. Shortly after also the ATHENIANS having sent for ding the Syra-Alcibiades to answer to certain acculations, Nicias remaining Captain with Lamachus (the other cafiant Captain in fight, but Nicias felf in Power and Authority the Lieutenant Generall of all the Army) still used delays, running up and down, and spending time so long in consultation, till the Souldiers were left without both hope and courage: and the fear the Enemy had of them at their first coming, to fee fo great an Army, was now in manner clean gone. Yet Alcibiades being in the Army, before he was fent for from ATHENS, they went with threefcore Galleys to SYRACUSA, of the which they ne was ten for Battell ray out of the Haven, and fent the other ten into the Haven to discover : which approaching near the City, caufed an Herauld to make open Proclamation, that they were come this approaching that the Contines to their Lands and Possessions, and took a Ship of the enemies, ther to reflore the Leontines to their Lands and in the which among other things they found Tables , wherein were written the names of all the Inhabitains of Syracusa, according to their Tribes and houses. These Tables were kept far from the City, in the Temple of Jupiter Olympian, but at that time they had fent for them to know the num-City, in the Tempher of James and of age to bear Weapon. The fame Tables being taken by the ATHE-NIANS and carried to the Generals of the Army : the Southfayers feeing this long roll of names, at the first milited it, fearing left the Prophecy had been sulfilled, which promised them, that the ATHENIANS one day should take all the Syracusians. Howbeit it is reported this Prophecy came to pas in another Exploit, when Callippu ATHENIAN having sain Dion, won all the City of Syracusa. Now when Alcibiades was gone from the Camp, Wicias bare all the fway, Lamachus vall- and commanded the whole Army. For Lamachus, though otherwife he was a front man, an honest ant, but fimple man, and very valiant of his hands, and one that would not spare himself in time of need: neverthelels he was so poor and mistrable, that even when he was in state of a Generall, and gave up an account of his expences, he would not flick to put into his Books, fo much for a Gown, and fo much for a pair of Pantophles. Where Nicias authority and reputation contrariwise was of another manner of cut, as well for other refpects, as for his riches, and for the honour of many noble things which he had done before. As one namely which they tell of him, that on a time being a Captain with others, and fitting in Councell with his companions in the Councell-house at ATHENS about the dispatch of certain Causeshe spake unto Sophocles the Poet, then present among them, and about the unpacted of the point of the part of all the whole company. Sophocles answered him again : Indeed I confets I am the oldest man, but thou art the noblest man, and him whom every man regardeth best. So having at that time Lamachus under him, a better Captain and man of War then himfelf was, yet by being fo flow to imploy the Army under his charge, by deferring of time still, and hovering about SICILE as far from his Eenemies as he could: he first gave the Enemies time and leiture to be bold without fear of him. And then going to befrege Hy n-1.A., being but a pelting little Town, and raifing the Siege without taking of it; he fell into fo great a contempt with every man, that from thenceforth no man almost made any more reckoning of him, At last, he retired to CATANA with his Army, without any other exploit done, saving that he took HYCCARA, a baggage Village of the barbarous People, and where it is faid Law the Curtizan was born, and that being then a young Girle, the was fold among other Prifoners, and afterwards carried into PELO PONNESUS. And in fine, the Summer being far Spent, Niciae was informed that the SYRACUSIANS had taken such courage to them, that they would come and enterprise the Charge upon them first : and that their Horsemen were approached already before his Camp, to skirmish Lais the Curout of other production asking the ATHENIANS in mockery, if they were come into Sicile to dwell with the CATANIANS, or to reftore the LEONTINES to their Lands again. Hereupon with much ado, Nicias determined to go to Syracusa, and because he would camp there in safety, and at ease without hazard : he sent one of CATANA before to SYRACUSA, to tell them (as if he had been a Spie) that if they would fuddenly come and fet upon the Camp of the ATHENIANS and take all their Carriage, he wisheth them to come with all their Power to CATANA at a certain day which he would appoint them. For the ATHENIANS (faid he) for the most part are within the ftratagem. City, wherein there are certain Citizens, which favouring the Syracusians, have determined to foon as they hear of their coming, to keep the Gates of the City, and at the fame time also to fet the ATHENIANS Ships on fire : and how there were also a great number in the City of this Confederacy, that did but look every hour for their coming. And this was the noblest Stratagem of War, that Nicias shewed all the time he was in SICILE. For by this device he made the SYRA-CUSIANS come into the Field with all their Power, fo that they left their City without Guard : and he himself departing in the mean time from CATANA with all his Fleet, won the Haven of SYRAcus A at his case, and chose out a place to camp in, where his Enemies could not hurt him : in the which he was both the stronger, and might without lett or difficulty set upon them with that where-Nicias winin he most trusted. The Syracusians returning straight from CATANA, and offering him Batneth the Hatell hard by the Walls of SYRACUSA, he came out into the Feild, and overthrew them. There ven of Syracufa were not many of the SYRACUSIANS flain at this Battell, because their Horsemen did hinder the chase : but Alicias breaking up the Bridges upon the River, gave Hermocrates occasion to mock him. For comforting and encouraging the SYRACUSIANS, he told them Wieias deserved to be laughed at, because he did what he could that he might not fight, as if he had not purposely come from A-THENS to SYRACUSA to fight. This notwithfranding, he made the SYRACUSIANS quake for fear : for where they had then fifteen Captains, they chose out three onely , to whom the People were fworn, that they would fuffer them to have full Power and Authority to command and take or-Nikiss forbeader for all things. The Temple of Jupiter Olympian was hard by the ATHENIANS Camp, which right to fpoil they would gladly have taken, for that it was full of rich Jewels and Offerings of Gold and Silver, given unto the Temple aforetime. But Nicias of purpose still drave off time, and delayed so long, till the

SYRACUSIANS at laft fent a good Garrison thither to keep it safe : thinking with himself, that if his Souldiers came to take and spoil the Temple, his Countrey should be nothing the richer by it, and himself besides should bear all the blame of Sacriledge. So, having obtained victory without nich ran traight through SICILE) within few days after he returned unto the City of Na xos, where he lay all the Winter, confuming a wonderfull mass of Victualls with so great an 'Army, for the doing of things of small moment, upon certain SICILIANS that yeelded to him. The SYRACUSIANS in the mean time being in heart again and couragious, returned to CATANA. where they spoyled and over-ran all the Countrey, and burnt the Camp of the ATHENIANS. Wherefore every man blamed Wicias much, because through his long delay and protracting of time to make all things fure, he let flip fundry occasions of notable Exploits, wherein good service minit have been done. Yet when he would do a thing indeed, he did it so thorowly as no man could take exception at his doings, for that he brought it to fo good a pass; and once taking it in hand, he did execute it with all speed, though he was both flow to determine and a Coward to enterprise. Now Niciss befier when he removed his Army to return to Syracusa, he brought it fo orderly, and also with such ged Syracusa. fpeed and fafety, that he was come by Sea to THAPSUS, had landed and taken the Fort of Epipolis, before the SYRACUSIANS had any intelligence of it, or could possibly help it. For the choice men of the SYRA CUSIANS being fet out against him, hoping to have stopped his passage, he overthrew them, took three hundred Prifoners, and made their Horsemen flie, which before were thought invincible. But that which made the SYRACUSIANS most afraid, and seemed most wonderfull also to the other GRECIANS, was this, that in a very short space he had almost environed SYRACUSA with a Wall, which was as much in compass about, as the Walls of ATHENS, and Nicits Wall at worse to perform, by reason of the woody Countrey, and for the Sea also that beateth upon the the Siege of Walls, besides that there were divers Marishes hard by it : and yet (sick as he was of the Stone) he Syracuja. had almost finished it. And sure good reason it is that we attribute the fault of the not finishing of it, unto his fickness. For mine own part I wonder marvellously both of the care and diligence of the Captain, and of the valiantness and dexterity of the Souldiers, which appeareth by the notable feats they did. For Eurypides after their overthrow and utter ruine, made a Funerall Epitaph in Verse, and faid thus:

Eight times our men did put the men of Syracuse to flight, So long as with indifferency the gods did use their might.

But we find it written, that the SYRA CUSIANS were not onely eight times, but many times more overthrown by them : a time at length there was indeed, that both the gods and Fortune fought against them, even when the ATHENIANS were of greatest power. Now Nicias in his own perfon was ever in the greatest and most weighty affairs, striving with his fick body. Howbeit one day when his difease grew fore upon him, he was compelled to be lodged in his Camp with a few of his men : and Lamachus in the mean time alone having charge of the whole Army , fought with the SYRACUSIANS, who then had brought a Wall from the City, tinto the Wall with the which the ATHENIANS had purposed to have shur them in, to keep that they should not compass it round. And because the ATHENIANS commonly were the ftronger in these Skirmishes, they many times over-rashly followed the chase of their Enemies that fled : as it chanced one day that Lamachin went lo far, that he was left alone to encounter a Company of Horsemen of the City, before whom Callicrates marched foremost, a valiant man of his hands, who challenged Lamachus hand to hand. Lamachus abode him, and in the Conflict was first hurt ; but he gave Callicrates also such a wound therewithall, that they both fell down dead prefently in the place. At that time the SYRACUSIANS The death of being the stronger side, took up his body, and carried it away with them : but they spurred out for Lamathut. life to the ATHENIANS Camp, where Wicias lay fick, without any Guard or fuccour at all : nevertheless Niciae rose with speed out of his bed, and perceiving the danger he was in; commanded certain of his friends to fet the wood on fire which they had brought within the Trenches of the Camp, to make certain devices for battery, and the Engines of Timber also that were already made. That device onely stayed the SYRA CUSIANS, faved Nician, and the strength of their Camp, together with all the Silver and Carriage of the ATHENIANS. For the SYRACUSIANS perceiving afar off, betwire them and the frength of their Camp, fuch a great flame as role up in the air. upon the fight of it turned tail straight, and made towards their City. Things falling out thus; Wi- Nicias fole ciat being left fole Captain of the Army without any Companion, in great hope notwithstanding to Captain of the whole A do some good; diversi Cities of Sicile yeelded unto him, Ships fraught with Corn came the whole A out of every quarter to his Camp; and many submitted themselves; for the good success he had in all, his doings. Furthermore the SYRACUSIANS also dent to parle with him of Peace, being out of hope that they were able to defend their City any longer against him. Gylippus also a OUL OF ROPE that they were able to describe the Stractistans, understanding Giliputa L4-Captain of the LACEDEMONIANS, coming to aid the Stractistans, understanding cedamonian by the way how the City of Syracus A was thut in with a Wall round about, and in great diffrels: aideth the syheld on his Vovage notwithstanding , not with any hope to defend Secile (supposing the A- racustant, THENTANS had won the whole Countrey) but with illtent nevertheles to help the Cities of ITALY, if he could pollibly. For it was a common rumour abroad, that the ATHENIANS had won all, and that their Captain for his wisdom and good formed was invincible. Nicias himfelf now contrary to his wonted wildom and forefight; frufting altogether to the good fuccels which he law to follow him , but specially believing the reports that were told him of Syracus A: and the news that were beought him thence by fome of themselves which came secretly unto him, perswading himself that within few days the stoold have Syracusa by compofition; took no care to withftand Gylippus coming thither, neither fent any man to keep him from landing in SICILE. By which negligence Gylippine landed in a Paffenger, without Nieins

Activities illesterly; and desciore were defirous once again to venture, in better fort and order then before. But Averse by no means would be brought to fight again: faying, that it we include the before but again are faying that it we include the before but again and the better for the but again and the better for the but again and the but poorly furnished. But contrarily, railly it fight with a fewer number of Ships then they, and but poorly furnished. But contrarily, Menander and Euthydemus newly promoted to the state of Captains with Nicias, being pricked forwards with ambition against the two other Captains. Nicias and Demosthenes that was then coming) defired to prevent Demosthenes, in performing some notable service before his arrivall, and was the honour and reputation of the City of ATHENS, the which (faid they) were shamed and dishonoured for ever, if they now should shew themselves afraid of the SYRA CUSIA NS, who provoked them to fight. Thus brought they Nicias against his will to Battle, in the which the ATHENI-

ANS were flain and overcome, by the good counfell of a CORINTHIAN Pilot called Ariston, For the left Wing of their Battle (as Thucydides writeth) was clearly overthrown, and they loft a great number of their men. Whereupon Nicias was wonderfully perplexed, confidering on the one fide that he had taken marvellous pains, whilft he was fole Captain of the whole Army : and on the

and all fet out in this triumphant shew, to fear the Enemies the more. Now though the Syracu-

SIANS themselves were again in a peck of troubles, perceiving they strove against the stream, and confumed themselves to no purpose, when by that they saw there was no likelihood to be delivered from their troubles. And Nician also rejoyced, that so great aid was come: but his joy held not long, for fo foon as he began to talk with Demosthenes of the state of things, he found him bent forthwith to fet upon the SYRACUSIANS, and to hazard all with speed, that they might quickly take SYRArately: and perswaded him that it was their best way to prolong the War against the Enemies, who Peace, as they had done aforetime. For there were many within Syracus a that were Nicias friends, who wished him to abide time: for they were weary of War, and waxed angry also with Gylippus.

So that if they were but straightned a little more with want of Victuals, they would yield straight. Ni-cias delivering these perswasions somewhat darkly, and keeping somewhat also from utterance, because he would not speak them openly, made his Colleagues think he spake it for cowardliness, and that he returned again to his former delays to keep all in fecurity, by which manner of proceeding he had from the beginning killed the hearts of his Army, for that he had not at his first coming fer upon the Enemies, but had protracted time to long, till the courage of his Souldiers was cold and done, and himself also brought into contempt with his Enemies. Whereupon the other Captains (his Colleagues and Companions with him in the Charge) Euthydemus and Menander, fluck to Demosthe.

heard anything of his coming, he flew many of them, and made the rest fly that offered resistance.

But not content with this Victory, he went farther, till he fell upon the BOFOTIANS. They gathering themselves together, were the first that resisted the ATHENIANS, basing their Pikes with fuch fury and loud cries, that they caused the former to retire, and made all the rest of the Assailants afraid and amazed. For the foremost flying back, came full upon their Companions; who taking them for their Enemies, and their flight for a charge, refifted them with all their force, and so mistaking one another, both were wounded and flain, and the hurt they meant unto their Enemies.

did unfortunately light upon their own fellows. For this multitude meeting thus confufedly together, what through their great fear, and what for that they could not discern one another in the night, the which was neither fo dark that they could not fee at all, nor yet fo clear, as they might certainly judge by fight what they were that met them: (for then the Moon declined apace, and the small light it gave was diffused with the number of men that ran to and fro) the fear they had of the Enemy, made them mistrust their Friends. All these troubles and disadvantages had the ATHE-NIANS, and beside the Moon on their backs, which causing the shadow to fall forward, did hide their number, and gliftering of Armour: and contrarily, the Enemies Targets glaring in their eyes by the reflection of the Moon that shone upon them, increased their sear, and made them seem a greater number, and better appointed then they were indeed. At last, the Enemies giving a lufty Charge upon them on every fide, after they once began to give back, and turn tail, some were flain by their Enemies, others by their own Company, and others also brake their necks again. Wherefore Nicias that alwaies mistrusted it would thus come to pass, was marvellously Thucydides also faith, that it was Gylippus onely that did all there. And much like doth Philifts felf a Syracusian confess, who was present then in perfon, and faw all things that were done. Notwithstanding at the first Barrell the ATHENIANS had tion, and taw an united man number of the SYRACUSIANS, among the which Gongylus the CORINthe upper name, and new morning following, Gylippus made them know the skill and expentition was one. But the next morning following, Gylippus made them know the skill and expension and the fame with the fame Horfes, ence of a wife Captain. For with the felf-fame Weapons, with the fame Men, with the fame Horfes, and in the same places, changing onely the order of his Battell, he overthrew the ATHENIANS: and in the same places, the first having driven them even into their Camp, he fet the SYRACUSIANS and (fighting with them ftill) having driven them even into their Camp, he fet the SYRACUSIANS and (nguing wan used to see the wart (with the very felf-fame frones and stuffe, which the ATHE-NIANS had brought and laid there for the finishing of their Inclosure) to cut off the other, and to keep it from going forward, that it joyned not together. So, all that the ATHENIANS had done before until that prefent, was utterly to no purpole. Things standing in these terms, the Syracustans being couragious again, began to arm Galleys; running up and down the Fields with their Horfemen and Slaves, took many Prifoners. Gylippus on the other fide, went in perfon to and fro through the Cities of SICILE, periwading and exhorting the Inhabitants in fuch fort, that they all willingly obeyed him, and took Arms by his procurement. Niesas feeing things thus fall out, an winning you you min, and confidering the change of his state and former good tack, his heart fell to his old trade again, and confidering the change of his state and former good tack, his heart beginning to faint, wrote straight to the ATHENIANS to fend another Army into Sicile, or rather to call that home which he had there, but in any cafe to give him leave to return, and to discharge him of his Office, for cause of his fickness. The ATHENIANS were indifferent before he wrote, to fend aid thither : howbeit the envy the Nobility bare unto Nician good fortune, did ever cause some delay that they fent not untill then, and then they determined to fend with speed. So Demostbenes was named to be fent away immediately after Winter, with a great Navy. In the middeft of Winter Eurymedon went to Niciau, and carried him both Money and News, that the People had chosen some of them for his Companions in the Charge, which were already in fervice with him, to wit, Euchydense and Menander. Now Wision in the mean time being fuddenly affailed by his Enemies both by Sea and Land; though at the first he had fewer Galleys in number then they, yet he budged divers of theirs, and funk them. But by Land again, he could not aid his men in time, because Gylippus at the first onset had taken a Fort of his called Plemmyrion, within the which lay the Store and Tackle for many Galleys, and a great mass of ready Money, which was wholly loft. Besides, in the same Conflict also were many men slain, and many taken Prisoners. Yet further, the greatest matter of weight was, that thereby he took from A jeins the great commodity he had to bring his Victuals fafely by Sea to his Camp. For while the AT HENTANS kept this Fort, they might at their pleasure bring Victuals without danger to their Camp, being covered with the fame : but when they had loft it, then it was hard for them fo to do, because they were ever driven to fight with the Enemies that lay at Anker before the Fort. Furthermore, the SYRACUSIANS did not think that their Army by Sea was overshrown, because their Enemies were the stronger, but for that their men had followed other fide, for that he had committed a foul fault, when they had given him companions. But as Nicias was in this great despair, they descried Demosthenes upon a Peere of the Haven, with his Fleet bravely fet out and furnished, to terrifie the enemies. For he had threescore and thirteen Galleys, Demosshenes aand in them he brought five thousand Footmen well armed and appointed, and of Darters, Bow-men, engl. and Hurlers with Slings, about three thousand, and the Galleys trimmed and set forth with goodly Armours, numbers of Enfigns, and with a world of Trumpets, Hoboys, and fuch Marine Mufick, Camp and Walls (which reacheth as far as the Temple of Hercules) did let them in Battle ray up-there was such a hot and cruel Battle by Sea, as had not been in all this War before : the which was as dreadfull to them that stood on the Shore to behold it, as it was mortal unto them that fought it, feeing the whole conflict, and what alteration fell out beyond all expectation. For the A-THENIANS did as much hurt themselves by the order they kept in their fight, and by the ranks of their Ships, as they were hurt by their Enemies. For they had placed all their great Ships together, fighting with the heavy against the Enemies that were light and swift, which came on on every fide of them, hurling stones at them, which were made sharp to wound how ever they lighted:

being also clearly taken from them) and perceiving moreover that they could hardly fave themselves by Land: were then to discouraged, as they made no longer resistance, when their Enemies came hard by them and carried away their Ships before their faces. Neither did they ask leave to take up their dead mens Bodies to bury them, taking more pity to forfake their difeased and fore wounded Companions, then to bury them that were already stain. When they considered all these things, they thought their own state more miserable then theirs, which were to end their lives with much more cruelty, then was their mifery prefent. So they being determined to depart thence in the night.

Gylippus perceiving the SYRACUSIANS through all the City disposed themselves to Sacrifice to the gods, and to be merry, as well for the joy of their Victory, as also for Hercules Feast, thought it bootless to perswade them, and much less to compel them to take Arms upon a sudden, to set upon their Enemies that were departing. Howbeit Hermocrates deviling with himself how to de-laid for him, having fent before to take all the straights and passages, by the which he should pass.

Nicias being over-reached by Hermocrates craft and fubtilty, stayed there that night, as though he had been afraid to fall within the danger of his Enemies ambuilh. Thereupon the SYRACUSTANS the next morning by peep of day, holied fail, got the straights of Nicias passage, stopped the Rivers mouths, and brake up the Bridges, and then cast their Horsemen in a Squadron in the next plain ral sustenance, even when he had most need of comfort, being very sickly. Yet notwithstanding his weakness and infirmity, he took great pains, and fuffered many things which the foundeft bodies do labour much to overcome and fuffer: making it appear evidently to every man, that he did not abide all that pains for any respect of himself, or desire that he had to save his own life, so much as for their fakes, in that he yielded not unto present despair. For where the Soul-diers for very fear and forrow burft out into tears and bitter wailing, Nicias felf shewed, that

But when news came that there was a new fupply come unto the SYRACUSIANS, and that they faw the Plague increased more and more in their Camp: then Nicias felf thought it best to depart thence, and gave notice to the Souldiers to prepare themselves to this away. Norwithstanding, when they had put all things in readiness for their departure, without any knowledge of the Enemy, or suspition thereof: the Moon began to cclipse in the night, The Belipfe of and fuddenly to lofe her light, to the great fear of Nicias and divers others, who through ignoand numerity to note the lager, to the fights. lofe her light, and change into fo many kind of colours: that was above their knowledge, and therefore they thought it very ftrange, per wading themselves that it was a sign of some great mischiefs the gods did threaten unto men. For Anaxagoras, the first that ever determined and delivered any thing for certain and affured, concerning the light and darkness of the Moon, his Doctrine was not then of any long continuance, neither had it the credit of antiquity, nor was generally known but onely to a few, who durft not talk of it, but with fear, even to them they trufted beft. And the reason was, for that the People could not at that time abide them that profetfed the knowledge of naturall Philosophy, and inquired of the causes of things: for them they called then Minegalize, as much to fay, as curious inquirers and tatlers of things above the reach of reason, done in Heaven and in the Air. Because the People thought they ascribed that which was done by the gods onely, unto certain naturall and necessary Causes that work their Effects not by Providence nor Will, but by Force and necessary Consequences. For these causes was Protagoras Provincing for ATHENS, and Anaxagoras put in Prifon: from whence Perioles had much ado to procure his delivery. And Socrates also, though he did not meddle with that part of Philosophy, was notwithstanding put to death for the sufficient thereof. In fine, the Doctrine of Plato being received and liked, as well for his vertuous life, as also for that he submitted the necessity of Naturall Caules unto the controllment and disposition of Divine Power, as auto a more excellent and fupream Caufe: 100k away all the ill opinion which the People had of fuch Difputations, and gave open paffage and free entry unto the Mathematicall Sciences. And therefore Dion, one of Plato's Scholars and Friends, an Eclipse of the Moon chancing even at the very same time that he was weighing up his Ankers to fail from ZAZYNTHE, to make War wish the Tyrant Dionysus: being nothing afraid nor troubled therewithall, made fail notwithfranding, and when he came to SYRACUSA, drave out the Tyrant. But then it fell out unfortunately for Nicids, who had no expert nor skilfull Soothfayers : for the party which he was wont to use for that purpose, and which took away much of his Superfittion, called Sisibidas, was dead not long before. For this Sign of the Eclipse of the Moon (Philocherss faith) was not hurtfull for men that would flie, but contrarily very good : for, faid he, things that men do in fear, would be hidden, and therefore light is an every good: 101, 121 116, 1111115, 1111115 and 111115 and 11115 and 111115 and 11115 and of fuch matters : where Nicias bare them then in hand, that they should tarry the whole and full revolution of the course of the Moon, as though he had not feen her straight clear again, after she had once passed the shadow and darkness of the Earth. But all other things laid aside and forgotten, Nicias disposed himself to facrifice unto the gods: untill such time as the Enemies came again as well to befiege their Forts, and all their Camp by Land, as also to occupy the whole Haven by Sea. For they had not onely put men aboard into their Galleys able to wear Armour, but moreover young Boys into Fither boats and other light Barques, with the which they came to the ATHENIANS, and shamefully reviled them, to procure them to fight: among the which there was one of a noble House, called Heraelides, whose Boat being forwarder then his Companions, was in danger of taking by a Galley of the ATHENIANS, that rowed against him. Pollichus his Uncle being afraid of it, lanched forward with ten Galleys of Syracusa for his refcue, of the which himself was Captain.

The other Galleys doubting also least Pollichin should take burt, came on likewise amain : so that there fell out a great Battleby Sea, which the SYRACUSIANS wan, and flew Eurymedon The Syraculithe Captain, and many other. This made the Souldiers of the ATHENIANS fo afraid, that they and overcome began to cry out, it was no longer tarrying there, and that there was none other way but to de the Abenians part thence by Land. For after the SYRACUSIANS had won that Battle, they had ftraight shut up by Sea. the Havens mouth. Nicias could not confent to fuch a retire : for, faid he, it would be too great a shame for them to leave their Galleys and other Ships to the Enemy, considering the number not to be much less then two hundred: but he thought good rather to arm a hundred and ten Galleys them. The Souldiers being imbarked into the Galleys, the Priefts and Southfayers came and told The Southfayer the SYRACUSIANS, that undoubtedly the figns of the Sacrifices did promife them a noble Victory, ers do promife fo that they gave no charge, but onely flood upon their defence : for fo did Hercules ever overcome, Vidory to the defending when he was affailed. With this good hope the SYRACUSIANS rowed forward, and Syraculum.

That manner of fight again over-Arifo a CORINTHIAN (an excellent Ship-mafter) had taught the SYRACUSIANS, who was come on the himself slain valiantly fighting, when they were Conquerors. At last notwithstanding, having stayed all that day and the next night following, they put The miserable themselves in Journey, and departed with great cries and lamentations, as if they had gone from their flace of the Anatural Countrey, and not out of their Enemies Land, as well for the great diffress and necessity thenians dewherein they were (lacking all things needfull to fuftain life,) as also for the extream forrow they parting from felt, to leave their fore wounded Companions and difeafed Kinsmen and Friends behind them, that Syraufi.

But if to fee Nicias in this mifery, did move the lookers on to pity; yet did this much more encrease their compassion, when they remembred Nicias words in his Orations continually to the People, to break this Journey, and to diffwade them from the enterprize of this War. For then reopic, to oteas and journey, and to have deserved these troubles. Yet furthermore, this caused the Souldiers utterly to despair of help from the gods, when they considered with themselves, that fo devour and godly a man as Nicias (who left nothing undone that might tend to the hopour and fervice of the gods) had no better fuccels, then the most vile and wicked Persons in all the whole Army. All this notwithstanding, Ricias strained himself in all that might be, both by his good countenance, his chearfull words, and his kind using of every man: to let them know that he fainted not under his burthen, nor yet did yield to this misfortune and extream Calamity. And thus travelling eight days journey out-right together, notwithstanding that he was by the way continually fet upon, wearied and hurt: yet he ever maintained his Bands, and led them whole in company, untill that Demosthenes with all his Bands of Souldiers was taken Prisoner, in a certain Village called POLYZELIOS: where remaining behind, he was environed by his Enemies in fight, and feeing himself so compassed in, drew out his Sword, and with his own hands thrust himself thorow, but died not of it, because his Enemies came straight about him, and took hold of him. The SYRACUSIANS thereupon went with speed to Nicias and told him of Demosthenes case. He giving no credit to them, fent prefently certain of his Horsemen thither to understand the truth: who brought him word that Demosthernes and all his men were taken Prisoners. Then he befought Gylippu to treat of Peace, to fuffer the poor remain of the ATHENIANS to depart out of SICILE with fafety, and to take such Hostages for the sure Payment of all such Sums of Money the Syracustans had disburfed by means of this War, as should like himself: which he promifed he would cause the ATHENIANS to perform and satisfie unto them. Howbeit the Nicis moveth SYRACUSIANS would in no wife hearken to Peace, but cruelly threatning and reviling them that made motion hereof, in rage gave a new onset upon him, more sterrely then ever before they had done. Nicias being then utterly without any kind of Victuals, did notwithstanding hold out that night, and marched all the next day following (though the Enemies Darts still flew about their ears) until he came to the River of Afinarus, into the which the Syracusians did forcibly drive them. Some others of them also dying for thirst, entred the River of themselves, thinking to drink. But there of all others was the most cruel slaughter of the poor wretches, even as they were drinking: untill such time as Nicias falling down flat at Gylippus feet, said thus unto him: Since the gods have given thee (Gylippus) Victory, shew mercy, not to me that by these miseries have won immortal Honour and Fame, but unto these poor vanquished ATHENIANS: calling to thy won miniotral Fronton and Faint, but and there pool variquement at the ATHENIANS have used YOU LACED & MONIANS courteoutly, as often as fortune favoured them against you. Gylippus beholding Nicias, and perswaded by his words, took compassion of him (for he knew he was a Friend unto the LACEDEMONIANS at the last Peace concluded betwixt them, and furthermore thought it great honour to him, if he could carry away the two Captains or Generals of his Enemies Prifoners) (hewed him mercy, gave him words of comfort, and moreover commanded befides that they should take all the refidue Prifoners. But his commandment was not known in time to all: infomuch as there were many more flain then taken, although fome private Souldiers faved divers notwithflanding by ftealth. Now the Syracusians having brought all the Prisonersthat were openly taken into a Troop together, first unarmed them, then taking their Weapons from them, hung them up upon the goodlieft young Treesthat flood upon the Rivers fide, in token of Triumph. And fo putting on triumphing Garlands upon their heads, and having trimmed their own Horses in Triumphant manner, and also shorn all the Horses of their Enemies: in this triumphing fort they made their entry into the City of SYRACUSA, having glorioully ended the most notable War that ever was amongst the GREEKS one against another, and attained also the Noblest Victory that could be atchieved, and that onely by force of Arms and Valiancy. So at their return, a Council and Affembly was holden at Syracusa, by the Citizens and their Confederates: in the which ε_u tycles one of the Orators (a practifer in publick Causes) first made Petition, that the day on the which they had taken Niciat, might for ever thenceforth be kept Holy-day, without any manner of work, or labour, but onely to do Sacrifice to the gods; and that the Feaft should be called, Afinaria Afnarus Feast, after the Name of the River where the Overthrow was given. This Victory was had the fix and twentieth day of the Moneth of July. And as touching the Priloners, that the Confederates of the ATHENIANS and their Slaves should be openly fold by the Drum: and that the natural A-THENIANS which were Freemen, and their Confederates of the Country of SICILE, should be clapped in Irons and laid in Prison, the Captains onely excepted, whom they should put to death. The The Captains Syracustans, confirmed this Decree. And when the Captain Hermocrates went about to perfwade them, that to be merciful in Victory, would be more honour unto them, then the Victory it self: they thrust him back with great tumult. And furthermore, when Gylippus made fuit that for the Captains of the ATHENIANS, he might carry them alive with him to SPARTA, he was not onely shamefully denied, but most vilely abused; so lusty were they grown upon this Victory, besides also that in the time of the War they were offended with him, and could not endure his straight severe La-CONIAN government. Timens faith moreover that they accused him of coverousnels and thest, which Vice he inherited from his Father. For Cleandrides his Father was convict for extortion, and banished

So Timaus writeth, that Nicia and Demosthenes were not stoned to death by the SYRACU- Nicissand SIANS, as Thucydides and Philisfus report, but that they killed themselves, upon-word sent them by Demosibenes Hermocrates (before the Affembly of the People was broken up) by one of his men, whom the flew them-Keepers of the Prison let in unto them; howbeit their bodies were cast out at the Jayl door, for e- selves very man to behold. As for the other Prifoners of the Athentans, the most of the most offickness, and of ill handling the Prifon where they had no more allowed them to live withall but two dishfulls of Barley for their bread, and the of water for each man a day. Indeed many of them were conveyed away, and fold for Slaves: and many also that scaped unknown as Slaves were also sold for bondmen, whom they branded in the forehead with the print of a Horle, who notwithftanding besides their bondage, endured also this pain. But such, their humble patience and modesty did greatly profit them : for either shortly after they were made Freemen, or if they still continued in bondage, they were gently intreated and beloved of their Masters. Some of them were saved also for Eurypides fake. For the SICILIANS liked the Verfes of this Poet better then they did any other GRECIANS Versesof the midst GREECE. For if they heard any Rimesor Songs like unto his, Europides they would have them by heart, and one would present them to another with great joy. And therefore Veries saved it is reported, that diversescaping this bondage, and returning again to ATHENS, went very lovingly many of the it is reported, that diverse thank him for their lives: and told him how they were delivered from fla-lives. very, onely by teaching them those Verses which they remembred of his Works. Others told him alfo, how that after the Battle, they scaping by flight, and wandering up and down the Fields, met with fome that gave them meat and drink to fing his Verses. And this is not to be marvelled at, weighing the report made of a Ship of the City of CAUNUS, that on a time being chased in thither by Pirats, thinking to fave themselves within their Ports, could not at the first be received, but had repulse : howbeit being demanded whether they could fing any of Eurypides Songs, and answering that they could were straight suffered to enter, and come in. The news of this lamentable Overthrow, was not believed at the first, when they heard of it at ATHENS. For a stranger that landed in the Haven of PI-R.E.A., went and fate him down (as the manner is) in a Barbers Shop, and thinking it had been commonly known there, began to talk of it. The Barber hearing the ftranger tell of such matters: before any other had heard of it, ran into the City as fast as he could, and going to the Governours told the news openly before them all. The Magistrates thereupon did presently call an Assembly, and The Athenians brought the Barber before them: who being demanded of whom he heard these News, could make no do toment the brought the Harber before them: who come unmanded of whom the harber that the City bringer of the certain report. As Readers, Scriveners, Goldsmiths, Bankers, Receivers, Stewards of housholds, Carvers, and other fuch Officers at the Table, taking pains himself to help them when they were learners, and to instruct them what they should do: and to be short, he thought the greatest care which indeed is enough to fuffice for his maintenance. This notwithstanding, Crassus was courteous to strangers, for his House was open to them all, and he lent his Friends Money without interest: but when they brake day of Payment with him, then would he roundly demand his Money of them. So, his courtesie to lend many times without interest, did more trouble them, then if ment he gave every man that came to him, pleafed him better, then if he had been more plentifull of Diet and Dishes. As for his learning and study, he chiefly studied Eloquence: and that fort that even by nature were most apt unto it. For some say, he had never so small nor little a Cause in hand, but he alwaies came prepared having studied his Cause before for pleading: and oftentimes because he shewed himself painfull, and willing to help every man. Likewise was his gentleness marvellously esteemed, because he saluted every body courteously, and made much of all men; for whomfoever he met in the Streets that spake to him as he passed and saluted him, were he never so mean, he would speak to him again, and call him by his Name. It is faid also he was very well foon as they were returned, he would call for it again. O wonderfull patience of a man! to fee that he making profession of Philosophy as he did, the poor man being in great poverty, did not place poverty in things indifferent. But hereof we will speak more hereaster. Cinna and Marius

For Women, he lived as continent a Life, as any Ro-MAN of his time: notwithstanding afterwards being of riper years, he was acculed by Plotinus to have defloured one of the Vestal Nuns called Licinia. But in troth the cause of that suspition grew thus. Licinia had a goodly pleasant Garden hard by the Suburbs of the City, wherewith Crassus was marvellously in love, and would fain have had it good cheaps and upon this onely occasion was often feen in speech with her; which made the People suspect him. But for as much as it feemed to the Judges that his covetousnels was the cause that made him follow her, he was cleared of the incest suspected, but he never left following of the Nun, till he had got the Garden of her. The ROMANS fay there was but that onely Vice of covetousnels in Crassus, that drowned many other goodly Vertues in him: for mine own opinion methinks he could not be touched with that Vice alone without others, fince it grew fo great, as the note of that onely did hide and cover all his other Vices. Now to fet out his extream covetous defire of getting, naturally bred in him, they prove it by two manifest Reasons. The first, his manner and means he used to get: and the fecond, the greatness of his Wealth. For at the beginning he was not left much more worth, then Creffus riches, three lundred Talents. And during the time that he dealt in the Affairs of the Commonwealth, he of fered the Tenths of all his Goods wholly unto Hercules, kept open House for all the People of ROME, and gave also to every Citizen of the same as much Corn aswould keep him three Moneths: and yet when he went from Rome to make War with the PARTHIANS, himself being desirous to know what all he had was worth, found that it amounted to the fum of feven thousand one hundred Talents. But if I may with licence use evil speech, writing a troth: I say he got the most part of his Wealth by Fire and Blood, raising his greatest revenue of publick Calamities. For when Sylls had taken the City of ROME, he made portiale of the Goods of them whom he had put to death, to those that gave most, terming them his booty, onely for that he would the Nobility and greatest men of Power in the City should be partakers with him of this Iniquity: and in this open Sale Crassus never left taking of Gitts, nor buying of things of Sylla for profit. Furthermore, Crassfus perceiving that the greatest decay commonly of the buildings in ROME came by Fire, and falling of the Houles in Rome came to be his. But notwithstanding that he had so many Slaves to his Workmen, he nier 34th any House from the ground, faving his own House wherein he dwelt: faying that fuch as delighteeto shuild, undid themselves without the help of any Enemy. And though crassus he had many Mines of Silver amany Ploughs, and a number of Hinds and Ploughmen to follow the

And surely therein his opinion was not ill, at the Crassus care aleaft if he thought as he spake: that all things must be done by Servants, and his Servants must be bout Servants, ruled by him. For we fee that the Art and Skill to be a good Husband, when it consisteth in Government of things without life or fense, is but a base thing, onely tending to gain; but when it depend- What belongeth upon good order and government of men, methinks then it is to know how to Govern well eth to good eth upon good order and government of men, metalinks then it is to know how to Govern well husbandry and a Commonwealth. Crassus keeping close in this Cave, Wibian receiver brought Victuals thither daily to relieve him and his company, but saw not them he brought it to, nor could understand what they were: and yet they saw him plainly, observing the hour and time of his coming when he brought the fame. He provided them no more then would even necessarily serve their turn, and yet plenty sufficient to make good chear withall : for Vibin was bent to entertain Crassus as honourably as he could possible, insomuch as he considered he was a young man, and therefore reason would he should offer him some occasion to take such pleasure and delight as his youth required. For to relieve his necessity onely, he thought that rather a part of fear, then any shew of love towards him. One day he took two fair young Damlels, and brought them with him to the Sea fide: and when he came to the Cave, shewed them where they should get up, and bade them not be afraid. Crassing at the first, when he saw the young Wenches, was afraid he had been betrayed: yet he asked them what they were, and whom they lought. They being instructed by Vibim what they should fay, answered, that they sought their Master that was hidden there. Then Craffus knew this was Vibius mirth to shew him courtesse: so he received them into his Cave, and kept them as long as he lay there, letting Vibins understand by them what he lacked. Fenestella writeth, that he saw one of them when she was an old Woman, and that he had heard her tell him this Talemany a time with great delight. In fine, Craffus (after he had lain hidden in this Cave eight Moneths) understanding that Cinna was dead, came out : and so soon as he made himself to be known, there repaired a great number of Souldiers unto him, of whom he onely those two thousand five hundred, and with them passed by many Cities, and facked one called MALACA, as divers do write; but he flatly denied it, and floutly contraried them that affirmed it. And afterwards having gotten Ships together, went into Africx, to Metellus Pint, a man of great fame, and that had already gotten a great Craffer voyage Army together. Howbeit he tarried not long with Metellus, but jarring with him, went unto Sylla, who welcomed and honoured him as much as any that he had about him. Sylla afterwards arriving in ITALY, intending to imploy all the young Nobility he had in his company, gave every purfue with hot revenge of mine Army, upon those bloody murtherers that have slain them. Craffus being netled with these words, departed thence presently, and stoutly passing through his Enemies, levied a good number of Souldiers: and was ever after ready at Sylla's commandment in all his The emulation levied a good number or sommers: and was feel and contention betwith him and Pompey. For Pompey berwitt Grif- Wars. Here began first (as they fay) the strict and contention betwith him and Pompey. For Pompey berwitt Grif-fits and Pomper being younger then Crassus, and born of a wicked Father in ROME, whom the People more hated then ever they did man: came yet to great honour by his valiancy, and by the notable Acts he did in the Wars at that time. So that Sylla did Pompey that honour many times, which he feldom did unto them that were his Elders, nor yet unto those that were his equals: as to rise up when he came towards him, to put off his Cap, to call him Imperator, as much as Lieutenant-Generall. And this galled Craffus to the heart, although he had no wrong in that Pompey was taken before him, because he had no experience in matters of War at that time, and also because these two Vices that were bred in him, mitery and coveroutness, drowned all his Vertue and well doing. For at the fack of the City of Tuder, which he took, he privily got the most part of the spoil to himself, whereof he was accused before Sylla. Yet in the last Battle of this Civil War (which was the greateft and most dangerous of all other) even before ROME it self, the Wing that Sylla led, was repul-fed and overthrown: but Crassus that led the right Wing, overcame his Enemies, followed them in chase till midnight, sent Sylla word of his Victory, and demanded Victuals for his men. But then again he ran into as great defame, for buying, or begging, the conficate goods of the Outlaws appointed to be flain, for little or nothing. And it is faid also, that he made one an Outlaw in the Countrey of the BRUTIANS, without Sylla's privity or commandment, onely to have his goods. But Sylla being told of it, would never after use him in any open Service. Surely this is a strange thing, that Crassus self being a great flatterer of other, and could creep into any mans favour, was yet himfelf eafie to be won through flattery, of any man that would feek him that way. Furthermore, it is faid of him that he had this property: that though himfelf was as extreamly coverous as might be, yet he bitterly reproved and utterly milliked them that had his own humor of avarice. City: and by his pains and industry of pleading, and defending mens causes, by lending of Money to them that needer, and by helping of them that fued for any Office, or demanded anything elfe Craffas indust. of the People, he avained in the end to the like estimation and Authority that Pompey was come try and canfe unto, by his many Noble Victories. And there was one notable thing in either of them. For of rifing in the Pompey's Fame and Power was greater in Rome, when himfelf was absent: and contrariwise wealth. when he was there present, Crassus oftentimes was better esteemed then he. Pompey carried a great Majesty and gravity in his manner of Life, would not be seen often of the People, but kept from repairing to open places, and would speak but in few mens causes, and that unwillingly: all to keep his favour and credit whole for himself, when he stood in need to employ the same. Where Crassus diligence was profitable to many, because he kept continually in the Market-place, and was easie to be repaired unto by any man that required his help, daily following those exercifes, endeavouring himself to pleasure every man: fo that by this easie access and familiarity, for favour and good will, he grew to exceed the gravity and Majesty of Pompey. But as for the worthiness of their Persons, their Eloquence of speech, and their good grace and countenance: in all those (it is said) Pompey and Crassus were both alike. And this envy and emulation never carried Craffus away, with any open malice or ill will. For though he was forry to fee Pompey and Cafar honoured above him: yet the worm of ambition never bred malice in him. No, though Cefar when he was taken by Pirats in ASIA (as he was once) and being kept Prisoner cried out aloud : O Crassus, what joy will this be to thee, when thou shalt hear I am in Prison! This notwithstanding, they were afterwards good friends, as it appeareth: for Cefar being ready on a time to depart out of Rome for Prator into Spain, and not being able to fatisfie his Creditors that came flocking all at once about him, to ftay and arrest his Carriage: Crassus, in that time of need forfook him not, but became his furety for the fum of eight hundred and thirty Talents. In fine, all Rome being divided into three Factions, to wit, of Pompey, Cafar and Craffus (for as for Cato, the estimation they had of his fidelity was greater then his Authority: and his Ver_ in Rome. tue more wondered at then practifed) in fo much as the gravest and wifest men took part with Pompey. The livelieft youths, and likelieft to run into desperate attempts, they followed Cefars hope. Craffus keeping the midst of the Stream, was indifferent to them both; and oftentimes changed his mind and purpole. For in matters of Government in the Commonweal, he neither shewed Crassus incomhimself a constant Friend, nor a dangerous Enemy: but for gain, was easily made friend or foe. stancy. So that in a moment they faw him praise and reprove, defend and condemn, the same Laws, and the same men. His estimation grew more, through the Peoples sear of him, then for any good will they bare him. As appeareth by the answer that one Sicinius (a very busie headed man, and one that troubled every Governour of the Commonweal in his time) made to one that asked him, why he was not buffe with Craffus amongst the rest: and how it happened that he so scaped his hands? O, faid he, he carried hay on his horn. The manner was then at ROME, if any man had a Shinius Procurft Bullock that would ftrike with his horn, to winde hay about his head, that the People might verb. beware of him when they met him. The commotion of Fencers, which fome call Spartacess War, The War of the their wasting and destroying of ITALY came upon this occasion. In the City of CAPUA, there was bondmen, calone Lemulus Batiatus, that kept a great number of Fencers at unrebated Foils, whom the ROMANS led Spartness call Gladiators, whereof the most part were GAULS and THRACIANS. These men were kept War, locked up, not for any fault they had committed, but onely for the wickedness of their Master that had brought them and compelled them by force, one to fight with another at the Sharp. On a time two hundred of them were minded to iteal away: but this conspiracy being bewrayed, threescore and eighteen of them entred into a Cooks Houle, and with the Spits and Kitchin-knives, which there they got, went quite out of the City. By the way they fortuned to meet with Carts loaden with Fencers Weapons, that were brought from CAPUA, going to some other City: those they also took by force, and arming themselves therewith, got them then to a strong place of scituation. Where amongst themselves they chose three Captains, and one Spartacus a THRACIAN born The wit and

Fort, situate upon a Hill that had a very steep and narrow up to them: all the rest of the ground round about it, was not over, and upon them great store of wild Vines. Of them the bond, and made thereof Ladders, like to these Ship Ladders of Ropes, of such they reached from the top of the Hill even to the very bottom: upon thou and affect down faving one that tarried above to throw down their Armour after them, who afterwards by the same Ladder saving himself last of all. The ROMANS mistrusting no such matter, these bondmen compassed the Hill round, assailed them behind, and put them in Ach a sear with the sudden onset, as they fled upon it every man, and so was their Camp taken. Thereupon divers Heardsmen and Shepheards that kept Cattle hard by the Hill, joyned with the ROMANS that fled, being strong and hardy men; of which some they armed, and others they used as Scouts and Spials to discover. Upon this overthrow was sent another Captain from ROME, called Publica Varinus, against these bondmen: who first overcame Furins, the Lieutenant of Varinus in Battle, and two thousand of his men: and after that again they slew one Cossinius, and overthrew a great Army of his, being joyned with Publim Varinus, as his fellow and Counsellor. Spartacus having intelligence that Coffinius was bathing himself at a place called the falt Pits, had almost taken him tardy, having much ado by flight to fave himself: notwithstanding, Spartacus wan all his Carriage at that time, and having him hard in chase, took his whole Camp with great slaughter of his men, among whom Coffinius felf was slain. Spartacus having thus now in fundry Battles and Enthory of Publis counters overcome the Prætor himself, Publins Varinus, and at the length taken his Serjeants from him that carried the Axes before him, and his own Horse whereon he rode himself: was grown then to such a power, as he was dreaded of every man. Yet all this notwithstanding, Spartacus wifely confidering his own force, thinking it not good to tarry till he might overcome the Power of the ROMANS, marched with his Army towards the ALPES, taking it their best way after they had passed them over, every man to repair home to his own Country, some into Gaul the rest into THRACIA. But his Souldiers trusting to their multitude, and perswading themselves to do great things, would not obey him therein, but went again to spoil and over-run all ITALY. The Senate of ROME being in great perplexity, not onely for the shame and dishonour that their men should be overcome in that fort by Slaves and Rebels, but also for the fear and danger all ITALY stood in befides : lent both the Consuls together, Gellius and Lentulus, as unto as difficult and dangerous a War, CENTRIS and LERIAMINS, both as any that could have happened unto them. This Gellins one of the Confuls, fetting suddenly upon Confuls fenta- a Band of the GERMANS, which in a bravery and contempt as it were differfied themselves from gainst Sparts their Camp, put them to the Sword every man. Lentulus, his Colleague and fellow Conful on the other fide, compassed in Spartacus round with a great Army : but Spartacus charged his Lieutenants that led the Army, gave them Battle, overthrew them, and took all their Carriage. Hereupon, marching on still with his Army towards the Alpes, Cassius the Prætor and Governour of GAUL about the Po, came against him with an Army of ten thousand men. Spartacus joyned Battle with him, and overcame him. Cassius having lost a great number of his men, with great difficulty faved himself by flying. The Senate hearing of Cassius overthrow, were marvellously offended with the Confuls, and fent commandment unto them, to leave off the War: and thereupon gave the whole Charge thereof unto Marcus Crasus, who was accompanied in his Journey with many noble young Gentlemen of honourable Houses, both for that he was marvellously esteemed, and also for the good will they bare him. Now went Cragus from Rome, and camped in ROMANIA, tarrying Spartacus coming, who was marching thitherward. He fent Mummisss one of his Lieutenants with two Legions to fetch a compass about to entrap the Enemy behind: straightly command-Mummius Crafing him to follow Spartacus rereward, but in no case to offer him Skirmish nor Battle. But Mummiss notwithstanding this straight commandment, seeing some hope given him to do good, set upon Spartacus, who gave him the overthrow, flew numbers of his men, and moe had flain, faving that certain of them laved then lelves by flight, having onely loft their Armour and Weapons. Hereupon Crasu was grievoully offended with Mummius, and receiving his Souldiers that fled, gave them other Armour and Weapons: but yet upon fureties, that they should keep them better thenceforth, then they had before done. Now Crasus of the five hundred that were in the first Ranks, and that first fled, them he divided into fifty times ten, and out of every one of those he put one of them to death, as the Lot fell out: renewing again the Ancient discipline of the ROMANS to punish cowardly Souldiers, which of long time before had not been put in use. For it is a kind of death that bringeth open shame withall: and because it is done in the face of the Camp, it makethall the residue afraid to see the terrour of this punishment. Crassus having done execution in this sort upon his men, led his Army against Spartacus, who still drew back, untill he came to the Sea side through the Countrey of the Lucanians, where he found in the ftraight of the far of MES-SINA, certain Pirats Ships of CILICIA, and there determined to go into SICILIA. And having put two thousand men into SICILE, he then revived the War there of the Slaves, which was but in manner newly ended, and lacked small provocation to begin it again. But these Pirats having promifed Spartacus to pass him over thither, and also taken Gifts of him, deceived him, and brake their promise. Whereupon Spartaeus returning back again from the Sea side, went and camped within a little Isle of the RHEGIANS. Crassus coming thither to feek him, and perceiving that the nature of the place taught him what he should do, determined with a Wallto thoak up the bar or Channell entring into the little Island, both to keep his men occupied from now the second life from Vacual. This was a marvellous hard and long piece of now the second from the finished it beyond all mens expectation in a very short time, and to a Trenchiston one fide of the Sea to the other overthwart this bar, which was three hundred furlongs in length, fifteen foot broad, and fo many in height; and upon the top of this Trench built a high Wall, of a marvellous ftrength, whereof Spartagus at the first made light Grassus wonaccount, and laughed at it. But when Pillage began to fail him, and travelling all about the Ifle dertail Trench for Victuals, perceiving himself to be shut in with this Wall, and that there was no kind of Victuals and Wall. to be had within all the compass of the Isle: he then took the vantage of a rough boisterous night. the wind being very great, when it snowed exceedingly, set his men on work, and filled up a piece of the Trench (being a small breadth) with Earth, Stones and boughs of Trees, whereupon he passed over the third part of his Army. Crassus at the first then became asraid, lest Spartacut would have taken his way directly toward Rome, but he was foon put out of that fear, when he heard they were fallen out together, and that a great number of them rebelling against Spartacus. went and camped of themselves by the Lake of Lucania, which water by report hath this variable property, that at certain times it changeth and becometh very fweet, and at fome other times nature of the again to falt and brackish as no man can drink it. Craffus going to fet upon them, dravethem be- water of the wond the Lake, but could kill no great number of them, nor follow them very far, because Lake of Luca-Spartaens came prefently to the rescue with his Army, who stayed the chase. Crassus had written nia. Letters before to the Senate, to call Lucullus home out of THRACIA, and Pompey out of SPAIN, whereof he then repented him, and made all the possible speed he could to end this War before either of them came thither; knowing, that which of them fo ever came to his help, to him would the People give the Honour of ending this War, and not to himfelf. Wherefore he first determined to affail them that had revolted from Spartacus, and camped by themselves, who were led by Caim Camicins, and another called Castus. So Crassus sent six thousand Footmen before to take Ambush laved a Hill, commanding them to lie as close as they could, that their Enemies might not discover them . by Crassus, and fo they did, and covered their Morians and Head-pieces as well as might be, from being feen, Nevertheless they were discovered by two Women doing Sacrifice for the fafety of their Army, and thereupon were all in great hazard of casting away, had not Crassus been, who came in time to their aid, and gave the Enemies the cruellest Battle that ever they fought in all that War. For there were flain of the Slaves at that Battle twelve thousand and three hundred, of which, two onely were found hurt in the backs, and all the rest slain in the place of their Ranks, valiantly fighting where they were fet in Battle Ray. Spartaens after this overthrow, drew towards the Mountains of Petely, whither Quintus one of Craffus Lieutenants, and Scrofa his The valiant-Treasurer followed him, still Skirmishing with his rereward all the way: yet in fine, Spartacus ness of Spartitturned fuddenly upon them, made the ROMANS fly that still harried his men in that fort, and constructed for souldiers. hurt Scrofa, Craffus Treasurer to fore, that he hardly escaped with Life. But the vantage they had of tired to the the ROMANS by this overthrow, fell out in the end to the utter destruction of Spartacus. For his Mountains of men thereby, being the most of them fugitive bondmen, grew to such a stoutness and pride of them- Petelie. felves, that they would no more fly from fight, neither yet would they any longer obey their Leaders and Captains; but by the way as they went, they compassed them in with their Weapons, and told them, that they should go back again with them, whether they would or not, and be brought through Lucania against the Romans. All this made for Crassus as he wished, for he had received News that Pompey was coming, and that divers were Suters for him at ROME to be fent in this Journey, faying, that the last Victory of this War was due to him, and that he would dispatch it at a Battle, as soon as he came thither. Crassus therefore seeking occasion to fight, lodged as near the Enemy as he could, and made his men one day cast a Trench; which the bondmen feeking to prevent, came with great fury, and fet upon them that wrought, Whereupon fell out a hot Skirmish, and still supplies came on of either side, so that Spartacus The noble couin the end perceiving he was forced unto it, put his whole power in Battle Ray. And when he rage of Spartahad fet them in order, and that they brought him his Horse he was wont to ride on, he drew eus. out his Sword, and before them all flew the Horse dead in the place, saying : if it be my Fortune to win the Field, I know I shall have Horses enough to serve my turn; and if I chance to be overcome, then shall I need no more Horses. After that he flew in among the ROMANS, thinking to attain to fight with Graffus, but he could not come near him; yet he flew with his own hands two ROMAN Centurions that refifted him. In the end, all his men he had about him, forfook him and fled, fo as Spartacus was left alone amongst his Enemies; who valiantly Spartacus slain. fighting for his life, was cut in pieces. Now though Crassus Fortune was very good in this War, and that he had shewed himself a Noble and Valiant Captain, venturing his Person in any danger, yet he could not keep Pompey from the Honour of ending this War: for the Slaves Pompey's Trie unph for that scaped from this last Battle where Spartacus was slain, fell into Pompeys hands, who made an umph for end of all those rebellious rascals. Pompey hereupon wrote to the Senate, that Grassus, had over-come the Slaves in Battle, but that he himself had pulled up that War even by the very roots. After this Pompey made his entry into Rome, and Triumphed for his Victory of Sertorius, and the Conquest of SPAIN, Crassus also sued not for the great Triumph, neither thought he the small Ovation Triumph on foot, which they granted him, any Honour anno him, for overcoming a few Ovatio, fe fugitive bondmen. Pompey being called to be Confull; Craffus, though he hood in good with him, did yet notwithstanding pray his friendship and furtherning in help him, and was ever desirous to make Crassus beholding to help him, and was ever desirous to make Crassus beholding to the control of the co ting to neip mm, and was ever defined to make crays, believed that he would no less dealt friendly for him, and spake openly in the Assembly of the City, that he would no less thank the People to appoint Crassus his Companion and fellow Consul with him, then for making himfelf Confull. But notwithstanding they were both Confuls together in Office, their friendship held not, but were ever at jar, and the one against the other. So by means of their disagreement, they passed all the time of their Consulship without any memorable Act done, faving that Crassus made a great Sacrifice to Hercules, and kept an open Feast for the People of ROME of a thousand Tables, and gave to every Citizen Corn to find him three Months. But in the end of their Confulship, at a Common-Council holden, there was a Knight of ROME called Ovarius Aurelius (a man not greatly known, for that he had no dealings in the State, and kept most in the Country) who getting up to the Pulpit for Orations, told the People what a Vision he had seen in his Dream. Jupiter (saith he) appearing to me this night, willed me to tell you openly, that ye should not put Crassus and Pompey out of their Office, before they were reconciled together. He had no fooner spoken the words, but the People commanded them to be Friends. Pompey fate still, and faid never a word to it. But Crassus role, and took Pompey by the hand, and turning him to the People, told them aloud: My Lords of Rome, I do nothing unworthy of my felf, to feek Pompey's friendship and favour first, since you your selves have called him the Great, before he had any hair upon his face, and that ye gave him the honour of Triumph before he was Senator. And this is all that Craffus did of any account in his Confulfhip. When he was Cenfor allo, he passed it over without any Act done. For he reformed not the Senate, Mustered not the men of War, nor took any view or estimate of the Peoples goods, although Luctarius Ca-Craffus Cenior talus was his Colleague and fellow Cenfor, as gentle a Person as any of that time that lived in ROME. Now Crassus at the first entry into his Office of Censor, going about a cruel and violent Act to bring EGYPT to pay tribute to the ROMANS, Catular did foutly withfrand him: whereby diffention falling out between them, they both did willingly refign their Office. In that great conspiracy Craffus suspect of Cariline, which in manner overthrew the whole State and Commonwealth of ROME, Craffus was ted for Cation had in fome jealousite and miltrust, because there was one of the Consederates that named him for one linesconspiracy of them, howbeit they gave no credit unto him. Yet Cicero in an Oration of his, doth plainty accufe (raffur and Cafar, as Confederates with Cariline: howbeit this Oration came not forth till they were both dead. And in the Oration he made also, when his Office and Authority of Consul ceased, he faid: that Crassus came one night to him, and shewed him a Letter touching Cariline, certainly confirming the conspiracy then in examination. For which cause Crassias ever after hated him: and that he did not openly revenge it, the let was by means of his Son, For Publius Crassus much favouring Eloquence, and being given to his Book, bare great good will unto Cicero: in fuch fort, that upon his banishment he put on changed Garments as Cieero did, and procured many other youths to do the like also, and in fine, perswaded his Father to become his Friend. Cefar now returning to Rome from the Province he had in government, intending to fue for the Con-Cafar reconci- fulfhip : and perceiving that Pompey and Crassus were again at a jar, thought thus with himself, led Crassus and that to make the one of them his Friend to further his fure, he should but procure the other his Enemy: and minding therefore to attain his defire with the favour of them both, fought first the means to make them Friends, and perswaded with them, that by their controversie the one seeking the others undoing, they did thereby but make Cierro, Carulus and Cato, of the greater Authority, who Pamper, Crair of themselves were of no power, if they two joyned in triendship together: for making both their fur and Castar, of themselves were of no power, if they two joyned in triendship together: Just and Casjur.

all three joyn. Friends and Factions one, they might rule the State and Commonwealth even as they would. Casjur all three joyn. Friends and Factions one, they might rule the State and Commonwealth even as they would. Casjus and Pompey, joyning their three Powers in one, made ed inftiendship having by his perfuration reconciled Crasjus and Pompey, joyning their three Powers in one, made themselves invincible, which afterwards turned to the destruction of the People and Senate of ROME. For he made them not onely greater then they were before, the one by the others means: NOME. FOR INCIDENCE HOLD OF STREET POWER THOUGH THEM. For when they began to favour (sfar, he was but himself also of great power through them. For when they began to favour (sfar, he was ftraight chofen Conful without any denial: and so behaved himself in the Consulthip, that at the length they gave him charge of great Armies, and then fent him to govern the Gauls: which was, as a man may fay, even themselves to put him into the Castle that should keep all the City in subjection: imagining that they two should make spoil and good booty of the rest, sithence they had procured him such a Government. Now for Pompey, the cause that made him commit this error, was nothing else, but his extream ambition. But as for Craffus, besides his old Vice of covetoulness rooted in him, he added to that a new avarice and destre of Triumphs and Victories, which Cefars fame for prowess and noble Acts in Wars did throughly kindle in him, that he being otherwife his better in all things, might not yet in that be his inferiour: which fury took fuch hold as it never left him, till it brought him unto an infamous end, and the Commonwealth to great mifery. Thus Cefar being come out of his Province of GAUL unto Luca, divers ROMANS went thither to fee him, and among other Pempey and Craffus. They having talked with him in feeret, agreed among them to devife to have the whole power of Roms in their hands: fo that Cafur should keep his Army together: and Crassus and Pompey should take other Provinces and Armies to them. Now to attain to this, they had no way but one: that Pompey and Craffus should again sue the second time to be Consuls, and that Casars Friends at ROME should stand with them for it, sending also a sufficient number of his Souldiers to be there at the day of chusing Compey and Crassus returned to Rome to that end, but not without for there ran a rumour in the City, that their meeting of Cafar in Luca. was for no good intent. Whereupon, Marcellinus and Domitius asked Pompey in open Senate. if he meant to make fuit to be Conful. Pompey answered them: Peradventure he did, perad-Pompey's flout venture he did not. They asking him again the same question: he answered, he would sue for answer. the good men, not for the evil. Pompey's answers were thought very proud and haughty. Howbeit Crassus answered more modestly, that if he saw it necessary for the Commonwealth, he would fue to be Conful: if not, that he would not stand for it. Upon these words, some were Crassus models so bold to make suit for the Consulship, as Domitius among other. But afterwards Pompey and answer. Craffus standing openly for it, all the rest lest off their suit for sear of them, Domitius onely excepted: whom Cato fo prayed and entreated, as his Kiniman and Friend that he made him to feek it. For he perswaded him, that it was to fight for the desence of their liberty, and how that it was not the Confulfnip Craffus and Pompey looked after, but that they went about to bring in a Tyranny: and that they fued not for the Office, but to get fuch Provinces and Armies into their hands as they defired, under colour and countenance of the Confulship. Cato ringing these words into their ears, and believing it certainly to be true as he faid, brought Domitius as it were by force into the Market-place, where many honest men joyned with them : because they wondered what the matter meant, that these two Noble men should sue the second time to be Consuls, and why they made fuit to be joyned together, and not to have any other with them, confidering there were so many other worthy men, meet to be Companions with either of them both in that Office. Pompey fearing he should be prevented of his purpose, fell to commit great outrage Pompey made and violence. As amongst other, when the day came to chuse the Confuls, Domitius going early in himlest and and violence. As amongst other, which the day can't to that the Solidary in the morning before day, accompanied with his Friends to the place where the Election should be: Substitute of the place where the Election should be: his man that carried his Torch before him, was slain by some whom Pompey had laid in wair . and many of the company hurt, and among others, (ato. And having thus dispersed them, he beset a House round about whither they sled for succour, and inclosed them there, until they Pompey and were both chosen Consuls together. Shortly after they came with force to the Pulpit for Ora- Graffus Contions and drave Cato out of the Market-place, and slew some of them that resisted and would not sale the second fly. They also then prolonged Casars Government of the Gauls for five years more, and times procured for themselves by Decree of the People, the Countries of Syria and Spain. Again, when they drew Lots together, Syria fell to Crassus, and Spain to Pompey. Every man was glad of their Fortune. For the People on the one fide were loath Pompey should go far Crassus had the from Rome: and himself also loving his Wife well, was glad he had occasion to be so near her. Government that he might remain the most part of his time at Rome. But Crassus of all other rejoyced most at of Syria. his hap, that he should go into Syria : and it appeared plainly that he thought it was the happiest turn that ever came to him, for he would ever be talking of the Journey, were he in never fo great or strange company. Furthermore, being among his Friends and Familiars, he would give out such fond Boasts of it, as no young man could have made greater vaunts: which was clean contrary to his years and nature, having lived all his life time as modeftly, and with as small oftentation as any man living. But then forgetting himfelf too much, had fuch fond conceits in his head, as he not onely hoped after the Conquest of Syria, and of the Parthians, but flattered himself, that the world should see all that Lucullus had done against King Tigranes, and Pompey against King Mithridates, were but trifles (as a man would say) to that he intended. For he looked to Conquer the BACTRIANS, the INDIANS, and the great Ocean Sea towards the East, though in the Decree passed by the People, there was no mention made of any Wars against the PARTHIAMS. Now every man faw Crassus ambition and greedy desire of Honour : in so much as Cafar leff wrote unto Crassus out of GAUL, commending his Noble intent and forwardnels, and wished him to go through therewith. But Atteius one of the Tribunes being bent against Atteius the Craffus to withfrand his departure: (having divers other Confederates with him to further his pur- Tribune a Crafful to withit and his departure: (naving divers other Confederates with hind make War with any gainst Craffus pole, who much milliked that any man of a bravery and luftiness should make War with any departure. Nation or People that had no way offended the ROMANS, but were their Friends and Confederates) Craffus fearing this conspiracy, prayed Pompey to affift and accompany him out of the City, because he was of great Authority and much reverenced of the People, as it appeared then. For, though multitudes of People were gathered together of purpole to let Crassus of his departure and to cry out upon him : yet when they faw Pompey go before him, with a pleasant smiling countenance, they quieted themselves, and made a lane for them, suffering them to pass on, and said nothing. This notwithstanding, Atteins the Tribune stepped before them, and commanded Crassus he should not depart the City, with great protestations if he did the contrary. But peceiving Crassins still held on his way notwithfranding, he commanded then one of the Officers to lay hold of him, and to arrest him : howbeit the other Tribunes would not fuffer the Officers to do it. So the Sergeant difmiffed Graffus. Then Access running towards the Gates of the City, got a Chafindish with Coals, and fer it in the middest of the Street. When Crassus came against it, he cast in certain persumes, and nade fyrinkings over it, pronouncing horrible Curfes, and calling upon terrible and ftrange Names of gods. The ROMANS fay, that those manner of Curfes are very ancient, but yet very feeret, and of curfings as of to great force, as he that is once curfed with that Curfe can never escape it, nor he that uleth it mong the Rodoth never prosper after it. And therefore sew men do use it, and never but upon urgent occa- mani.

The composition of the seas, and he had loft many of this supply how-Curfes, which were much hurtfull to the Commonwealth; although beit he landed his Army, and marched through the Country of GALATIA. There he found King Deintarus, a very old man, and yet building a new City: and to taunt him pretily, faid unto him: What, O King, begin you to build now in the afternoon? To whom the King of the GALATI-ANS again fmiling made answer : and truly Sir Captain, you go not very early (methinks) to make War with the PARTHIANS. For indeed Crassus was threescore and upward, and yet his face made him feem elder then he was. But to our Story again. Craffus being come into Craffur passeth the Country, had as good luck as he looked for: for he easily built a Bridge upon the River of Esphrates, and passed his Army over it without any let or trouble. So entring into MESO POTAMIA, he received many Cities that of good will yielded themselves unto him. Howbeit there was one City named ZENODOTIA, whereof Appolonius was Tyrant, where Craffus loft a hundred of his men: thereupon he brought his whole Army thither, took it by force, facked their goods, and fold the Prisoners by the drum. The GREEKS called this City ZENODOTIA, and for winning of the same Crassus suffered his men to call him Imperator, to say, Soveraign Captain: which turned to his shame and reproach, and made him to be thought of a base mind, as one that had small hope to attain to great things, making such reckoning of so small a trifle. Thus when he had bestowed seven thousand of his Footmen in Garrison in those Cities that had yielded unto him, and about a thousand Horsemen, he returned back to winter in Syria. Thither came his Son Fublius Crasses Publius Crasses to him out of GAUL from Julius Cefer, who had given him such honours, came to his as Generals of Rome did use to give such valiant Souldiers for reward of their good Service: and Father in Spris brought unto his Father a thousand men of arms, all choise men. This methinks was the greatest fault Crassus committed in all his enterprise of that War. For when he should presently have gone on still, and entred into BABYLON and SELEUCIA, (Cities that were ever Enemies unto the PARTHIANS) he tracted time, and gave them leifure to prepare to encounter his force when he should come against them. Again, they found great fault with him for spending of his time when he lay in Syria, feeming rather to lead a Merchants life then a Chieftains, For he never faw his Army, nor trained them out to any Martial Exercise, but fell to counting the revenew of the Cities, and was many days bufily occupied weighing of the Gold and Silver in the Temple of the goddels of Hierapolis. And worse then that : he sent to the People, Princes, and Cities about him, to furnish him with a certain number of men of War, and then he would discharge them for a Sum of Money. All these things made him to be both ill spoken of, and despited of every body. The first token of his ill luck that happened to him, came from this goddels Hierapolis, whom some suppose to be Venus, other say Juno, and others, that she is the Mother and chief cause that giveth beginning of moisture to every thing that cometh forth and hatha being, and taught men the original cause also of every good thing. For as Crassus the Father, and Son both, were coming out of the Temple, Craffus the younger fell first on his face, and the Father afterwards upon his Son. Likewife as he was gathering his Garrifons together, calling them out of the Cities into the Field, there came Ambassadors unto him from Arfaces King of the PARTHIANS, who delivered him their meffage in few words, and told him, that if this Arfacts, or Ar- Army he brought came from the ROMANS to make War with their Master, then that he would have no peace nor friendship with them, but would make mortal Wars against them. Further, if it were (as he had heard fay) that Crassus against the Peoples minds of Rome, for his own coverous defire, and peculiar profit was come in a jollity to make War with the PARTHIANS, and to invade their Country, then in that respect Arsaces would deal more savourably, in confideration of Crassus years, and was contented also to fuffer his men to depart with life and goods, whom he took rather to be in Prison, then in Garrison within his Cities. Thereto Crassus couragiously answered, that he would make them answer in the City of SELEUCIA. Therewith Vagiset, one of the eldest Ambassadors fell a laughing, and shewing Crassus the palm of his hand, told thewing Craf-fur the palm of my hand, Craffus, then you will come to Seleu-CIA. In this fort the Ambassadors took their leave of Crassus, and returned to their King Hyrodes, telling him he was to prepare for War. In the mean space, certain of Crassus Souldiers whom he had left in Garrison in the Cities of MESOPOTAMIA, having scaped marvellous dangeroully and with great difficulty, brought him news of importance, having themselves seen the wonderfull great Camp of the Enemies, and their manner of fight in the affaults they made to the Cities where they lay in Garrison. And, as it falleth out commonly among men escaped from any danger, making things more fearfull and dangerous then they be indeed, they reported that it was unpossible by flying to fave themselves, if they did follow in chase: neither to overtake them also if they fled. And further, that they had such kind of Arrows, as would fly swifter then a mans Eye could discern them, and would pierce through any thing they hit, before a man could tell who shot them. Besides, for the Horsemens Weapons they used, that they were such, as no Armour could possible hold out: and their Armours on the other side made of such a temper and mettal, as no force of any thing could pierce them through. The ROMANS hearing these news, fell from their former frouncis and courage, being born in hand before, that the PAR-THIANS differed nothing at all from the ARMENIANS and CAPADOCIANS, whom Lucullus had overcome and spoiled so oft, that he was weary withall: and they had already made account, that the tediousness of the journey they had to make and quose men that would not abide them. But then contrary to Cassias treasu froaks, and to be luftily fought withall. Hercupon, diverse Ca- ret under Crafd charge in the Army (among whom Cassium the Treasurer was one) for Crassium force of deliberate in councel to know whether he were best to go on, or warned by the remain where he is no foothlayers themselves did partly let Crassium understand, that the gods Soothlayers of

But Craffin gave no car his thinceefs. to them, neither would hear any other that told him as much, but onely liftned to them that counted king of draceled him to make hafte. Yet Craffus chiefest comfort and incouragement, was of Artabazes King of Rill, came to ARMENIA, who came to his Camp with fix thousand horse, which were but onely the Kings Cor- Crafter came. net and Guard. Again, he promifed him other ten thousand horsmen all armed and barbed, and thirty thousand footmen which he kept continually in pay, and counselled Crassus to enter the PAR-THIANS Countrey upon ARMENIAN fide : because his Camp should not onely have plenty of victuals, which he would fend him out of his Countrey, but for that he should also march in more fafety, having a Countrey full of mountains and woods before him, very ill for horsemen, which was the onely strength and force of the PARTHIANS. Craffus coldly thanked Artabizes for his good will, and all his noble offer of aid: yet told him he would take his journey through MESO-POTAMIA, where he had left many good fouldiers of the ROMANS. And thus departed the King of ARMENIA from him. But now as Craffu was passing his Army upon the bridge he had Wonderfoll made over the River of Euphrates, there fell out sudden strange and terrible cracks of thunder, with tokens to Crasfearfull flashes of lightning full in the souldiers faces: moreover, out of a great black cloud came a fur. wonderfull from and tempeft of wind upon the bridge, that the marvellous force thereof overthrew a great part of the bridge, and carried it quite away. Befides all this, the place where he appointed to lodge, was twice ftricken with two great thunder claps. One of his great horses in like case, being bravely furnished and set out, took the bit in his teeth, leapt into the River with the rider on his back, who were both drowned, and never feen after. They fay also, that the first Eagle and Enfign that was to be taken up when they marched, turned back of it felf, without any hands laid upon it. Further it fortuned that as they were distributing the victuals unto the fouldiers, after they had all passed over the bridge, the first thing that was given them, was salt and water lintels, which the ROMANS take for a token of death and mourning, because they use it at the funerals of the dead.

After all this, when Crassum was exhorting his souldiers, a word scaped his mouth that troubled the Army marvellously. For he told them, that he had broken the bridge which he had made over the River Euphrates, of purpole, because there should not a man of them return back again. Where indeed when he had feen that they took this word in ill part, he should have called it in again, or have declared his meaning, feeing his men so amazed thereat; but he made light of it, he was so wilfull. In the end he made ordinary facrifice for the purging of his Army: and when the Soothfaver gave him the intrails of the beaft that was facrificed, they fell out of his hands. Craffine perceiving that the standers by were troubled withall, fell a laughing, and told them. You see what age is: yet shall you not see my sword fall out of my hand. So having ended his facrifice, he began to march forward into the Countrey by the Rivers fide, with feven legions of footmen, and little craffus Army lack of four thousand horse, and in manner as many shot and sling lightly armed. There returned was fifty thouto him certain of his Scouts that had viewed the Countrey, and told him there was not an enemy fand men. to be feen in the field, howbeit that they had found the track of a marvellous number of horse which seemed as if they were returned back. Then Crassus first of all began to hope well; and his fouldiers also they fell to despise the PARTHIANS, thinking certainly that they would not come to battell with them. Yet Craffu his treaturer ever perswaded him the contrary, and thought it better for him to refresh his Army a little in one of the Cities where he had his Garrison, untill such time as he heard more certain news of the Enemies: or elfe that he would march directly towards

SELEUCIA by the River fide, which lay fit for him to victual himself easily by boats that would always follow his Camp and should be fure besides that the enemies could not environ him behind.

so that having no way to set upon them but before, they should have none advantage of them.

he bare good will to the ROMANS. But Ariannes had been laboured at that time by the King of PARTHIAMS Captains, and was won by them to deceive Crassus, and to entice him all he could to draw him from the River and the Woody Countrey, and to bring him into the plain field, where they might compass him in with their horsemen, for they meant nothing less then to fight with the ROMANS at the fwords point. This barbarous Captain Ariamses coming to Craffus, did highly praise and commend Pompey, as his good Lord and benefactor (for he was an excellent spoken man) and extolled Craffus Army , reproving him that he came too slowly for-

Craffin going about then to confult of the matter, there came one Ariannes unto him, a Captain of the ARABIANS, a fine subtill fellow, which was the greatest mischief and evill that fortune could Ariannes, a fend to Craffm at that present time, to bring him to utter ruine and destruction. For there were drubing some of Crassus souldiers that had served Pompey before in that Countrey, who knew him very well, and remembred that Pompey had done him great pleasures : whereupon they thought that of SCYTHIA and HYRCANIA. Therefore if you determine (faid he) to fight, it were good you made he did it of purpose to avoid the greater danger, and to keep far off, that he might with safety see what would happen, and therefore lent Surena before to hazard battell, and to turn the ROMANS back again. For Surma was no mean man, but the fecond person of PARTHIA next unto the Surenz what he King, in riches, reputation, valour and experience in wars, the chiefest of his time among all the PAR-THIANS, and for execution, no man like him. Surena when he did but remove into the Countrey onely with his houfhold, had a thousand Camels to carry his Sumpters, and two hundred Coaches of Curtifans, a thousand men of Arms armed at all pieces, and as many mo befides lightly armed: fo that his whole train and Court made above ten thouland horse. Further, by the tenure of that land that its, whose crain and course that a course it is office was at the first proclaiming of any King, to put the Royall Crown or Diadem upon the Kings head. Moreover, he had reftored King Hyrodes that then reigned, to his Crown, who had been before driven out of his Realm: and had won him the great City of Seleucia, himself being the first man that scaled the walls, and overthrew them with his own ty of Seleucia, minimum sengence and minimum sender thirty years of age, yet they counted him a wife hands that refifted him. And though he was under thirty years of age, yet they counted him a wife man, as well for his counfell as his experience, which were the means whereby he overcame Craf us: man, as well for use countries and folly at the first, and afterwards for very fear and timorousnels, which his misfortune had brought him unto, was easie to be taken and intrapped, by any policy or deceit, Now this barbarous Captain Ariamnes having then brought Graffus to believe all that he said, and drawn him by perfuration from the River of Emphrates, unto a goodly plain Countrey, meeting at first with very good way, but after with very ill, because they entred into sands where their feet the want very good way, out after was neither tree nor water, nor any end of them that they funk deep, and into delect fields where was neither tree nor water, nor any end of them that they rould differn by eye, fo that not onely extream thirst, and miserable way marvellously amazed the ROMANS, but the discomfort of the eye also, when they could see nothing to stay their fight upon: that above all the reft, wrought their extream trouble. For neither far nor near any fight of Tree, River, Brook, Mountain, Grafs, or green Herb appeared within their view, but in troth an endless sea of defert fands on every side round about their Camp. Then began they to suspect that endiets lea of deleterations on every macromal about their Comp. Then began they to simper that they were betrayed. Again, when news came that Ariabazes King of ARMENIA, was kept in his Countrey with a great war. King Hyrodes made upon him, which kept him that he could not according to the country with a great war. ding to his promite come to aid him, yet that he wished him to draw towards ARMENIA, that both uning to ins promise come to an armin, they might the better fight with King Hyroder: if not, that he their Armies being joyned together, they might the better fight with King Hyroder: would always keepthe Woody Countrey, marching in those vallies and places where his horsemen might be fafe, and about the mountains: [raf] was fo willfull, as he would write no answer to it, mugut or rate, and about the modification of the hard no leifure then to hearken to the Armenians, but out angerty total the minding of the state o much offended with Craff or his answer: howbeit perceiving he could do no good with him, and much officiated with Craiss for the animals industrial percenting for count up good with him, and that he took every thing in ill part, he faid unto him, he would tell him no more. Norwithfanding, taking Ariammes this Captain of the Armenians afide, he rebuked him roundly, and faid: O thouwretch, what curied devill hath brought thee to us, and how cunningly haft thou bewitched and charmed Craffee, that thou haft made him bring his Army into this endlets defert, and to trace this way fitter for an ARABIAN Captain of thieves, then for a Generall and Confull of the Rotins way nater for an AKABBAR Speaking gently unto Caffins, did comfort him, and prayed him to have patience; and going and coming by the bands, feeming to help the fouldiers, he told them merrily: O my fellows, I believe you think to march through the Countrey of Naples, and look to meet with your pleafant fprings, goodly groves of wood, your natural baths, and the good Inns round about to refresh you, and do not remember that you pass through the deferts of ARABIA and Assyria. And thus did this barbarous Captain entertain the ROMANS 2 while: but afterwards he diflodged betimes, before he was openly known for a traitour, and yet not without Crassus privity, whom he bare in hand, that he would go and fet some broil and tumult in the enemies Camp. It is reported that Crassus the very same day came out of his Tent not in his coat armour of Scarlet (as the manner was of the ROMAN Generals) but in a black coat : howbeit, remembring himfelf, he straight changed it again. It is said moreover, that the Ensignbearers when they should march away, had much ado to pluck their Ensigns out of the ground, they stuck so fast. But Crassus scotting at the matter, hastened them the more to march forward, compelling the footmen to go as faft as the horiemen, till a few of their Scouts came in, whom they had fent to discover : who brought news how the enemies had slain their fellows , and what ado they had themselves to scape with life, and that they were a marvellous great Army, and well appointed to give them battell. This news made all the Camp afraid, but Graffus felf more then appointed to give memoauted. Ams news made an use camp and in manner befides himfelf. At the reft, so as he began to fet his men in barrell ray, being for hast in manner befides himfelf. At the first following Cassius mind, he fet his ranks wide, casting his fouldiers into a squarebattell, a good way afunder one from another, because he would take in as much of the plain as he in and so divided the horsemen into the wings. Paraighted the battell of his footmen, fashioning it Crassis army a front and shewing their faces every way. For there against the on either fide, and by every Cohort a company of horse, Parthians.

if without aid of horfemen, and that all his battell should be alike of the leading of one wing, his fon Publishe Crassus the other, and himdefended, the same time reaging of one wing; his ion Publish evaluate the other, and him-felf led the battell intue middet. In this order they marched forward, till he came to a little brook called Balifier, where there was no great store of water, but yet happily lighted on for the fouldiers, for the great thirst and extream heat they had abidden all that painfull way, where they had net with no water before. There the most part of Crassas Captains thought best to Camp all night, that they might in the mean time find means to know their enemies what number they were , and how they were armed , that they might fight with them in the morning. But Craffus yeelding to his fons and his horfemens perfuration, who intreated him to march on with his Army, and to fer upon the enemies prefently: commanded, that fuch as would ear; should eat standing, keeping their ranks: Yet on the fuddain, before this commandment could run through the whole Army, he commanded them again to march, not fair and foftly, as when they go to give battell, but with speed, till they spied the enemies, who seemed not to the ROMANS at the first to be so great a number, neither to bravely armed as they thought they had been. For, concerning their great number, Surena had of purpole hid them, with certain troops he sent before : and to hide their bright armour, he had caft cloaks and beafts skins over them, but when both the Armies approached near the one to the Surena's flraother, and that the fign to give charge was lift up in the air; first they filled the field with a dread-tagenee for the full noise to hear. The PARTHIANS at the first thought to have fet upon the ROMANS with their Pikes, to see if they could break their first ranks. But when they drew near, and faw the depth of the ROMANS battell ftanding close together, firmly keeping their ranks, then they gave back, making as though they fled, and difperfed themselves. But the ROMANS marvelled when they found it contrary, and that it was but a device to environ them on every fide. Whereupon Craffus commanded his shot and light armed men to affail them, the which they did : but they went not far, they were fo beaten in with Arrows end driven to retire to their force of the armed men. And this was the first beginning that both seared and troubled the ROMANS, when they saw the vehemency and great force of the enemies shot, which brake their armours, and ran through any thing they hit, were it never fo hard or foft. The PARTHIANS thus fill drawing back, thot altogether on every fide, not aforehand, but at adventure: for the battell of the ROMANS stood so near together, as if they would, they could not sought retiring. missthe killing of some. These Bowmen drew a great strength and had big strong Bowes, which fent the Arrows from them with a wonderfull force. The ROMANS by means of these Bows were in hard state. For if they kept their ranks, they were grievoully wounded : again, if they left them, and fought to run upon the PARTHIANS to fight at hand with them, they faw they could do them but little hurt, and yet were very likely to take the greater harm themselves. For as fast as the Ro-DUE INTICHUET, and yet were very many to the PARTHIANS flie from them, and yet in flying continued fill fight. their shooting : which no Nation but the SCYTHIANS could better do then they, being a matter indeed most greatly to their advantage. For by their flight they best do save themselves, and fighting still, they thereby shun the shame of that their slying. The ROMANS still defended themfelves, and held it out to long as they had any hope that the PARTHIANS would leave fighting when they had fpent their Arrows, or would joyn battell with them. But after they understood that there were a great number of Camels loden with quivers full of Arrows, where the first that had bestowed their Arrows, fetched about to take new quivers: then Crassus seeing no end of their thot, began to faint, and fent to Publius his fon, willing him in any case to charge upon the enemies, and to give an onfet, before they were compaffed in on every fide. For it was on Publius fide that one of the Wings of the enemies battell was nearest unto them, and where they rode up and down to compass them behind. Whereupon Crassus fon taking thirteen hundred horsemen with him (of the which, a thouland were of the men of Armes whom Inline Cafar fent) and five hundred shot , with eight Ensigns of sootmen having targets, most near to the place where himfelf then was : he put them out in breadth, that wheeling about they might give a charge upon them that rode up and down. For the horsemen that fled before them, suddenly turned again, and a number of others befides came and fet upon them. Whereupon they flayed, thinking that the enemies perceiving they were fo few, would come and fight with them hand to hand. Howbeit they fet out against them their men at arms with their barbed horse, and made their light horfmen wheel round about them, keeping no order at all: who galloping up and down The miferable the plain, whirled up the fand hills from the bottom with their horse feet, which raised such a wonderfull dust, that the ROMANS could scarce see or speak one to another. For they being shut up into a little room, and standing close one to another, were fore wounded with the PARTHIANS Arrows, and died of a cruell lingring death, crying out for anguish and pain they felt: and turning and tormenting themselves upon the land, they brake their Arrows sticking in them. Again, striving by force to pluck out the forked Arrow heads that had pierced far into their bodies through their veins and finews, thereby they opened their wounds wider, and fo caft themselves away. Many of them died thus milerably marryred : and fuch as died not, were not able to defend themselves. Then when Publius Crassus prayed and belought them to charge the men at Armes with the barbed horse, they shewed him their hands fast nailed to the Targets with Arrows, and their feet likewise fhot through and nailed to the ground: fo as they could neither flie nor yet defend themselves. Thereupon himlelf encouraging his horfemen, went and gave charge, and did valiantly fet upon the encmies, but it was with too great disadvantage, both for offence, and also for defence. For himself and his men with weak and light staves, brake upon them that were armed with Curaces of Steel, or fliff Leather jacks. And the PARTHIANS in contrary manner with mighty ftrong Pikes gave charge upon these GAULES, which were either unarmed, or else but lightly armed. Yet those were they in whom Crasse most trusted, having done wonderfull sears of war with them. For they received the PARTHIANS Pikes in their hands, and took them about the middles, and threw them off their horse, where they lay on the ground, and could not fit for the weight of their harness: and there were divers of them also that lighting from their horse , lay under their enemies horse bellies, and thrust their swords into them. Their horse slinging and bounding in the air for very pain threw their mafters under feet, and their enemies one upon another, and in the end fell dead among them. Moreover, extream heat and thirst did marvellously cumber the GAULES, who were uled to abide neither of both: and the most part of their horse were slain, charging with all their power upon the men at Arms of the PARTHIANS, and fo ran themselves in upon the points of their Pikes. At the length, they were driven to retire towards their footmen, and Publim Crassum among them, who was very ill by reason of the wounds he had received. And seeing a fand hill by chance not far from them, they went thither, and fetting their horse in the middeft of it, compassed it in round with their Targets, thinking by this means to cover and defend themselves the better from the barbarous people: howbeit they found it contrary. For the Country being plain, they in the foremost ranks did fomewhat cover them behind, but they that were behind, flanding higher then they that flood foremost (by reason of the nature of the hill that was highest in the middeft) could by no means fave themselves, but were all hurt alike, as well the one as the other, bewaiting their own miferies and misfortune, that must needs die without revenge, or declaration of their valiancy. At that present time there were two GRECIANS about Publish Craffut, Hirronymus, and Nichomachus, who dwelt in those quarters, in the City of CARRES: they both coun-Carres a City called Publism Craffus to fteal away with them, and to flie to a City called ISCHNES, that was not of Moforciamic. Istinet, a City. far from thence, and took the ROMANS part. But Publiss answered them, that there was no death so cruel as could make him forfake them that died for his fake. When he had so faid, withing them to fave themselves, he embraced them, and took his leave of them: and being very fore hurt with the flot of an Arrow through one of his hands, commanded one of his Gentlemen to thrust him through with a fword, and so turned his side to him for the purpose. It is reported Censorinus did the like. But Megabacchus flew himfelf with his own hands, and so did the most part of the Gentlemen that were of that company. And for those that were left alive, the PARTHIANS got up the fand hill, and fighting with them, thrust them through with their Spears and Pikes, and took but five hundred priloners. After that, they stroke off Publius Crassus bead, and thereupon returned ftraight to set upon his Father Crass who was then in this state. Crass the Father, after he had willed his son to charge the enemies, and that one brought him word he had broken them, and purwilled his son to charge the enemies, and that one brought him word he had broken them, and purfued the chafe: and perceiving also that they that remained in their great battell, did not prefs upon him so near as they did before, because that a great number of them were gone after the other for refeue: he then began to be lively again, and keeping his men close, retired with them the best he could by a hills side, looking ever that his son would not be long before that he returned from the chafe. But Publisus feeing himfelf in danger, had fent divers mellengers to his Father, to advertise him of his diftress, whom the PARTHIANS intercepted and slew by the way; and the last mesand that with a great power. These news were grievous to Crassins in two respects: first to the fear the had, seeing himself in danger to lose all: and secondly, for the vehement desire he had to go to his sons help. Thus he saw in reason all would come to nought, and in fine determined to go with all his power to the refcue of his Son. But in the mean time the enemies were returned from his Sons overthrow, with a more dreadfull noise and cry of victory, then ever before : and thereupon their deadly founding drums filled the air with their wonderfull noise. The ROMANS then looked straight for a hot alarm. But the PARTHIANS that brought Publine Crassus head upon the point of a Launce, coming neer to the ROMANS, shewed them his head, and asked them in derifion, if they knew what house he was of, and who were his parents: for it is not likely (faid they) that fo noble and valiant a young man, should be the Son of fo cowardly a Father, as Crassus. The fight of Publius Crassus head killed the ROMANS hearts more then any other danger they had been in at any time in all the battell. For it did not fet their hearts on fire as it should have done, with anger, and desire of revenge: but far otherwise, made them quake for as it mount have come, that dead to behold it. Yet Craffus felf shewed greater courage in this miffortune, then he before had done in all the war beside. For riding by every band he cried out a- to his souldiers loud: The grief and forrow of this loss (my fellows) is no mans but mine, mine onely: but the when his heare noble fuccels and honour of ROME remaineth still unvincible, so long as you are yet living. Now was full of forif you pity my loss of so noble and valiant a Son, my good fouldiers, let me intreat you to turn row. your forrow into fury: make them dearly buy the joy they have gotten: be revenged of their cruelty, and let not my misfortune fear you. For why, afpiring minds fometime must needs suftain Lucullus overcame not Tigranes, nor Scipio, Antiochus, but their blood did pay for it. Our "ancestors in old time lost a thousand ships, yea in ITALIE divers armies and Chiestains for the "conquest of Sicilia: yet for all the loss of them, at the length they were victorious over "them, by whom they were before vanquished. For the Empire of ROME came not to that great-"ness it now is at, by good fortune onely, but by patience and constant suffering of trouble and adversity, never yeelding or giving place unto any danger. Crassus using these persuasions to encourage his fouldiers for refolution, tound that all his words wrought none effect: but contrarily, after he had commanded them to give the shout of battell, he plainly saw their hearts were done, for that their shout rose but faint, and not all alike. The PARTHIANS on the other side their shout was great, and lustily they rang it out. Now when they came to joyn, the PARTHIANS Archers on horseback compassing in the ROMANS upon the wings, shot an infinite number of Arrows at their fides. But their men at Armes giving charge upon the front of the ROMANS battell with their great Lances, compelled them to draw into a narrow room, a few excepted, that valiantly, and in desperate manner ran in among them, as men rather desiring so to die, then to be flain with their Arrows, where they could do the PARTHIANS almost no hurt at all. So were they foon dispatcht, with the great Lances that ran them through, head, wood and all, with such a force, as oftentimes they ran through two at once. Thus when they had fought the whole day, night drew on, and made them retire, faying, they would give Craffin that nights respite, to lament and bewail his Sons death : unless that otherwise he wisely looking about him, thought it better for his fafety to come and offer himself to King Arfaces mercy, then to tarry to be brought unto him by force. So the PARTHIAN'S camping hard by the ROMANS, were in very good hope to overthrow him the next morning. The KOMANS on the other fide had a marvellous ill night, making no reckoning to bury their dead, nor to dress their wounded men that died in miserable pain : but every man bewailed his hard fortune, when they faw not one of them could escape, if they tarried till the morning. On the other fide, to depart in the night through that defart, their wounded men did grieve them much. Because, to carry them so away, they knew it would lett their flight: and yet to leave them to behind, their pitifull cries would give the enemies knowledge of their departure. Now though they all thought Craffus the onely author of their mifery, yet were they defirous to fee his face, and to hear him speak. But Craffus went afide without light, and laid him down with his head covered, because he would see no man, shewing thereby the common fort an example Crassus with his head covered, because ne would receive his his head covered, because ne would receive his his head covered, because ne while men, a good learning to know the fruits of ill counfell, and vain tunes incontinues in the wife men, a good learning to know the fruits of ill counfell, and vain tunes incontinues in the wife men, a good learning to know the fruits of ill counfell, and vain ambition, that had fo much blinded him, as he could not be content to command fo many thousand flancy. men, but thought (as a man would fay) himfelf the meanest of all other, and one that possess no thing, because he was accounted inferiour unto two persons onely, Pompey and Casar. Notwithstanding, Octavisis one of his Chieftains, and Casjus the Treasurer, made him rife, and fought to comfort him the best they could. But in the end, seeing him so overcome with forrow, and out of heart, that he had no life nor spirit in him, they themselves called the Captains and Centurions together, and fate in councill for their departure, and so agreed that there was no longer tarrying for them. Thus of their own authority at the first they made the Army march away withour any found of Trumpet or other noise. But immediately after, they that were left hurt and fick, and could not follow, feeing the Camp remove, fell a crying out and tormenting themselves in such Crassian Bying. Yet this word Jonatism gave to the watch to tell Coponius, served Crassus turn very well. For Coponius thought by this great hafte of his, and the fhort confuled speech he made, passing on his way, that he had no good news to tell them : wherefore he straight Armed his fouldiers, and understanding that Crassus was returning back, went to meet him, and brought him and his Army into the City of CARRES. The PARTHIANS knew well enough of the removing of the ROMANS Camp, but yet would not follow them in the night, but the next morning entring into their Camp where they lay, flew all that were left behind, which were above four thouland men: and riding after them that were gone, took many stragglers in the plain. Among them there was Bargantinus, one of Craffus Lieutenants, who frayed in the night out of the Army with four whole enigns, and having loft his way, got a hill, where the PARTHIANS befieged him, flew him and all his company, though he valiantly there defended himself: yet twenty of them onely efcaped, who with their fwordsdrawn in their hands, running forwards with their heads, thrust in amongst the thickest of the PARTHIANS: They wondering at their desperation, opened of themness of twenty felves, and fuffered them to march on towards the City of CARRES. In the mean time false newes was brought to Surena, how Crassus with all the chiefest men of his host was fled, and that the great number that were received into the City of CARRES were men of all forts gathered together, and not a man of any quality or estimation. Surena thereupon thinking he had lost the honour of his victory, yet standing in some doubt of it, because he would know the truth, that he might eiinstructly, yet manning in some course of the course of th walls of the City, charging him to call for Crassum or Cassum, and to tell them that Surena would parle with them.

The interpreter did as he was commanded. Word was brought to Crassum, and he accepted parlence. Shortly after also, thither came certain souldiers of the Arabians from the Camp of the PARTHIANS, who knew Craffur and Cassius very well by fight, having divers times feen them in their Camp before the battell. Thele ARABIANS feeing Cassius upon the walls told him, that Surena was contented to make peace with them, and to let them go fafely, as his mafters good friends, fo that they would furrender MESO POTAMIA into the King of the PARTHIANS hands; and how they thought that was the best way for both parties, rather then to be enforced unto it by extreamity. Cassis thought this a good offer, and told them, that they must appoint the day and place, where Crassis and Surena should meet to talk together of the matter. The Arabians and place, where Cray would do it; and fo departed. Surena hearing this, was glad he had them at fuch advantage, where he might befiege them. The next day he brought all his Army before the City of CARRES. There the PARTHIANS marvelloully revited the ROMANS, and told them, they must deliver them Crassus and Cassins bound hands and feet, if they would have any grace or peace with them. The ROMANS were marvelloully offended that they were thus deceived, and told Craf-WHITHERD. Yet Crassus self had told it to Andromachus the veriest traitor and villain in all the City, whom he had chosen to be his guide. This traitor Andromachus advertised the enemies in every point, of their purpole and departure. But because the PARTHIANS do never use to fight in the night, and The Parthian that it was a hard matter to bring them to it; and again that Crassus departed in the night time: unach was a natu manut to tame and the Romans would win fuch ground before the PARTHIANS, as they could not possibly overtake them the next day. Therefore of purpose he sometime brought them one way, other while another way, and at the last, brought them into a great Bog or Marish, full donever fight of deep holes and ditches, and where they must needs make many turns, and returns before they could get out again, and yet very hardly. Whereupon, some in the Army began to mistrust, that Andromachus meant no good, to turn and tols them up and down in that fort, and therefore would Anaromacous means no good, to minant contents, returned towards the City of Carres follow him no more: infomuch as Caffins among others, returned towards the City of Carres again, from whence they came. And when his guides (who were ARABIANS) counfelled him to tarry there till the Moon were out of the fign of Scorpio, he answered them: I fear the fign of Satarry there till the Moon were girary more. So as foon as he could, he took his way towards Assyria with five hundred horfemen. And other of the Army also having faithfull guides, recovered a Countrey of the mountains, called Sinnaca, and retired into a safe place before the break of day: and they were about five hundred men, whom Offavins 2 noble man had in charge. But the day ftole upon Crassus, hunting up and down yet in the Marish, in those ill savoured places, into the which Andromachus that traitor had of purpole brought him, having with him four eningns of footmen all with Targets, and very few horsemen, and five Sergeams that carried the Axes and Rods before him; with whom, with much ado and great labour he got into the right way when the enemies were almost upon him, and that he was within twelve furlongs of joyning with Oltavim. There in hafte he had gotten a hill, which was not fo fteep for horsemen, neither of such strength as the other hills were, called Sinnaces; yet under them, and Joyning to them by a long hill that runneth along the plain, fo as Offavius plainly faw the danger Crass was in. Thereupon he first ran down the hills with a few of his men that followed him: but after also came all the reft, faying they were cowards if they should tarry behind. At their coming they gave such a hot onset upon the PARTHIANS, that they made them give back from that hill: and middeft of them, covering him round with their Targets, they spake nobly, that the body of their Generall, before they were The worthi-flain offe free and that they had fought it out to the last man in his defence. Hereupon Surena nets of the Roperceiving the PARTHIANS were not to couragious as they were wont to be, and that if night came "Ma fouldiers upon them, and that the ROMANS did once recover the high mountains, they could never possibly bemet withall again: he thought cunningly to beguite Craffin once more by this device. He let certain prisoners go of purpose, before whom he made his men give out this speech, That the King Another fireof PARTHIA would have no mortall war with the ROMANS; but far otherwise: he rather defired together that their friendship, by shewing them some notable favour, as to use Crassus very courteously. And to give colour to this bruit, he called his men from fight, and going himself in person towards Crassus, with the chiefest of the nobility of his hoast, in quiet manner, his Bow unbent, he held out his right hand, and called Crassus to talk with him of peace, and faid unto him : Though the ROMANS had Surena's crastic felt the force and power of their King, it was against his will, for he could do no less but defend him- speech to Crastfelf: howbeit that now he was very willing and defirous to make them tafte of his mercy and clemen- fast. cy, and was contented to make peace with them, and to let them go fafely where they would. All the ROMANS besides Crassius were glad of Surena's words. But Cr. sius that had been deceived beforeby their crafty fetches and devices, confidering also no cause apparent to make them change thus suddenly, would not hearken to it, but first consulted with his friends. Howbeit the fouldiers they cryed out on him to go, and fell at words with him, faying, that he cared not though they were all flain, and that himself had not the heart onely to come down and talk with the enemies that were unarmed. Crassus proved first to pacifie them by fair means, persuading them to have a little patience but till night, which was at hand, and then they might fafely depart at their plealure, and recover the mountains and streight passages, where their enemies could not follow them: and pointing them the way with his finger, he prayed them not to be faint-hearted, nor to despair of their satety, seeing they were so near it. But in the end Crassus perceiving they sell to mutiny, and beating of their harness, did threaten him if he went not; fearing then they would do him some villany, went towards the enemy, and coming back a little, faid onely these words: O Octavias, and you Petronius, with all you ROMAN Gentlemen that have charge in this Army, you all fee now, how I against my will am enforced to go to the place I would not, and can witness with me, how I am driven with shame and force; yet I pray you, if your fortunes be to escape this danger, that ve "will report wheresoever you come, that Crassus was slain, not delivered up by his own souldiers "into the hands of the barbarous people, as I am, but deceived by the fraud and fublilty of his ene-" mies: Otherins would not tarry behind on the hill, but went down with Crafters: but Crafters fent Graffies words "miss: Officers that followed him. The first that came from the PARTHANS unto Crafts were going to his two mongrell GRECIANS, who difmounting from their horse saluted him, and prayed him to send death fome of his men before, and Surena would flew them, that both himself and his train came unarmed towards him. Crassus thereto made him answer, that if he had made any account of his life, he would not have put himself into their hands. Notwithstanding he sent two brethren before called the Ros-CIANS, to know what number of men, and to what end they met fo many together. These two brethren came no fooner to Surena, but they were staid, and himself in the mean time kept on his way a horseback, with the noblest men of his Army. Now when Surena came near to Crassas: Why, Surena's craste how now (quoth he) what meaneth this? a Confull and Lieutenant Generall of ROME on root, and to Craffucq we on horseback? Therewithall he straight commanded one of his men to bring him a horse, Cr.sf-(us answered Surena again: In that they neither of both offended, following the use and manner of their Countrey, when any meeting is made for Treaty of peace. Surena replied: As for the Treaty of peace, that was already agreed upon between the King Hyrodes and the ROMANS; howbeit that they were to go to the River, and there to fet down the Articles in writing : for you ROMANS (faid he) do not greatly remember the capitulations you have agreed upon. With those words he gave him his right hand. As Crafins was fending for a horfe, You shall not need, said Surena; for look, the King doth present you this. And straight one was brought him with a steel faddle richly gilt; upon the which his Gentlemen mounted Crassus immediately, and following him behind lashed his horse to make him run the swifter. Offavins seeing that, first laid hand on the bridle, then Petronius Colonel, of a thousand footmen, and after them, all the rest of the ROMANS also gathered about Crafsus to flay the horfe, and to take him from them by force that preffed him on of either fide. So they thrust one at another at the first very angrily, and at the last fell to blows. Then Offavius drew out his fword, and flew one of the barbarous noblemens horfekeepers : and another came behind him and flew Offavius, Petronius had no Target, and receiving a blow on his Curaces, lighted from his offacius flain horse, and had no hurt : and on the other fide came Pomanatres, one of the PARTHIANS, and flew Crafsus. Some fay notwithstanding that Pomax aibres flew him not, but another , yet that he Craffus flain. cut off his head and his hand after he fell to the ground. But all these reports are rather conjectures, then any certainty. For as for them that were there, some of them were slain in the field fighting for Crasus, and others faved themselves by flying to the hill. The PARTHIAN'S followed them, and told them that Crafius had paid the pain he had deferved, and for the reft, that Surent had them The number told them that Crafsus had paid the pain he had deterved, and for the reft, that Surent Doublet of the Results come down with fafety. Initi they counted in womans appared on the FARTHANS, and had taught him to answer, when any called him Crassus, or Lord Captain. Him they put a horseand had raugus minito animes, and had many Trumpets before him, and Sergeants upon Camels backs, that carried axes before him, and bundles of Rods, and many puries tied to the bundles of Rods, and ROMANS heads newly cut off tied to the axes; and after him followed all the ftrumpets and women Minftrels of SELEUCIA, who went finging of longs of mockery and derifion of Crassus womanish cowardinefs. Now for these open shews, every one might see them: but besides that fight, Surena having Ariffiles book called the Senate of Seleucia together, laid before them faiffiles books of ribaldry, intituled arither book called the Senate of Seleucia together, and before them respirate books of the senate of Seleucia together, and before found in a Romans fardle or trufs called Raminishing the Milefant, which was no fable, for they were found in a Romans fardle or trufs called Raminishing the senate of the senate fins. This gave Surena great cause to foom and despise the behaviour of the ROMANS, which was fo far out of order, that even in the wars they could not refrain from doing evill, and from the reading of fuch vile books. Then the Senators of Seleucia found that Afope was a wife man, who faid, that every man carried a fack on his neck, and that they put other mens faults at the facks mouth, and their own toward the bottom of the fack : when they confidered that Sarena had put the book of the lasciviousnessof the MILESIANS at the sacks mouth, and a long tale of the PARTHIANS vain pleafures and delights in the bottom of the fack, carrying fuch a number of Carts loden with naughty packs in his Army, as he did, which feemed an Army of Ermits and field-mice. For in the vaward and foremost ranks, all appeared terrible and cruell, being onely Lances, Pikes, Bowes, and horfe: but all they ended afterwards in the rereward with a train of The description harlots, infirements of mustick, dauncing, singing, banquetting, and rioting all night with Curtion of Suren's zans. I will not deny but Rusting deserved blame: but yet withall, I say, that the PARTHIANS Army. were shameless to reprove these books of the vanities of the MILESIANS, considering that many of their Kings, and of the Royall bloud of the Arfacides, were born of the IONIAN and MILESIAN Curtizans. Things palling thus in this fort, King Hyrodes had made peace and league with Artabazes King of ARMENIA, who gave his Sifter in marriage unto Pacerne, King Hyrodes with Arthurates Aung of Caracasta, who have the which were many Greek verses sung, Hyrodes Son, and made great feasts one to another: in the which were many Greek verses sung, Hyrodes felf understanding well the Greek tongue, and Artabazes was so perfect in it, that he himself made certain Tragedies, Orations, and stories, whereof some are yet extant at this day. The same night Craff w head was brought, the Tables being all taken up, 3/4/6/8/2 common Player of enterludes born in the City of THALLES came before the King, and recited a place of the Tragedy of the BACCHANTES of Euripides, telling of the misfortune of Agave, who strake off his sons head. And as every man took great pleasure to hear him, Syllaces coming into the hall, after his humble duty first done to the King, delivered him Crassus head before them all. The PARTHIANS seeing that , fell a clapping of their hands , and made an out-cry for joy. The gentlemen Usher by the kings commandment did fet Syllaces at the Table. Jafon cafting off his apparell reprefenting Penthungs person, gave it to another Player to put it on him; and counterfeiting the BACCHANTES possest with fury, began to rehearse these verses, with a gesture tune and voice of a man mad and befide himfelf:

Behold, we from the forrest bring a stag nownewly slain, A worthy booty and reward, befeeming well our pain.

This marvellously grudged the company, and specially singing these verses afterwards, where the Chorus both asked and answered himself:

Nems elle but I thereof may brag.

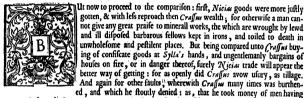

Nems elle but I thereof may brag.

Pomaxathres hearing them dispute about the matter, being set at the Table with others, rose straight, and went and took the head himself, to whom of right it belonged to say those words, and not unto the player that fpake them. King Hyrodes liked this fport marvelloufly, and rewarded Pomaxathres according to the manner of the Countrey in such a case; and to Jason he also gave a raient. Such See the reward was the fuccels of Craffit enterprise and voyage, much like unto the end of a Tragedy. But afterwards Hyrodes cruelty, and Sweena's foul perjury and craft, were in the end justly revenged upon or crait and perjury and crait, were in the end juncy receiged upon them both according to their deferts. For King Hyrodes envying Surena's glory, put Surena to them both according to their deferts. For King Hyrodes envying Surena's glory, put Surena to them the had loft his Son Pacorus, The miletable death. And Hyrodes fell into a diffeafe that became a dropfie, after he had loft his Son Pacorus, the manufacture of the manufac who was flain in a battell by the ROMANS. Phraster his fecond Son, thinking to fet his father for wards gave him drink of the juyce of Aconitum. The dropfic received the poison, and the one drave the other out of Hyrodes body, and fet him on foot again, Phraates perceiving his father to amend upon it, to make short work, with his own hands strangled him, CRASSUS with NICIAS.

Illt now to proceed to the comparison : first, Nicias goods were more justly gotten, & with less reproach then Craffus wealth; for otherwife a man cannot give any great praise to minerall works, the which are wrought by lewd Craffus riches, and ill disposed barbarous fellows kept in irons, and toiled to death in unwholesome and pestilent places. But being compared unto Crass buying of confiscate goods at Sylla's hands, and ungentlemanly bargains of houses on fire, or in danger thereof, surely Nicias trade will appear the better way of getting : for as openly did Craffus avow usury, as tillage, And again for other faults, wherewith Craffus many times was burthen-matters before the Senate at ROME, to win favour for their fide: and that he preferred matters to the prejudice of the confederates of the ROMANS, onely for his private profit; and therefore curried favour with Ladies, and generally fought to cloak all foul offenders : of all these faults was Nicias never so much as once suspected. For he to the contrary, was mocked of every body. because for fear he maintained wicked doers by gifts: which perhaps would not have become Pericles nor Aristides, and yet was meet for Nicias, who was born a timorous natured man, and never had Lyourgus saycourage in him. Whereof Lycargus the Orator did vaunt afterwards to the people, being accused ing. that he redeemed detractors with money: I am glad, faid he, that having dealt thus long in affairs of the State, it is found I have rather given then taken. And now touching expences, Nicias was thought the better and more civil Citizen. For his charge and cost was, in dedicating some goodly image to the gods, or in making of publick playes or pastimes to recreate the people. But all the money he spent that way, and all that he was worth besides, was nothing comparable, and but a small part of that Craffus bestowed in an open feast he made at ROME, feasting so many thousands at one time, and did find and maintain them also for a certain time after. Now I cannot but wonder at those men, that deny vice to be an inequality and disagreement of manners, repugnant in it felf, seeing Nicial and men may honeftly spend that which is naughtily gotten. Thus much for their goods. For Nicias Crassus acts in doings in the Common-weal he did nothing maliciously, cruelly, nor unjustly, neither any thing of the Commonfelf-will or stomack, but rather dealt plainly and simply. For he was deceived by trusting of Al- wealth cibiades, and never came to speak before the people, but with great fear. Crassum on the other fide was reproved for his inconstancy and lightness, for that he would easily change friends or enemies: and he himself denied not, that he came to be Consult the second time by plain force and cruelty, having hired two murtherers to kill (ato and Domitius. And in the Affembly the people held for dividing of the Provinces, many men were hurt, and four were flain in the Market-place: and more then that, Craffus himself (which we have forgotten to write in his life) gave one Lucius Annalius to fore a blow on the face with his fift, for speaking against him, that he sent him going with blood about his ears. But as Craffus in those things was very fierce and cruel: so Wieias womanish behaviour on the other side, and faint heart in matters of Common-wealth, humbling himfelf to the meanest and most vile persons, deserved great reproach. Where Crasus in this respect The duty of shewed himself affuredly of a noble mind, not contending with men of small account, as with Clean Governors and or Hyperbolus, but would give no place to Cafars fame and glory, nor yet to Pompey's three Tri- Magistrates.

For doubtless, concerning his defire to make peace, it was a godly mind in him, and an act worthy of a noble person, to bring that to pass he did, appearing goury mind in min, and a certainly was not to be compared to him, though he had joyned all the Provinces to the Empire of ROME, that reach unto the Cafpian fea, and to the great Ocean of the Provinces to the entry fide also when one hath to deal with people that can differ when a man ruleth according to equity and juffice, and that he feeth he is in the prime of his credit and anthority he must not then for lack of courage suffer wicked men to step in his room, nor give occasion to prefer such to authority in the Commonweal, as are unworthy for that place and councasion to prefer such to authority in the Commonweal, tenance: neither thould allow such any credit; as are altogether of no credit nor trust, as Nicies did: who was the onely occasion that Gleon, being before but a practing Orator, was chosen General. Neither do I alfo commend Crassus, forthat in the war against Spartacus; he made, haftero give him battell, more railily then fairly or confiderately. For his ambition spurred him forward, because he was airaid left Pompey coming should take from him the glory of all that he had done in that war: as Mumming took from Merellus the honour of the winning of CORINTH. But befides all this, Nicias fact therein was without the compass of reason, and can no way be excused. For he did not relign his honour and office of Generall to Clean his enemy, when there was hope of good freeces, or little perill ; but fearing the danger of the journey, he was contented to fave one, and took no or name perm ; our rearing increasing a me pouncy, in was contented to save one, and took to care befides for the Common-wealth. Which Them fooles, shewed not, in the time of the waragainst the Persians. For he, to keep Epyride an Orator (a man of no reckoning beside his cloguence, and extreamly coverous) from being chosen Generall of ATHENS, left he should have overthrown the Common-weal: fecretly brited him with money to leave off his fuit. And Cato also when he saw the state of ROME in greatest danger, sued to be Tribune of the people for the Commonwealths fake. And Nicias in contrary manner, referving himfelf to make war with the City of Mi-NOA, or with the Ille of CITHERA, or with the poor unfortunate MELIANS, if there fell out afterwards occasion to fight against the LACEDEMONIANS, then away went his Captains cloak, and he left the ships, the Army and munition to the charge and government of Cleons rashness and fmall experience of war, when the necessity of the service required the wifest and most expert Caprain. The which he did not, defpifing the means to make him honoured: but it was a plain drawing back, at time of need to defend his Countrey. Wherefore afterwards he was compelled against his will to be General, to make wars in SICILIA with the SYRACUSIANS: because the people thought he was not so carnest to distingue the journey, for that he thought it not meet for the Commonwealth, but because through his sloth and cowardliness he would make his Countrey lose so good weath, purpocaute infought his north and cowardiness he would make his country for to good an opportunity to conquer Stc1LE. Yet was this a great reftimony of his honefty and truft they had in him: who though he ever hared war, and did flie from the Offices of honour and charge in the Common-wealth, his Countrimen notwithfranding did always chufe him, as the most experienced Nicis honesty person and meetest man of the City. Now Crasses in contrary manner, desiring nothing else but to be Generall, could never attain to it, but in the war of the bondmen, and yet was it for lack of another (for Pompey, Metellus, and both the Lucullus were then abroad in the wars) although he was otherwise of great estimation and authority. Howbeit it feemeth to me, that his friends that loved him best, thought him, as the comicall Poet faith:

His ambition notwithstanding, and covettious desire of rule, did nothing benefit the ROMANS. For the ATHENIANS fent Nicias to the war against his will: but Crassu led the ROMANS thither against their wills. So that the Common-wealthfell into mitery by the one, and the other through the Common-wealth was brought into mifery; and yet therein there is rather cause to praise Nicias, then to blame Craiss. For Nicias like a wife man, and a Captain of great experience, could never fo much as be brought to think they should conquer Sicile; and therefore diffwaded his Countrimen from the journey: and would give no place to the vain hope of the people of ATHENS. But Craffus taking upon him to, make wars with the PARTHIANS, as though it had been an easie matter to overcome them, found himfelf deceived, yet did he afpire to great things. For as Inline Cafar had conquered and lubdued to the imperiall Crown of ROME, all the Countries of the West parts, to fay, the GAULS, the GERMAINS, and ENGLAND: even fo did Crafius desire to go towards the East parts, to conquer all to the great West sea of the INDIANS, and to subdue all the Regions of Asia, whereunto Pompey and Lucullin aspired, being both very noble personages, and fuch as ever courteoully behaved themselves to all men: notwithstanding, provoked thereunto with the like desire that Crassus had. For when the charge of the wars in the East parts was as figned to Pompey by decree and order of the people, the Senate utterly milliked it, and were against is all they could. When news were brought to ROME that Julius Cafar in battell had overthrown and flain three hundred thouland Germains, Lato perfusading with the Senate, was yet fill of this mind, that Lafar should be delivered into the hands of his enemies whom he had overcome, for this mind, that Lafar should be delivered into the hands of his enemies whom he had overcome, for to be punished: thereby to turn the sharp revenge and wrath of the gods from ROME, upon him onely that was the unjust breaker of peace. This norwithstanding, the people making none account mon feaffs and processions fifteen days together, and open sacrifices the City, to thank them for this famous victory. How glad flow ten, and how many days would they have feafted and facrifrom BABYLON of his Victory, and that he had conquered all the Realms of the MEDES, of the PERSIANS, of the HYRCANIAMS, of Syse and of the BACTRIANS, and that he had made new Governments and Provinces to the Empire of Rome?

If a man will needs do wrong and injuffice,

As Entypides faith to them that cannot live in peace, and be contented with their own, he must not then flick at trifles (as the razing of a Caftle of Scandia, or of a City of Menda, or chafing of the ÆGINETES being out of their own naturall Countrey, and hiding themselves like birds without nefts, in any other birds holes) but must dearly sell the wrong he doth, and not lightly contemn justice, as a thing of small account. For they that will commend the intent of Alexander the Great in his voyage, for the conquests he made in the East, and do dispraise Crassus voyage, do not well to judge of the beginning, by the events and fuccess of the end. For executing of their offices, Niciae did many noble exploits: for he overthrew his enemies in diverse battels, and had al- Niciae after most taken the City of Syracusa: and sure they cannot justly blame him for all the misfortunes commended; that chanced in the war of SICILIA, but partly the plague was cause of it, and partly also the envy of those towards him that remained at ATHENS. Whereas Crassus ran into so many errors, envy or more constrained such foul parts in all his voyage, that he gave Fortune no leifure to do him good: fo craffiar by his that I wonder not fo much that his folly was overcome by the power of the PARTHIANS, as that folly blemified it could overcome the good fortune of the ROMANS. Sithence it fo falleth out then, that they both the happiness came to like unfortunate end. Nicias prognosticating before what things should happen, by art and of the Romans rule of Divination; and Crassus contrarily disdaining to observe anything; sure it falleth out hard in judgement, which of them two proceeded with most safety. Yea according to the best approved opinions, a fault committed of fear is more exculable, then of rashness and folly to break any ancient Law or Cuftom. For their deaths, Craffes end deserved least reproach. For he against his Craffes death will did yeeld himself, and was neither bound nor mocked, but onely perfuaded by his friends, and more com. through his enemies fraud and treaton most traiteroully deceived: where Nicias cowardly and disho-Nicias end nourably hoping to fave his life, trufting to the mercy of his enemies, made his death more

THE LIFE OF SERTORIUS.

Ann. Mund. 3877.

Ant. Christ.

Eradventure it is not to be marvelled at, if in long process of time (Fortune altering her effects daily) these worldly events fall often out one like another. For whether it be that the variety of things are infinite, fortune hath store of matter apt enough to work to likeness: or be it that worldly mattets to be comprehended within determinate number, of necessity one thing must fall out like another, fince they proceed from one cause, tyed to the fame means it before did use. But because men do delight to compare fuch chances together, as they have feen or heard to have happened fo like as if they had been done of purpole, the one by example of the other, as that of two men being both named Attis, both of them come of Noble houses, the one in Syria, and the other in Arcadia, both the one and the other were slain with a wild bore. That of two called Altaon, the one was torn in pieces by his dogs, the other by his lovers. That of two famous Scipio's, the CARTHAGINIANS were first overcome by the one, and afterward utterly destroyed by the other. That the City of TROY was first taken by Hercules, for the horses that Laomedon had promised him; the second time by Agamemnon by means of the great woodden horse: and the third time by Charistemus, by means of a horse that fell within the gate, and kept the TROIANS that they could not shut it in time. And that of two sweet smelling plants, 10s, and SMYRNA, two Cities were named, the one fignifying the Violet, and the other Myrre: it is supposed that the Poet Homer was born in the one, and that he died in the other. We may also add to this example, that amongst the ancient Captains, the greatest warriers (and that have done the noblest exploits by wit and warlike stratagems) had but one eye: as Philip , Antigonus , Hannibal; and Serterise also, whom we write of at this present. Whom we may truely report to have been more chast than Philip:more faithfull to his friend than Antigonus; more courteous to his enemies than Hannibal: and for wisdom and judgement to give place to none of them, but in good fortune to them all. The which, though the shewed her spite more to him, then to his enemies that were all great men : yet in experience he was equall with Metellue, in prowels and valiancy with Pompy, and in fortune with Sylla. So that being banished his Countrey, a stranger in another Realm, and having to govern a barbarous Nation, he notwithflanding maintained wars for a time, against the power of the ROMANS. Methinks therefore, that of all the GRECIAN Captains I can liken none to well unto him as Eumenes the CARDIAN. For both of them knew how to command, both were very valiant and politick in wars, both were banished men out of their Countrey, both were Captains over strangers, and both of them were traiteroully and villanously slain by them, through whom they had before overcome their enemies. Now for Sertorim, he came of worshipfull

His father left The parentage hime try child with his Mother, who carefully brought him up, and whom he fingularly loved and of Sectionias. reverenced. Her name as they say was Rhea. His first rising and beginning grew by pleading mat- Rhea the moters in Law, which he could handle very well: infomuch as being a young man he came to ROME, ther of Serioand wan fome name by his eloquence. Howbeit, the honour and estimation he archieved afterstate and wan fome name by his eloquence. Howbeit the honour and estimation he archieved afterstate wards by his valiant acts, made him imploy all his study and ambitious care, to Arms and Wars, quent. The first time of his Souldierfare was, when the CIMBRES and TEUTONS invaded GAUL with Sectoring first a mighty Army: where when the ROMANS had been overcome under the leading of Capio, his fouldietfare. Horse being slain under him, and himself hart, he notwithstanding swam over the River of RONE, with his Corflet and Target upon him , breaking the fury and rage of the River with meer strength, fo able and lufty a body he had to brook all pains and hardness. The second time that these barbarous CIMBRES returned with an infinite number of fighting men, and with proud and dreadfull threats, the ROMANS were then so afraid, that they thought him a stout man that had but the courage to keep his rank, and obey his Captains. At that time was Marius Generall of the ROMAN Army, and then did S. rtorius undertake to go and discover the Enemies Camp. And for the purpose, appa- Sertorius foulrelled himself like a GAUL, and learned the common words and phrases of their Language, to salute dierfare under one another when they met, and in this fort went among them : and having partly by fight and report learned that he fought for , he returned to Marin, who then gave him such honourable reward as was due to his desert. All the time of the War after, he did such valiant acts and deeds of Arms, that his Captain had him in great estimation, and committed the chiefest matters to his charge. Whereupon the Wars being ended with the TEUTONS and CIMBRES, Seriorius was fent into SPAIN , under Didius the Prator , with charge of a thousand Footmen , with whom he wintred Sectorine Coin the City of CASTULO, in the Marches of the CELTIBERIANS; where the Souldiers finding lonel of a thouplenty of Victuals, fell to gluttony and drunkennels, and committed great infolency, being over- fand footmen, come with Wine. Infomuch as the barbarous People of the City grew to fuch a milliking and difdain Caffino a City of them, that they fent one night to their next neighbours the Gyrlsenians for aid, and as rians. they came by the ROMANS lodging flew a great number of them. Sertorius hearing the noise, went immediately out of the City with a few of his men, and gathering them together also that fled one after another to fave themselves, went round about the Walls of the City, and finding the Gate open were the GYRISENIANS came in , there entred he alfo : who being more carefull then they had shewed themselves, left the Gates and all the parts of the City well guarded, and then put all to the Sword within that were of age to carry Weapon. Now when he had executed this revenge, he gertorius fluscommanded all his Souldiers to leave off their own Apparell and Weapons, and to take those of the tagem. barbarous People whom they had flain, and to follow him to the City of the GYRISENIANS. from whence they came that had on such a sudden affailed them in the night. The GYRISENIANS feeing the Garments and Weapons of their supposed men far off, thinking certainly the had been they, opened their Gates, and a number of People went out, as to meet their triends and Citizens, whom they thought had happily fped of their purpole. Thus were a marvellous number of them flain by the ROMANS, even hard at the Gates of their City; and the rest putting themselves to Sertorius mercy, he fold for Slaves. After this exploit, Sertorius wan great fame through all SPAIN, and returning to ROME, was made Quarftor or Treasurer Generall of GAUL, on this side of the Mountains, by the River of Po. A happy chance for ROME: for even at that very present time Sertorius treafell out the Wars of the Confederates and Allies of ITALY , called the MARSIANS War, in furer Generall fell out the Wars of the Confederates and Allies of ITALY; cannot the MARSIANS Wal, ill of Gaul about the which he had Commission to press Souldiers, and to make Armour. And therein he shewed such the Po. diligence and expedition for quick dispatch of that service, in respect of the long delay and careless regard other young men had of the same before that he won the name to be a carefull man of his charge, and one that afterwards would atchieve great Enterprises. Furthermore, when he came to be a Captain himself, he would not let to venture his person as valiantly as any other private Souldier whatfoever, but did marvellous acts with his own hands, even in greatest perils and conflicts: infomuch as at the length he lost one of his eyes in fight. Whereof he was nothing ashamed, but continually gloried in it: for others, said he, do not always carry the marks about them of their valiant Service, but leave them otherwhiles at home, as their Chaines, Carcanets, Sertorius ioli Javelins, and Crowns, given them by their Captains for testimony of their valiancy: how- one of his eyes beit that he always carried the marks about him (wherefoever he went) of his fervice, fo that by fight fuch as faw the blemith of his eye, did therewithall witness his valiantness and courage. The People also did honour him as became them. For when he came into the Theater, they welcomed him with clapping of their hands, and great praises, which the ROMANS did scantly use unto their oldest Captains, and which were most honoured for their great and noble Service. Nevertheless, when he sued to be Tribune, he was rejected by Sylla's practise, who himdred him: whereupon grew as it feened, that grudge and malice which he ever after bare unto dred him: whereupon grew as it feemed, that grudge and malice which he ever after bare unto The occasion SJ/la. For after that Marina was fled being overcome by SJ/la, and that SJ/la was gone out of sertorius of ITALY to make War with Mithrigates, and that of the two Confulls, Offavius took part malice unto with Sylla, and Cinna the other Confull (which fought change and alteration) was gathering sylla. men together to fet up Marius Faction , that was in manner underfoot : Sertorius took his part , because he faw that Offwim was but a flow and lither man; and did not besides trust any Sertorins rook of Marine friends. So was there a cruell conflict between them, even in the Market-place with part with Cinin the City felf , where Ottavine had the upper hand ; and Cinna and Sectorine scaped by flying, having loft few lefs then ten thouland men in this onely overthrow. through practice and policy, they got those Souldiers together again that were dispersed and through Practice and pointy, they got time they made their power equal with Ottavins force. Mathere through ITALY, so as in short time they made their power equal with Ottavins force. Mathere through ITALY, there through 11 ALI, to as in lives that the sea incontinently, and returned into IT ALY out of rins also being advertised of the same, took the Sea incontinently, and returned into IT ALY out of AFRICK, and came to Cinnato ferve as a private Souldier, under his Captain and Confull. Now they all liked well, that Marins should be received, saving Sertorius, who was against him all he could: fearing that either his credit and estimation should diminish, Ginna having a worthier Captain then rearing that enter its seem and standard requesting (who pardoned none offence) would binafelf to ferve him; or elfe that Marias cruelty and feverity (who pardoned none offence) would maren to reversing, or fray in his anger, but bent utterly to all kind of cruelty to his Enemies, and anogenes, many many and thereunto he added this further: that now they had the Victory in manner in their hands, if they once received Marins unto them, he would rob them of all the honour of ending this War, and being also in Authority, he was neither to be trusted nor commanded. Whereunto Cinna answered thus: that he thought the words he had alledged to be true, howbeit that he was ashamed, and besides, could not see with honesty how he might resuse Marins, or fend him back, fithence he had purpofely fent for him, to commit part of the charge of these Wars unto him. Sectorius again replied: Sure I thought Marius had come of his own good will unfent for, and therefore (2s for the best in mine own opinion) I gave advice not to receive him: but sithence it is so that you sent for him before, and that he is now come upon your commandment, you were much to blame to ask countell whether you should now receive him, or not. And therefore you must needs accept his fervice that is come upon your word: for, the bond of your pronife paft you, doth now cut off all counfell or other resolution. Thereupon Mariss was called for : and when he came, they divided their whole Army into three parts, and then began to charge upon their Enemies of all hands, to as they obtained victory. Howbeit Cinna and Macharge upon their enemies of an inance, to as they obtained victory. Flowbert command the rine committed as horrible cruelty in this Victory, as could possibly be shewed: informed as the ROMAN'S thought all the miscries they had endured in time of this War nothing, and but a play as it were, in respect of the great calamities they sell into afterwards. Now Sertorius on the other fide never caused man to be slain for any private malice, or quarrell he had with any perfon, neither did he hurt any man when he had overcome, but was much offended with Marins infolency and cruell murthers: and when he had good opportunity to fpeak with Cinna apart, he did qualifie him the best he could, and made him more mild and tractable through his perswasson. In fine, Sertorius seeing Marius guarded with a great number of Bondmen for lack of other Souldiers in this War, whom he used as Executioners of his flaughter and butchery, always attending about his person as a Guard, and suffering them also to make themselves rich, Sertoriut tempartly with that he gave them, or commanded them to spoil, and partly also with that they violently took without his commandment of their own Mafters, killing them when they had done, ravithing their Mistresses, and defiling their Children: he could no longer abide such wickedness and villany, but made them all to be flain in their Camp where they lay together, being no less then four thousand persons. Afterwards when he saw that the elder Marius was dead, and that soon after Cinna was slain, the younger Marins his Son (against his counsell, and contrary to the Laws of ROME) had by force made himfelf Confull: and that Carbo, Scipio, and Norbanus (which had been overcome by 5) la) were come out of Greece to Rome-wards, partly through the cowardliness of their Captains, and partly also because they were betrayed and fold of their own men: and further, confidering therewithall, that his person could do no good in those Affairs, which waxed worse and worse, by means of the Authority of such as had leaft wit and understanding, and specially also seeing Sylla camp hard by Scipio, making much of him, and feeding him with hope of a good Peace, whilft underland he wan his Souldiers from him, notwithfranding, that he was certainly warned and told of it before: Sertoriss then Servorius went utterly despairing of Romes prosperity and welfare, departed from Rome to go towards SPAIN, thinking that if he could get the first possession and Government of that Realm, it would at the leaft be a refuge and recept for all those of their Tribethat should chance to be banished out of their Countrey. Howbeit in his voyage thicherward, he met with foul and rough weather: and passing through a Countrey of Mountains, the barborous People inhabiting the same, demanded Tribute of him, for licence to pals through their Territories. Thereat the Souldiers of his Company were marvelloully offended, faying: That it were to much shame and dishonour for a Proconfull of ROME, to pay Tribute to vile barbarous People. Notwithstanding, Sertorise passed not for the shame they faid it would be to him, but answered them thus: That he bought time, which thing he should not reckon of , that afpired to haughty Enterprifes : and fo pleafed the barbarous People with Money. And thus he made fuch speed, as he quickly recovered SPAIN, which he found greatly replenifined with People, and specially of young men able to wear Armour. But now Sertering perceiving that they had been hardly dealt withall before, through the infolency, pride, and covetouines of the ROMAN Governours, whom they ordinarily tent from ROME, and that therefore they hated all manner of Government: first of all fought to win the good wills of all the whole Countreymen one and other. Of the Noblemen, by being familiar and converfant with them : and of the common People, by eafing them of their Tax and Subfidies. But that which bred him most love of all men generally, was this: that he dispensed with them for lodging of Souldiers, and receiving of any Garrifon within their Cities, compelling his Souldiers to fet up their Tents, and to make their

to be first set up, and lay in it himself in person. This notwithstanding, he pleased not these barbarous People in all things to win their favour: for he armed all the ROMAN Citizens of age to carry Weapon that dwelt in SPAIN, and made them make all forts of Engins for Battery, and a number of Galleys befides, fo that he had all the Cities at Commandment, being very courteous to them in matters of peace, but in warlike Munition very dreadfull unto his Enemies. After Sertorius underflood that Sylla kept ROME, and that the most part of the Tribe of Marius and Carbo was utterly overthrown, miftrufting that it would not be long before they fent some Captain with a great Army against him : he fent Julius Salinator betimes to keep the Mountains Pyrenei . with fix thousand men well armed. Immediately after Cuius Annius also came thither, sent by Sylla: who seeing no posfibility to diffres Salinator in a place of such advantage, was driven to stay at the foot of the Mountain, not knowing what to determine. But by misfortune one Calphurnius furnamed Lanarius, traiteroully flew Salinator: whereupon his Souldiers forthwith forfook the top of the Mountains, and by this means Annius had easie passage with his Army which was very great, and overthrew them that refifted his further coming on into the Countrey. Sertorius finding himself not strong enough sertorius slies to fight with him, marched away with three thousand men unto the City of New CARTHAGE, and out of Spain there took Sea: from thence he coasted over into Africk, and fell with the Coast of the Mau- into Africk. RUSIANS, where his Souldiers landed immediately for fresh water, dispersing themselves without keeping any order. Thereupon the barbarous People gave Charge upon them, and flew numbers of them; infomuch as Seriorius was driven to imbarque again, and to take his course towards SPAIN, where he was kept from landing. Then was he driven to take certain Pirates Boats of the SICILI-ANS, and to fail towards the Ille of PITYUSA, where he lauded in defpight of Annius Garrison, The Isle of and put them to diffress. But shortly after came Annius thither himself with a good number of Ships, and five thousand fighting men in them. Him Sertorius determined to abide, and to fight withall by Sea, though he had but fmall Barques, purposely made for swift failing, and of no strength for fight. But now the west wind rising very big, did swell the Sea in such fort, that it cast the most part of Sectorius Ships (being weak and very light) upon Rocks in the Sea, and himself with a few being kept from Land by his Enemies , and from the Sea by storm , was driven to ride ten days together at Anker, working still for life against the danger of the surging waves and boysterous winds, which continued rough all that time: yet in the end when it calmed again, he weighed Anker, and ran into certain desolate Isles, where was no water to be had. Then hoising Sail from thence, he pasfed the Straight of Gibraltar, and turning on his right hand, landed upon the Coast of SPAIN, lying toward the great Western Sea, a little above the mouth of the River of Bætis, the which falling into the Sea Atlanticum, gave name in old time to that part of SPAIN, which was called HI-SPANIA BETICA. There certain Sailers met with him that were newly arrived from the Isles of the Ocean Atlanticum, which the Ancients called the fortunate Islands. These two Islands are not The fortunate far one from another, being but a little arm of the Sea between them, and are from the Coast of Islands. AFRICK onely ten thousand Furlongs. They have rain there very seldom, howbeir a gentle wind commonly that bloweth in a little filver dew, which moistneth the Earth so finely, that it maketh it fertile and lufty, not onely to bring forth all that is fet or fowen upon it, but of it felf without mans hand, it beareth fo good fruit, as fufficiently maintaineth the Inhabitants dwelling upon it, living idly, and taking no pains. The weather is fair and pleafant continually, and never hurteth the body, the climate and feasons of the year are so temperate, and the air never extream : because the winds that blow upon that Land from the other fide of the Coast opposite to it, as the North and Eafterly wind coming from the Main, what with their long coming, and then by dispersing themselves into a wonderfull large air and great Sea, their strength is in manner spent and gone before their coming thither. And for the winds that blow from the Sea (as the South and westerly) they fometime bring little showers with them, which commonly do but moist the ground a little, and make the Earth bring forth all things very trimly : infomuch as the very barbarous People themselves do The Elysian faithfully believe, that there are the Elyfian Fields, the abode of bleffed creatures, which Homer hath Fields. so much spoken of. Sertorius hearing report of these Islands (upon a certain desire now to live quietly out of Tyranny and Wars) had straight a marvellous mind to go dwell there. But when the Pirates of SICILIA (who were no men of peace, but given altogether to spoil and pillage) heard that, they by and by forfook Sertorius, and went into Africk, to restore Ascalius the Son of Iphtha to his Realm of MAURITANIA again. Sectorius quailed not for all their departure from him, but determined to aid them that made War against Afcalius, and all to the end that his Souldiers feeing matter of new hope and means to be imployed, should not so leave him, as being forced to be discharged of very necessity. The MAURUSIANS being very glad of his arrivall, he presently went on with his Enterprise, overcame Ascalius in Battell, and besieged the City whereinto upon the overthrow of his Army he was fled for refuge. Sylla being advertifed thereof, fent Sertorius wan Paccanins thither with an Army to aid Ascalius. Sertorius gave him Battell, flew him in the Field, Tineis. and wan the rest of his Army, which yeelded unto him: then took he the City of TINGIS, where Anians Tomb into Ascalius was fled with his Brethren. The Ly BIANS write that Antaus is buried there. But Ser- and greatnets. torins giving no credit to the tales of the barbarous People of that Countrey, by reason of the greatness of the Tomb they shewed, made it to be broken open round: and finding there the body of a man (as they fay) of threefcore cubits long, he marvelled at it, and fo finishing his Sacrifice to honour the memory thereof, caused the Tomb to be well closed up again. By this act he did greatly Countreynens report of Antans. For the Tingians do report, that after Antans death, his Wife Tinga lay with Hercules, and had a goodly Son by him called Sophax, who was King of that Countrey, and there built this City, giving it his Mothers name. Furthermore, it is faid also that this Sophax had a Son called Diodorus, who conquered the most part of Africk with an Army of the GRÆCIANS, OLBIANIANS and MYCENIANS, which Hercules brought thither to inhabit those parts. We were willing to imbrace the occasion offered us to speak of this matter as we went, for the honour of Juba, the nobleft Historiographer that ever came of Royall bloud : for it is thought his Ancestors were lineally descended from Sophax and this Diodorus. Sertorics as Cona is mought his Ancertors were initially determined from soppose and this Disagras. Servers 38 Conqueror now, having the whole Countrey in fubjection, did in no wife hurt them that yeelded unto him, and put truft in him, but reftored them their Goods, Cities, and Government again, contenting himfelf with that they offered him of their good wills. But then ftanding doubtfull what way to detertent tor by the mine, the Lusitanians fent Ambassidours unto him, to intrear him to be their Chiestain: for Lusitanian to Lupraniant to their Cap- they flood in great need of a worthy personage, and a man expert in Wars to defend them against the fury of the ROMANS: and therefore they onely trusted him, hearing of his honourable behaviour, by them that were conversant with him. Whose qualities as we find written, were these. He was netoes and quali- ver greatly moved, with fear nor joy: but as he was a resolute man without fear in most danger, fo was he most temperate in greatest prosperity. In valiantness inferiour to no Captain of his time, and very quick of execution in every imminent danger. For where any prefent exploit was to be done, any ftrong place of advantage to lodge or fight in to be taken, or that he was to pass over any River, or scape any instant danger, where it stood upon speedy execution, and to shew some strata-Settorius boun- gem or policy in time and place to supplant the Enemy: in those matters he passingly excelled, Furty and clemen- thermore, he was both bountifull in rewarding good service, and mercifull in punishing of offenders: but this notwithfranding, the foul murder he did in his latter days upon certain young children that were Pledges with him (which doubtless was an act of great cruelty, and anger that could not forgive) doth manifestly prove, that he was neither mercitual nor courteous of nature: but that he many times did finely counterfeit it, when both the time and occasion did so require it. But for mine opinion, fure I am perfwaded that no misfortune can have power to make perfect Vertue grounded upon good Reason, to work in any fort contrary to it felf: neither do I think it impossible also, but that mens good wills and gentle natures being injured without caufe, may peradventure change their naturall dispositions. Which then proved true in Sertorius, who finding Fortune contrary unto him, and his good hap changed into ill, grew fo crabbed and fierce of nature, that he would take cruell revenge of them which had villanously betrayed him. But now to our matter where we left. Sertorius departed out of AFRICK upon the LUSITANIANS offer, who chose him for their Generall, giving him absolute Power and Authority: and so soon as he arrived, he straight leavied men of War, and with them subdued the People of SPAIN fronting upon their Marches, of which the more part did willingly submit themselves, upon the brute that ran of him to be mercifull and courteous, and a valiant man belides in present danger. Furthermore he lacked no fine devices and subtilities to win their good wills: as among others, the policy and device he Scripting feign. had of the Hind; which was this. There was a poor man of the Countrey called Spanns, who meeting by chance one day with a Hind in his way that had newly calved, flying from the Hunters, he let the Dam go, not being able to take her: and running after her Call took it, which was a young Hind, and of a strange Hair, for she was all milk white. It chanced so, that Sertorius was at that time in those parts, who was always very glad when any man offered him their manner of Prefents: as Fruits, Fowl, or Venison, and would make very much of them that brough them to him, and also reward them well for the fame. So, this poor man presented Sertorine with this young Hind, which he gladly received, and which with time he made fo tame, that fhe would come to him when he called her, and follow him where ever he went, being nothing the wilder for the daily fight of fuch a number of armed Souldiers together as they were, nor yet afraid of the noife and tumult of the Camp. Infomuch as Sertorins by little and little made it a miracle, making the simple barbarous People believe that it was a gift that Diana had fent him, by the which she made him understand of many and fundry things to come: knowing well enough of himself, that the barbarous People were men eafily deceived, and quickly caught by any subtill superstition, besides that, by Art also he brought them to believe it as a thing very true. For when he had any fecret intelligence given him, that the Enemies would invade fome part of the Countreys and Provinces subject unto him, or that they had taken any of his forts from him by any intelligence or sudden attempt, he straight told them that his Hind spake to him as he slept, and had warned him both to arm his men, and put himfelf in strength. In like manner if he had heard any news that one of his Lieutenants had won a Battell , or that he had any advantage of his Encmics, he would hide the Messenger, and bring his Hind abroad with a Garland and Coller of Nolegayes: and then fay, it was a token of some good news coming towards him, perswading them withall to be of good chear; and so did facrifice to the gods, to give them thanks for the good tidings he should hear before it were long. Thus by putting this superfittion into their heads, he made them the more tractable and obedient to his will, infomuch as they thought they were not now governed any more by a stranger wifer than themselves, but were stedfastly perswaded that they were rather led by some certain god; and so much the more,

SERTORIUS.

For with two thousand and five hundred Souldiers, which he called Sectorius Ar-ROMANS (although the most of them indeed were Africans, which came over with him my. out of AFRICK into SPAIN) and four thousand Lucitanians, with seven hundred Horsemen also, he made War against four great Captains of ROME, which had the leading of fixfcore thousand Footmen, two thousand Archers and Sling-men, with a world of Cities and

And Metillus felf, being taken at that time for one of the most expert men of War, and thiefelt Captains among the ROMANS: him he put also so oft to diffress, that Lucim Lollin was fain to come out of Gaule NARBONENSIS (now Languedock) to his aid. And they were furthermore driven to fend Pompey the Great with all speed from ROME with a new Army , becaufe Metellus knewnor what course to take, having to fight with a most valiant man, and one whom he could hever either bring to any fet Battell , nor yet intrap in the plain Field (fo eafily nor to be a great bibber, when he was at most quiet, and out of Wars; he was likewise acquainted with pains and hardness from his youth, could away with long Journeys, watch many days and sertorius warnights without sleep, eat little; and content himself with any meat that came to hand. And had like vertues, henever fo little leifure, he would continually be on Horfe-back, riding a hunting up and down the Fields, which made him very ready and respect to know how to wind himself out of danger when he was diffressed, and contrarily also to compass in his Enemy upon any advantage: and besides, to fee where he might enter, and where not ... For this cause was Metellus driven (who was still defirous to fight) to abide the loffes and discommodities which they fuffer that be vanquished : and Sertorius on the other fide refusing Battell, and flying before him, had all the vantage of him that they have which chale their Enemies whom they have overcome. For he cut off his Victuals on every fide, took away his water, and kept him in from foraging. When he thought to march further forward , Sertorius stayed him : and when he lay still in his Camp , Sertorius came and gave him Alarms, and drave him to dillodge. If Metellus laid Siege to any place, Sertorius straight besteged him for want of Victuals : fo that his fouldiers were even weary of all together. Whereupon, when Servoring challenged the Combate of Metellus: Oh, well faid, cried all the Souldiers, let Cap- Metellus oratain fight against Captain, and ROMAN against ROMAN. Howbeit Metelliu refused him, fissent o be-

Furthermore, Metellus confidering that the Langobritas (who gave aid unto Ser- City for the Suburbs about it, hoping thereby to make the City yeeld unto him within two days at the utmoft, he commanded his Souldiers to victuall themselves for five days onely. But Sertorius having intelli- sertorius finely gence thereof; gave good direction and speedy order to prevent him. For he caused two thousand deceived Me-should cause them forthwith to put out all their idle People, that the water might last them the longer which defended the City. Metellus receiving advertisement thereof, was much agrieved withall, because his Souldiers Victuals were well near spent, which they had brought according to his commandment; and therefore he fent Aquinus one of his Lieutenants, with fix thousand men to get

Victuals. Servorius having intelligence of his purpose, presently laid an Ambush for his return in a Valley full of wood, and bestowed there three thousand mento set upon the Rereward, whilest he Seriorius overhimself gave Charge on the Vaward. and took the rest Prisoners. Howbeit Aquinum self the Captain, having lost his Weapons and Horse, by flying recovered Metallus Camp; who thereupon was driven with shame to raise his Siege, being mocked of all the SPANIARDS. For these valiant deeds was Sertorism wonderfully beloved and honoured of all the barbarous People, and specially because he had made them good octover and nonource of an incommercial state of the stat after the ROMAN fathion, to keep their Ranks when they fought, to follow their Enfign, and to take the fignall and Word of the Battell; infomuch as he made them then appear a goodly Army well taught and trained, being before a confused multitude of Therees and Robbers. Furthermore he divided great store of Gold and Silver among them, shewing them how they should gild their Head-pieces, fer out their Shields and Targets with fine Workmanlhip, and also bravely apparell themselves with rich Clokes, and sleeveles Cassocks upon their Armour, teaching them to be fine, and furnished them with Money, whereby he marvellously wan the hearts of the barbarous People. Yet did he farther bind them unto him, by that he did unto their Children: for he fent generally for all the Noblemens young Sons, through all the Countries and Provinces subject unto him, and brought them to the goodly City of Osca, where he provided them of Schoolmasters to teach them the Greek and Latine. Tongue: bearing their Parents in hand, that it was to no other end, but to make them (when they came to be men) meet to be imployed in the service of the Common-weal, albeit indeed it was but a fine device of him, to have them as Hoftages for their Faith and Loyalty towards him. Then were the Fathers of these Children glad men to see their Sons apparelled like ROMANS, in fair long Gowins garded with Purple, to go civilly to the Schools, that Sertorius payed for their Learning, and that oftentimes he went thinter to oppose them, to fee how they profited: and how he gave rewards unto them that were the best Scholars, hanging Jewels about their necks, which the ROMANS call Bulla. Infortuch as they having a Cuftom at that time in SPAIN, that such as were about the Prince or their Chieftain should die with him when he died: that Cuftom of voluntary Vow to die with their Lord, being called by the barbarous People, Devotion, there were very few of their Followers and Familiars that would vow to die with other Captains; but on the other fide, thousands commonly followed Serterim, having vowed to lofe their lives with him. And for proof hereof it is reported, that when his Army on a time was overthrown by a certain City of Spain, the Enemies eagerly purfuing him, the Spa-The spaniards NIARD's not regarding their own-lives to fave his, took him upon their shoulders, and so passed love to Scatteria, him from man to man upon them kill they pur him into the City, who being fafe and out of danger, they then looked by running to fave themselves the best they could. Thus was Seriorius not onely beloved of the Spaniards, but of other Souldiers also that came out of ITALY. For when Perpenna Vento, being of the same Faction, arrived in SPAIN full of Money, and with a good number of Souldiers, intending to make War in his behalf against Metellus, his Souldiers fell out with him, and had none other talk in his Camp but of Seriorins: the which spighted Perpenna to the heart, being proud and stately by means of his Wealth and Estate, coming of a noble House. News being come that Pempey was past over the mountains Pyrenei, the Souldiers armed themfelves , and plucked up their Enligns that decrefast in the ground , and cried out upon Perpensa to lead them to Sectoriss, threatning him that if he would not, they would leave him alone, and feek them a Captain that could both fave himself and them. So was Perpenna forced against his will to follow their minds, and to lead the three and fifty Enligns he had with him, to joyn with Sertorius Force. Thus became Sertorius Army very great, and specially after all the Cities on this side the River of Ebrus had yeelded unto him. For then came Souldiers to him out of all parts, howbeit they were a rath confuled multitude of Omnigatherum together, having no reason nor patience to abide time, but cried out in fury, to fet upon their Enemies. This troubled Sertorius much, feeking first to quiet them by reason and perswasion. But when he saw they sell to mutiny, and would needs have their wills, and both without reason and all good order would so go set upon their Enemies : he gave them the head, and let them go as they would, knowing well enough they would pay for their felly; but yet took such order and direction, as they should not utterly be cast away, hoping after that to have them the more obedient unto him. And indeed they had their payment as he conjectured: notwithflanding he went to rescue them, and so brought them sase into his Camp. Now to take away the fear and perplexity from them, which this Overthrow perhaps had ftricken into them, A fine device At which time he caufed two Horfes to be brought and fee in the middeft among them, the one an old of Seriorius to and feeble Jade, and the other a goodly lufty Horfe, which befides other things, had a marvelous teach men the bender of this fair thick toil Rabind the old long tade he far a better all Callent and behind the goodly Units benefit of time fair thick tail. Behind the old lean Jade, he fer a lufty tall Fellow: and behind the goodly Horfe and periver also, he placed a little wearish man, and seeming to sight to have but small strength. Now upon a fign clima them which he had made and seeming to sight to have but small strength. fign given them which he had made them privy to, the strong man took the lean Horse by the rail with all his might, as if he would have plackt it off by the flump: and the other wearing mental with all his might, as if he would have plackt it off by the flump: and the other wearing mental with all his might, as if he would have plackt it off by the flump: and the other wearing mental with all his might have been all the state of t and fivet a great while in vain at the leaf Horfe tail, thinking to have plucked it off, and in the end Sertorius words did nothing elfe but make the lookers on laugh: and that the wearifh wretch on the other fide in a Short Space (and at ease) had left the great Horse tail with never a hair on it : Sertoriss then rising diers, declaring up, spake in this fort to his Souldiers: Do ye not fee (my Friends and Companions) faith he, how time and perfeverance exceedeth force? and that things unlikely at the first to be overcome by force, are yet in time by little and little obtained ? For continuance overcometh all things, and there is no help to them that can take opportunity, and abide time: as in contrariwile hafte and raffinels is as dangerous an Enemy as may be to them that dothings of a head without regard. By these common devices wherewith Sertors and daily acquainted the barbarous People, he taught them to abide the opportunity of time. But of all the Stratagems he used in War, that onely exceeded all other, which he shewed unto a People called the CHARACITANIANS. The People do dwell on the other fide of the River of Tagus, and have neither Cities nor villages for their common abode, but onely agreat high Hill, full of hollow Caves and deep holes among the Rocks, looking towards the North. At the foot of this Mountain the Valley is a great flimy ground, and fo rotten, that it is not able The Characita. to bear a man, but being troden on, crummen like white lime, and turneth to dust under his feet. nians, what And therfore by means of the fame, when those People were afraid of any Enemies, or that they People they be. had conveyed the Goods they had robbed and ftolin from their Neighbours into those Caves, they thought themselves safe, if they were once gotten into them: for it was impossible to compell them to come out. Now it chanced that Sertorius Hying from Metellus, came and encamped hard by this Hill which these barbarous People inhabited, who made no reckoning of him, imagining Metellus had overthrown him. But Servorise, being in a rage with them, and because he would shew that be fled not, took his Horse-back the next morning, and rode as near to the Hill as he could to view the nature and fcituation of the place : and when he faw there was no way to bring a man into ir, he fretted, and walked up and down, vainly threatning them to no purpose. Yet going and coming to and fro, he perceived the wind raifed a great duft, of that brittle earth we have spoken of, and carried it full into the CHARACITANIANS holes , the mouths whereof , as we faid before , lay full upon the North. This Northern wind which some call Cacias, is the onely wind of all derfull device other that most keepeth in that quarter, and rifeth from the Moors and Mountains thereabouts, against the which be continually covered with snow, and then in the heat of Summer is nourished and inforced barbarous Peoby the melting of the ice and snow, and so bloweth a jolly cool wind, which refresheth the barba- pic called the rous People and Beafts all the day long. Sertorius marking this with himself, and understanding by the Inhabitants thereabouts, that this wind blew commonly among them : commanded his Souldiers to gather a great quantity of this light brittle earth together and to raile a mount of it, right against the other Hill. The barbarous People made a mockery of it at the first, thinking Sertorius would have made a Mount to have fought with them upon it howbeit he went on with his work till night came, and then brought his Souldiers back again into his Camp. The next morning by break of day there was a pretty little wind ftirring, that onely blew off the top of his forced Mount and the highest part of that mass of earth, as chass when they winnow Corn : and as the Sun began to have any power, the North wind also rose, which forthwith filled all the Hill with dust. And withall came Sertorius Souldiers, who threw down the hill to the bottom, which they had gathered the day before, and brake all thosedry clods of clay in pieces. The Horsemen on the other fide, they still managed their Horses up and down in it, to raise up the greater dust, which the wind carried as foon as it role, and blew into the Caves of these barbarous People, full in their faces, through their holes and rists of the Rocks. So they having no other vents nor air any way, but there where the wind blew upon them: it did so blindfold their eyes, and filled their Caves with such a hot fluffing air, that they were almost choaked withall, not able to take breath. For when they should draw their breaths, this stuffing air and dust came in at their mouths so fast, that they had much ado to hold out two days, and on the third yeelded themselves unto Sertorius mercy : the which thing did not so much increase his Power , as it wan him Honour ; by policy to have won such an unlikely Conquest, which by force could never have been gotten, and where to fight was a matter impossible. So long therefore as he made War with Merellus alone, he commonly had the advantage of him, because Metellus was an old man and heavy, and could not resist Sertorius lufty youth, that led a light Army, like rather to a company of Theeves and Robbers, than to an Sectorius deeds Army of men of War. But afterwards when Pompey was come over the Mountains Pyrenei, against Pomand that both of them were encamped each before other, and that Pompty had shewed him all the pey Stratagens and Policies of War politible for a good Captain to device, and he the like unto Pompey, and found that Serterise had the better of him, both in laying his Ambushes, and also in foreseeing to intrap him : then grew the same of Sertorius to be so great, that even in ROME it self he was thought to be the nobleft Captain, and of best conduction of any man in his time. Yet was Pompey at that time of great fame and reputation, which afterwards also waxed greater, by the noble acts

Scriptia wor la's young Scholars (for fo in mockery he called Pomps) that a wife Captain should rather see bethy laying of a hind then before him : and therewithall he shewed the Lauro NITANS five thousand Footment well armed, which he had left in his Camp when he Came to take the Hill were he was, to the end well armed, which he had ten mind saling which he facility they fhoold give a Charge upon his Rereward. Pom-that if Pompey came by chance to affail him; they fhoold give a Charge upon his Rereward. Pomper having found this too late, durft not offer Seriorius Battell', fearing to be compassed in behind: pry naving round this round to forfake the Lauronitans, whom he was driven in the end to fee utterly spoyled and destroyed before this eyes, and durst not once stir to help them, The barbarous People of the Country part feeing no hope of sid by him; yeelded fraight unto Sertorim, who did not onely pardon them, but also suffered them to go whither they would. How-Servorius, who amend one oney paraon men, our and inner one with the criefly of the City of or no anger or cruelty (being a Caprain that never flewed cruelty of the City of anger) but to fhame Pompey withall, and to ftop their mouths that made such account of him: and that this bruit might run among the bartarous People, that Pompty himself being present, and might in manner have warmed him by the fire that burnt a goodly City of his Confederates; neither durft nor could help them." Indeed Serteria in continuance of this War furtained much scriptus of himfelf invin- lofs and great hurt, howbeit it was always through the fault of his Lieutenants: for , astouching himself, he was never overthrown, nor those he led. And yet he ever wan more honour is recovering of those Battels which his Captains loft, then his Enemies did that had purthern to the worfe. As in the Battell he wan against Pompey, by the City of Sucron: and in another he worte. As it the Datien the wan against 1 amper, by the City of Tuttla. And as for the overshrows of wan against Pompey and Metellss both by the City of Tuttla. And as for the overshrows of wan against rompey and Acteums both by the City of 1111111. And as for the overstigner of Sucron, it is thought it came through Prompeys ambition, making the more hathefor-fear Additional Sucron, it is thought it came through Prompeys ambition, making the more hathefor-fear Additional Surveys and that was the thing Seriorist looked.

Battell betwire tellus should be partaker of the honour of his Victory: and that was the thing Seriorist looked. for , to fight before Metellus came to joyn with him , and therefore he fought the Battellwith Pompey towards night, supposing the darkness of the night would trouble his Enemies much, be a help to fave themselves if they were overcome, and also to chase the Enemies if it so happened they had the upperhand, because they were strangers and knew not the Countrey. When both Battels nad the uppernand, because they were trangers and knew not the Country. When both Battels came to give Charge, Sertorius at the first was not directly against Pompty, but against Afranius who led the left Wing of Pompty Battell, and himself was in the right Wing of his own Battell, Howbeit Sertorius being advertised that the left Wing of his own Army against which Pompty fought, was in fuch diffreds as they gave back; and could abide no longer; if they were not prefernly aided; the leading of the right Wing, which he affigned over to other of his Captains, and an initial all found and the leading of the right. ran with all speed possible unto the left Wing, which were then even as good as flying. And first he gathered them together again which had turned their backs, and after put those also in good order that were yet a fighting; and so having encouraged them, both with his words and the presence of his person, he gave a new Charge again upon Pomper, more couragiously then before, (who of his had already won the Field, was then a chasing such as fled) and came so fiercely upon thinking he had already won the Field, was then a chasing such as fled) and came so fiercely upon him, that he put all the whole Army of the ROMANS to flight, infomuch as Pompey himself him, that he put all the whole Army of the ROMANS to flight, infomuch as Pompey himself himself himself killing in the Field very hardly, being fore hurt, and faved by a strange mean. For the AFRICANS of Sertorius having taken Pompeys Horse (which was richly trapped with Harness of Gold and other precious Furniture) falling our among themselves, and fighting for devision of or Goid and other precious runnique, j taking out among inclinered, and informing and the the fame, in the mean time let Pompey 80, and never followed after him. Afranism again on the other fide, while the Sertorius was gone to help the other Wing of his Battell, made them all file that flood before him, and followed killing of them even into the Trenches of their Camp, entring in amongst them that fled, and spoiled the Camp, being dark night, knowing nothing of Pempers Overthrow, neither could be withdraw his men from spoyl. Seriorise also coming thither upon the inftant, finding Pompeys men in diforder, flew a number of them, and the next morning betimes armed his men again, and brought them out into the Field to fight once more with Pompey. But Seriorius mock receiving intelligence that Metellus was at hand, he founded the Retreat, and dislodged from the place he incamped, faying: Had not that old Woman come, I would have whipped that young Boy to ROME with rods. Now was Sertorius very heavie, that no man could tell him what was become of his white Hind: for thereby all his fubrilty and fineness to keep the barbarous People in obedience was taken away, and then specially when they stood in need of most comfort. But by good hap, certain of his Souldiers that had loft themselves in the night, met with the Hind in their way, and knowing her by her colour took her and brought her back again. Sirtorism hearing of her, promifed them a good reward, fo that they would tell no living creature that they brought her again, and thereupon made her to be fecretly kept. Then within a few days after, he came abroad among them, and with a pleafant countenance told the Noblemen and chief Captains of these barbarous People, how the gods had revealed to him in his Dream, that he should shortly have a marvellous good thing happen to him: and with these words fate down in his Chair to give audience. Whereupon they that kept the Hind not far from thence, did secretly let her go. The Hind being loofe, when she had spied Sertorius, ran straight to his Chair with great joy, and put her head betwire his legs, and layed her mouth in his right hand, as the before was wont to do. Sertorist also made very much of her, and of purpose appeared marvellous glad, shewing such tender affection to the Hind, as it feemed the water ftood in his eyes for joy. The barbarous People that stood there by and beheld the same, at the first were much amazed therewith, but asterwards when they had better bethought themselves, for joy they clapped their hands together, and waited upon Sertorius to his Lodging with great and joyfull shours, saying, and stediastly believing, that he was a heavenly creature, and beloved of the gods: whereupon they were marvelloufly pleafed in their minds, and certainly broped that their Affairs should prosper daily better and better. Another time having ftraightned his Enemies with fearcity of Victuals, in the Territory of the SAGUN-TINES, he was by force compelled to fight against his will, for that they fent great Troops of sertorius flow men to forrate the Countrey, to get Victuals. Upon the encounter it was valiantly fought of either Memmins, fide, where Memmin was flain, (the valiantest Captain Pompey had) couragiously fighting in Pompeys Lieuthe middeft of the Battell. Serrerins finding himlest the stronger, followed his first Wing, making tenant, great flaughter of those that withstood him, until he came unto Metallus felf, who tarried his coming, detending himself more valiantly then was either hoped or looked for in a man of his years: infomuelt as he was at the last burt with a Partizan. Which was such a dishonout to the ROMANS. not unto them onely that faw it, but unto fuch also as heard of it, that being all ashamed to for sake their Captain, and turning their shame into anger against their Enemies, they covered Mesellus Shame turned round about with their Shields and Targets, and getting him out of the press and fury of the Fight, into anger. gave fuch a fierce diffet, as they drave the SPANIARDS to flie. Thus fortune changing the Victory , Servorins to give his feattered men time to fave themselves, and leisure also for a new supply (which he caused to be presently leavied) to come at their pleasure, fled of purpose into a City of the Mountains of strong situation, and there setting a good sace of the matter, repaired the Rampiers and fortified the Gates, thinking nothing less then to abide there to be belieged, but onely to lay a bait for his Enemies, coming to befiege the City, hoping they should easily win it and in the mean time left pursuing of the barbarous People, which had thereby good leisure given them to fave themselves. Furthermore, they took no order to suppress the new supply that was coming to Section to slice. Sertorius, who had fent out his Captains to the next Cities and Shires adjoining to leavy men, with ged of Pomper; express commandment, that when they had mustered a convenient number together, they should fend them unto him, as they did. So when he understood of their coming, he easily passed through his Enemies to meet them, and with them fuddenly came back again, and harried his Enemies worse then before, sometime cutting their Victuals from them by Land, through his Ambushes and continual fubtill policies, being quickly in every place whither they thought to go, with his light Army; and on the Sea also with certain Pyrates Pinnaces, with the which he scoured all the Coast upon the Seafide. By this means both the Captains his Enemies were compelled to fever themselves far one from the other; infomuch as Metellus went to winter in GAULE, Pempey remained in SPAIN (in great fearcity of all things for lack of Money) to winter in the Territories of the VACCEI-ANS, and wrote to the Senate of ROME, that he would return with his Army into ITALY, if they lent him not Money out of hand, for that he had spent all his own, daily fighting for the defence of ITALY. Thus it was certainly thought at ROME that Sertorins would be in ITALY before Pompey, because he had through his valiancy and great skill brought two of the most famous Captains of their time to great extremity and diffress. Then did Metellus flew how much he fea-Metellus feated red Sertorius, and how he thought him a great and dreadfull Enemy. For he proclaimed by found Sertorius. of Trumpet, that if any ROMAN could kill him, he would give him a hundred Silver Talents, and twenty thousand Jugera of Land: and if he were a banished man, he promited he should be restored twenty moustain jugicities and the property of the base of the could not overcome by force. And furthermore, being his chance once to win a Battell of Servorine, he was fo jocond Metellus made and proud for this Victory, that he would needs therefore be called Imperator, to fay, Prince or himselfbe Soveraign Captain: and was contented the People thou'd fer up Altars and do Sacrifices unto called Imperahim in every City where he came. And it is furthermore reported of him, that he wore Garlands tor. of Flowers on his head, and would be bidden to diffoline Banquets, fitting at the Table in a triumphing Robe: and they made Images of Victory go up and down the Hall, moved by certain fecret Engins carrying Triumphs of Gold, and Crowns and Garlands of Triumph, and Dancers Metallus vaniof goodly young Boys and fair Girles following of them, with Songs of Triumph in his praise, ey. Wherein doubtless he deserved to be laughed at , shewing himself so much carried away with joy and vain glory, for one overthrow given unto him, whom himself was wont to call Sylla's fugitive, and the remnant of the banished men of Carbo. On the other side, Sertorius noble courage Sertorius noble was easily discerned: first, for that he called the banished men which were escaped from ROME. and come to him, Senators: and having them about him, called them the Senate, making fome of them Treaturers, others Prators, directing and ordering allthings according to the manner of his Countrey. And in this also, that making Wars with the Souldiers of the Cities of SPAIN, and defraying the same at their own charges, yet he never gave them any Authority, so much as in word, but ruled them always with ROMAN Officers and Captains: faying still, that he fought for the liberty of the People of Rome , and not to increase the glory and Power of the SPA-NIARDS, to the hitr and dishonour of the Romans. For to say truly of him, he ever lo- Sectionius hoved his Countrey well, and longed much to be fent for home again: and yet in his greatest trous nourable rebles, when things thwarted him most, then was his mind greatest, yeelding no manner of shew or spect unto his appearance to his Enemies, of any faint heart or discouragement in him. Again, when he was in Countrey. teft prosperity, and had most advantage of his Enemies, he sent unto Metellus and Pompey both, Sertorius mind letting them underständ, that for his part he was content to lay Armes aside, and to live at home greatest in adlike a private man, to that he might be lawfully reftored and called home by Edict : and that he servorius afficients had railier be counted the meanest Citizen in ROME, then being a banished man out of his Coun-ction to his trey, to be called Emperour of the World. SERTORIUS. 496 him destre so much to be called home again, was the tender love he bare unto his Mother (that had brought him up from the time of his Fathers death) upon whom he cast all his love and delight: infomuch as after that his friends in SPAIN had fent for him to come to be their Captain, and Scrietius naue that he had been a while among them, receiving news that his Mother was departed out of the Scrienting nature that the man been a winner among that he had almost died for forrow. together continually on the ground weeping, and never gave his Souldiers the Watch-word, nor would be feen of any of his friends: untill that the other Noblemen and Captains of his own estate, came to him to his Tent, and were so importunate of him by intreaty and perswasson, that they got him out of his Tent to shew himself to his Souldiers, to speak to them, and to take order for his Affaires, which prospered very well. By these signs many have judged, that he was of a courteous and pitifull nature, and that naturally he was given to be quiet and peaceable: howbeit, that he was forced of necessity to take charge of men of War, because he could not otherwife live quietly nor fafely, being purfued by his Enemies, which would never let him reft, and thereupon entred into War, for his own guard and fafety. The Treaty felf he made with king Muhridates, argued his noble mind. For when Mithridates whom Sylla had overcome was recovered again (like a Wrestler that being overthrown, getteth upon his feet to try another fall with his Enemy) and took upon him to invade Asia, Sertorius fame was then fo great, that he was spoken of through the World, by Merchants coming from the West, who blew abroad the report thereof all the East parts over, even into the Realm of PONT, like to Merchandizes which they went to feek for in strange Countries. Whereupon Mithridates being perswaded by the vain vaunts of his favoured Courtiers, who compared Sertorius to Hanniball, and himself unto King Pyrru, faying, that the ROMANS being fet upon by them both, could not withfland two such excellent natures, and great Powers together, when the noblest Captain of the World should be joyned with the greatest and most puissant Prince that ever was : sent thereupon his Ambassadours into Spain unto Sertorius, with full Power and Commission to promise him Money and Ships tofent Ambasta- wards the maintenance and charge of this War, in recompence whereof he desired that Sertorius would redeliver him the possession of Asia again, the which he had surrendred up unto the Ro-MANS upon the Peace made betwist him and Sylla. Sertorius hereupon called his Councell together (which he termed the Senate) to confult upon this matter. And when they were all of opinion that he should accept Mishridates offers, and were exceedingly glad of the same, considering that they asked them nothing but a Title in the air, and a name of things which were not in their power, offering them therefore things prefent, whereof they had greater need: yet would Seriori-Scriptiss noble 18 never agree thereunto. Notwithstanding, thus much he granted Mithridates, that he should enjoy Cappadocia and Bithynia, which had ever been Countries subject unto Kings, and whereunto the ROMANS had never any right: excepting this specially that he would never suffer

For he faid he would enlarge the Empire of ROME through his Victories, but not impair or hurt it by his Conquests. For a valiant man (faid he) should covet to conquer with honour, but in no wife defire life with dishonour. His Answer being reported unto King Mithridates, did much amaze him : and some have written, that he then said unto his familiars: What would Sertorius command us then, if he fate among them in the Senate at ROME, who being an exilenow, and remaining in the farthest part of the World by the Sea Atlanticum, doth take upon him to bound the certain Confines of our Kingdom, threatning usalfo with Wars, if we attempt any thing against Afia? All this notwithstanding, they were agreed upon Oaths taken between them, that Mithridates should enjoy the Countries of CAPPADOCIA and BITHYNIA, and that Sertorius should send him one of his Captains with aid of men of War; and that upon performance thereof, the King should give him the sum of three thousand Talents, M. Marius sent and forty Ships of War. So Sertorius sent thinher one of his Captains called Marcus Marius, unto Mithrida a Senator of Rome, who fled to him for fuccour: with whom Mithridates diffressed certain Cities of Asia. And when Marins entred into them, with his Serjeants carrying the bundles of Rods and Axes before him, as before a Proconfull of the ROMANS, Mishridates gave him the upper hand, as his better, and followed after him. Furthermore, Marius did fet certain Cities at liberty, and wrote unto others, declaring unto them, that Sertorism of his grace and goodness did reconfull, the up- leafe them of their Tax and Customs they paid : fo that poor Asia which had been oppressed by the coverousness of the Treasurers and Farmers of the ROMANS, and also by the pride and infolency of the Souldiers which lay in Garrison among them, began to have some hope of change, and to defire the alteration of Government, which Sertorius offered. But on the other fide, the Senators of Rome that were in Spain as banished men in Sectorius Army, and of the like dignity and estate that himself was of, they hearing say that all was well again at ROME, and perswading themselves that they should be strong enough for their Enemies, having no cause to sear any more danger, began then to envie Sertoriss greatness and Authority; but Perpenna specially among other, who by reason of his Nobility, being pust up with a vain presumption and ambitious selfother, who by reason of its recommy, being pure up what a task provided for make himself chief of all the Army, and to that end threw forth amongst his friends and familiars such kind of seditious words: "What curied fortune (quoth he) my friends "doth daily haunt us worfe then other, making us that were willing to obey Sylla (commanding at "this day both Land and Sea at his will) to choose rather to forfake our Lands and Countrey? And with fair words, calling us the Senate, whereat every man laugheth to hear us fo called: and in fine we must abide this dishonour to be at his commandment, and drudge and take as "much pains as the SPANIARDS and LUSITANIANS do themselves. Hereupon the more part of them being carried away with these mutinous words, durst not yet shew themselves in actuall rebeliion against Serverius, being afraid of his Authority: howbeit secretly underhand they overthrew his doings, by shewing extream cruelty unto the barbarous People, by pretext of Justice, imposing great payments upon them, giving out it was Sertorius commandment. By which their lewed practiles, many Cities revolted against him, and put themselves into his Enemies hands; and they daily also raised new mutinies and rebellions upon him. Furthermore those whom he fent to pacifie the tumults, did handle themselves in such fort, that where they should have quieted the grudges and rebellions of the People, they fet them farther out, and procured new tumults. Hereupon was Sertorius gentle nature and former goodness so altered, that he committed a most cruell act upon all the Noblemens children of that Land, which he brought up at Sectorius flew School in the City of Osca: for fome of them he put to death, and others he fold as Slaves, the Spaniards Thus Perpensa having many affociates in his wicked Conspiracy against Sertorius, brought into his Sons. This notwithstanding, departing thence, he went forthwith unto Perpinna, and told him how their practice was discovered, declaring further what danger they were in, if it were not speedily put in execution. All the Confederates agreed it was true that he faid, and thereupon they deviled this Treafon. Eumenes parentage.

How Eumenes came to preferment by the Kings of Masector.

Dris the Historiographer writeth, that Enmen's was born in the City of CARDIA in THRACIA, being a Carriers Son of the fame Countrey, who for poverty earned his living by carrying Merchandizes to and fro and that he was notwithstanding honestly brought up, as well at School, as at other comely exercises. And furthermore, how that he being but a Boy, Philip King of MACEDON chancing to come through the City of CARDIA, where having nothing to do, he took great pleafure to fee the young men of the City handle their Weapons, and boys to wreftle: and among them, Eumene: shewed such activity, and performed it with fo good a grace withall, that Philip liked the boy well, and took him away with him. But fure their report leemest truest, which write that Philip did advance him for the love he bare to his Father, in whose House he had lodged. After the death of Philip, Euments continued his service with King Alexander his Son, where he was thought a wife man, and as faithfull to his Mafter, as any: and though he was called the Chancellor or chief Secretary, yet the King did honour him as much as he did any other of his chiefest friends or familiars. For he was sent his Lieutenant Generall of his whole Army, against the INDIANS, and was Perdiceas Successor in the Government of his Province, Perdiccas being preserred unto Hepheficons charge after his death. Now because Neopt lamu (that was one of the chief Squires for the bedy unto the King) after the death of Alexander told the Lords of the Councell of MACEDON, that he had ferved the King with his Shield and Spear, and how Eumenes had followed with his Pen and Paper: the Lords laughed him to fcorn, knowing that befides many great honours Enmenes had received, the King effecmed to well of him, thathe did him the honour by Marriage to make him his Kinfman. For the first Lady that Alexander knew in Asia, was Barfine Artabazus Daughter, by whom he had a Son, and called his Name Hercules: and two of her Sifters, he married the one of them

Yet all Barkine the this notwithstanding, he often fell in differace with King Alexander, and stood in some danger by Wife of Exmeans of Hephastion. For Hephastion following Alexanders Court on a time, having appointed mener. Evisus Fife-player a lodging, which Eumenes Servants had taken up for their Mafter: Eumenes being in a rage, went with one Mentor unto Alexander, crying out, that a man were better be a Fife and a Common player of Tragedies, then a Souldier, fithence such kind of People were preferred before men of Service that ventured their lives in the Wars. Alexander at that prefent time was as angry as Eumenet, and roundly took up Hephastion for it : howbeit immediately after having changed his mind, he was much offended with Eumenes, because he thought him not to have used that frank speech so much against Hephastion, as of a certain presumptuous boldness towards himself. And at another time allo, when Alexander was sending Nearchus with his Army by Sea to clear the Coasts of the Ocean, it chanced the King was without Money: whereupon he sent to all his friends to take up Money in preft, and among others, unto Eumenes, of whom he requested three hundred Talents. Eumenes lent him but a hundred, and faid, he had much ado to get him fo much of all his Tenants. Alexander faid nothing to him, neither would he fuffer them to take his hundred Talents: but commanded his Officers to fet Eumenes Tent on fire, because he would take him tardy with a lie, before he could give order to carry away his Gold and Silver. Thus was his Tent burnt down to the ground, before they could make shift to save any thing : the which Alexander repented afterwards, and was forry it was burnt, because all his Letters and Writings were burnt withall. Howbeit, after the fire was quenched, they found in Niggots of Gold and Silver mingled together, about a thousand Talents, and yet Alexander took none of it away, but more then that, he sent unto all his Lieutenants, Captains, and Governours of Countries, wherefoever they were, that they should fend him Copies of all the Letters which they before had fent unto him, because all those which he had were burnt, and commanded Eumenes to take them again. After that, Eumenes and Hephastion fell at variance again, by reason of a Gift that was given him, insomuch as very foul words passed betwixt Hephestion and him: yet did not the King give Eumenes any ill countenance at that time. Notwith standing, shortly after Hephestion was dead, the King taking his death grievously whom he loved so dearly, gave no good countenance (and was very brief befides) unto those whom he knew bare any grudgeto Hephaftion whiles he lived, and that he thought were glad of his death, but specially unto Eumenes of all other, whose malice towards Hephastion was known to him well enough: infomuch as he would twit him withall, remembring him of the injuries he had offered Hephaltion. But Eumenes being very wife, and one that could take his time, procured his help by the feli-fame mean that did him hurt: and devised (to further Alexanders defire, feeking to honour Hephastions Funerall with all Pomp possible) new inventions to fee forth the same, of more magnificence then had before been feen, sparing for no cost, laying on Money bountifully, to make him a rich and stately Tomb. Again, when Alexander was dead, there fell out great variance betwirt the MACEDO-NIAN Footmen, and the Noblemen that had been nearest about him: and in that quarrell, Eumenes in good will fluck to the Lords, but in words he feemed a Neuter and Friend to both pasts, faying, It was not for him being a stranger to thrust himself into the quarrels of the MACEDONIANS. And when the other Lords were departed from BABYLON, Eumenes tarrying behind pacified the greatest part of the Souldiers, and made them more tractable and ready to agree with the Lords. Whereupon after the Lords and Captains had confulted together, and taken order for these contentions, they divided the Government of the Provinces among them, which they called Satrapes: in which partition Eumenes had CAPPADOCIA, PAPHLAGONIA, and all that Coast upon Mare Ponticum, Eumenes made unto the City of Trapezunte, the which at that time was not subject to the Empire of Mace the Countries Don, for Ariavathes kept it then as King. Howbeit it was faid, that Leonatus and Antigonus would of Cappadocia put him in possession of it, with a great and puissant Army, and make him Governour there. Yet after- and Paphlagowards Antigonus made none account of Perdiccas Letters unto him, putting him in the head of great nil. imaginations to Conquer all, despiting all other. And Leonatus also came down into Phry G1A, and undertook the Journey of this Conquest for Eumenes sake. But when he was in his Journey thitherward, Hecatens Tyrant of the CARDIANS, went to him to his Army, and prayed him rather to go help Anipater and the other MACEDONIANS, which were belieged in the City of LAMIA. So Leenatus being willing to take Sea, and go thither, went about to perswade Eumenes also to like of it, and to reconcile him with Hecareus: for they were not friends one with another, by reason of a quarrell that Eumenes Father had with this Hecataus, about the Government of their City. Befides that, Eumenes had many times complained of him openly unto King Alexander, faying, that he was a Tyrant, and befought the King that it would please him to set the CARDIANS at liberty. And therefore Eumenes refusing that Journey against the GRECIANS, alleadged that he was afraid of Antipater, who had been his Enemy of long time, doubting that for the old grudge he bare him, and allo to gratifie Hecatem, he would put him to death : Leonatus then revealed himself and his purpose to him, and how he made as though he would pass over the Sea to aid Antipater, where indeed his meaning was to take the Kingdom of MACEDON. Thereupon he shewed him Letters fent from Cleopatra, willing him to come to the City of Pella, and there she would marry him. When Eumenes was made private to his purpose : either because he scared Antipater, or else for that he had no great good opinion of Leonatus, knowing him to be a fond man, and very rash and unconstant in his doings, he stole away from him by night, with those sew men he riffom of the Country of MACEDON, the which every man through pride and excess began to forfake and contemn. At that time therefore Craterus fent Antipater into CILICIA, and he himfelf with Neoptolemus, went against Eumenes with the best part of his Army, hoping to take him tardy and altogether unprovided, supposing he would give himself to pleasure and pastime, after fo great a Victory. But Eumenes, like a wife and valiant Captain, had taken fuch order, that he to his doings, that he did not onely keep his Enemies from knowledge of any thing that he did :

but making his men also to kill Craterus in Battle, before they knew against whom they should fight, and to keep also so dreadfull an Enemy from their knowledge, that of all other shewed the passing skill of an expert Captain. And to work this feat the better, this was his policy. First, he made a rumour to be spred in his Hoast, how Neoptolemus and Pigres were again come against him, with certain Horsemen of all forts gathered together, CAPPADOCIANS and PAPHLA-GONIANS. And when he thought to have removed in the night, a great defire of fleep came upon after the MACEDONIAN fashion: who coming to give charge the one upon the other, the goddess Minerva came to aid the one, and Ceres likewise to aid the other. Then he thought that after they had fought a long time together, he whom Minerva aided was overthrown, and that Ceres had gathered ears of Corn and made a Crown of them, to give him that had won the Field.

Hereupon Eumenes perswaded himself that this Dream made for him, and promised him Victory, for that he fought for a fertile Country of Corn, where was great plenty of it. For all the Fields were fown with Corn in every place, that it was a pleasure to behold it, shewing the benefit of long Peace, to fee all the Corn-fields how green they looked. But when he understood that the Enemies had given their Souldiers for the Signal of Battle, Minerva and Alexander, then was his first imagination confirmed more then before. Whereupon, he gave Ceres and Alexander for Signal of the Battle to his Souldiers, and commanded every man to make him a Garland of Wheat-ears to wear on their heads, and that they should wreath Flowers and Nosegaies about their Pikes. He was in mind many times to make his truftiest Captains privy against whom they should fight, and not alone to trust himself withall, to keep so necessary a thing as that secret :

yet in fine, he kept his first resolution, thinking it the safest way, not to commit this danger, but to himself. Now when he came to give Battle, he would place never a MACEDONIAN directly against Graterus, but set two companies of men ar Arms that were strangers against him. the which Pharnabazus (Artabazus Son) and Phanix Tenidian did lead. Then he specially commanded, that fo foon as they faw the Enemies before them, they should straight give charge, giving them no leifure to speak nor retire, neither to hearken to any Herauld or Trumpet that meet full with Neoptolemus front. When they had passed a little Hill that stood between both Battles, Eumenes Horsemen following his Commandment, ran with full carrier to set upon their Enemies. Craterus feeing that, was amazed withall, and banned and curfed Neoptolemus that had deceived him in that fort, informing him that the MACEDONIANS would turn of his fide, if they might but once fee him: notwithstanding, he prayed them that were about him, to shew themselves like valiant men that day, and therewithall siercely set Spurrs to his Horse to meet with his Enemies. The encounter was very cruel on either fide, and their Staves being broken, they fell straight to their Swords: but that day did not Craterus dishonour the memory of Alexander, for he llew many of his Enemies round about him, valiantly repulfed them that did affail him, and many times overthrew them. Yet in fine, one of the men of Arms of THRACIA gave him fuch a blow on the fide, that he turned him off his Horse, and when he was down, many passed over him. But Gorgias, one of Eumenes Captains knowing him, lighted from his Horle, and appointed men about him to guard him: howbeit it was too late, for he was drawing on, and even in the of long time, being on fire with an old malice, they fought up and down the one for the other. And at the two first courses they could not one light upon the other, but at the third meeting, when they knew one another, then they let Spurs to their Horles, their Swords drawn, and with great cries gave Charge upon each other. And their Horses met so siercely together, as if two armed Galleys had met with their Prows : and both the Captains laying the bridles in their Horses necks, closed together, and with both hands strove to pluck off each others Head-piece, and to rent their Polrons from their shoulders. Whilest they were thus tearing each other, their Horses ran from them, and they fell to the ground, one holding the other fast as if they had wrastled together. Neoptolemus got up first:

but as he rofe, Eumenes cut the ham of his Leg, and railed himself up withall. Neoptolemus staying himself upon one Knee, his other Leg being very fore hurt, defended himself on the ground the best he could, from Eumenes that was on his feet, but he could give him no deadly wound :

nevertheless himself had a blow on the neck, that laid him flat on the ground. Then Eumenes inflamed with choler against him, went about to strip him, and fell a reviling of him, and being in that furious mood, remembred not that Neoptolemus had his Sword yet, who hurt him under had (being about three hundred Horsemen, and two hundred Footmen well armed) taking all his Gold with him, which amounted to the fum of five thousand Talents; and fled with them unto Perdiccus, unto whom he bewrayed all Leonatus intent and mind: whereupon he was immediately of great credit about him, and called to Counfell. Shortly after Perdiccas brought him into Cappadocia, with a great Army which he himself did lead. Where Ariarathes was taken Prifoner, and Enmenes established Governour of the Countrey, who delivered the Charge of the great Cities unto his friends, and left them there Captains of Garrifons which he appointed, placing every where Judges, Receivers, Governours, and all such other Officers necessary as he thought meet, Perdiccas medling with nothing at all. Notwithstanding, Eumenes went away with Perdiccas again: as well to wait upon him, as also because he would ever be about the King. But Perdiccas thinking with himself that he alone could well enough perform the enterprize he went about : and considering also that the Realmhelest behind him stood needfull of a wise and skilfull Governour, whom he might trust with the safety of his State: when they were in CILICIA, returned Eumenes back again, under colour to fend him to his Government, but indeed to keep the Realm of ARME-NIA in obedience, the which confined upon the frontires of his Country whereof he was Governour, because Neoprolemu did under-hand practife some alteration. Now though Neoprolemus was a proud and insolent Person, yet Eumenes still devised to hold him in, and kept him from attempts by gentle and fair words. Furthermore, perceiving also that the Regiment of the MACEDONIAN Footmen were grown exceeding stout and insolent, he for a strength and defence against them, fet up a company of Horlemen; and to bring it to pass, released all the Countrymen from paying of Tribute or Tax, being meet to serve on Horseback, and brought a great number of Horse of Service, which he gave amongst them that were about him, in which he put his most trust and affiance, making them couragious, by Honours and Gifts he gave to them that ferved well; and fo by continual Exercise and often removing them from place to place, made them very ready and serviceable. Thus were the Noblemen of Macedon, some much amazed, some others very glad when they saw how by this diligence Eumenes had in so short a time gotten about him such a number, as fix thousand three hundred Horsemen. About that time, Crateria and Antigonia having subdued the GRECIANS, came on with their Army into Asia to overthrow Perdiceas greatness and power: and news also, that shortly they would invade CAPPADOCIA. Whereupon Perdiccas being otherwise occupied in Wars, fighting against Ptolomy, made Eumenes his Lieutenant Generall, and gave him Commission and full Authority over all his Souldiers that were for him, either in CAPPADOCIA, or in ARMENTA, and wrote Letters unto Neoptolemu and Alettu, commanding them by the fame that they should be obedient unto Eumenes, and suffer him to order all matters according to his discretion. Now for Alcetas, he flatly answered, that he would not be at this War: for the MACEDONIANS under his charge were ashamed to take Arms against Antipater; and moreover they would not fight against Craterus, but contrarily were bent to receive him for their Captain, fo much good will they bare him. Neoptolemus on the other fide, was as ready to play the Traitor, and to do Eumenes a shrewd turn, as Alectas was. For being sent by Eumenes to come to him, where he should have obeyed him, he set his men in Battle ray to fight with him. There did Eumenes reap the first fruit of his wise foresight of the Horsemen, which he had set up to make head against the Footmen of the MACEDONIANS. For when his own Footmen were broken and overthrown, he overcame Neoprolemus, and put him to flight with his Horsemen, and took all their Carriage. Then he made them march in order of Battle against the MACEDONIANS, who were dispersed every where, following the chase of his Footmen, whom they had overthrown. Thus coming upon them in this diforder; he drave them to throw away their Weapons, and to yield unto him: and moreover, every man to take his Oath to serve him faithfully in this War, wherefoever he would lead them. Now Neoprolemus gathering a few together that fled, went with them unto Craterus and Antipater : who fent unto Eumenes to pray him to take their part, with condition that he should not onely enjoy the Countries and Provinces still which he had in Government, but furthermore that they would give him others unto them, and make him stronger then ever he was: belides that, by the acceptation of the offer, he should betaken for Antipater, good friend, where before he was ever reckoned his Enemy. Whereunto Eumenes made answer: that having always been Antipaters Enemy, he could not of a fudden become his Friend, specially seeing him use his Friends as Enemies: howbeit otherwise that he was very willing to make Craterus Peace with Perdiceas, and to reftore him again to his favour, upon reasonable and indifferent conditions. And furthermore, that if he meant to affail him, that then he would aid him so long as he had any breath in his Body, and would lose his life before he would break his promise. This answer being brought unto Antipater, they fell to consult at leisure what was to be done. In the mean space, Neoptolemus that fled upon his overthrow, was come unto them : who told them how the Battle was fought, and befought them both very instantly (but Craterus chiefly) to give him aid if it were possible. For the MACEDONIANS were to far in love with him, that if they did but fee his Hat, and hear him speak, they would all arm themselves and sollow him. For to speak a Troth, Craterus was had in great estimation among the MACEDONIANS: infomuch as after Alexanders death, he was more defired of the common Souldiers, then any other Captain, remembring how often he had for their fakes incurred Alexanders differace and difpleasure, because he went about to perswade him to leave the King of Persia's manner, whereunto Alexander by little and little gave himself: and also for that he maintained and defended the

Now for himself, he led the right wing of his Battle Eumenc; and with a Troop of three hundred men at Arms, the chiefest men of all his Army, where he would

Then Eumenes lighted from his Horse, and wept, and taking him by the right hand, accuried Neopolemus that had brought him to that pitiful state, and had also forced him to be in Bartle against one of his dearest Friends, to make him the instrument of his utter undoing. But as ill luck would have it, within two days after that Perdiccae was slain in a mutiny of his men in E-Gypt, news came to his Army of Eumenes Victory, and also of the death of Crateria. Whereupon the MACEDONIANS were fo offended with Eumenes, that incontinently they condemned him to die, and gave Antigonus and Antipater Commission to execute the revenge. When Eumener paffing by Mount Ida (where the King kept a Race and breed of Horfes) had taken away with him as many Horse as he would, and had tent Letters of advertisement thereof to the Kings water many assistance and responsed, finited, and in mockery faid, that he marvelled to fee Eume-Riders: Antipater, as it is reported, finited, and in mockery faid, that he marvelled to fee Eume-Rigers: Antipater, as it is reported, mined, and in modelly law, that he mattered to the Emmers great care, to think that he should either give or receive any account of the Kings goods. So net great ear, to think that he should either give or receive any account of the Kings goods. So the great Plains of Lydia, especially near unto the chief City of Sardis, because he was the stronger in Horsemen, and for that he would make Cleopatra fee the power of his Army. Howbeit, being intreated by her (who feared blame of Antipater) he went further into high PHRYGIA, and wintered in the City of CELENES. But there Polemon Alest a and Docimus, fell in contention with him for leading of the Army, faying that they had as Sardis the much right to lead the Army as he. Emmens answered them. Truly here is the common saying up and down: Desperate men regard no danger. Now Eumenes having promised his Souldiers up and down: Depetate men acgust in danger. From Eumenes maying products in Sounders pay within three days, to keep his promife, fold them all the Farms and Caftles of that Country, rogether with the men and beafts of the fame, whereof the Province was fully replenished. Thereupon his Lieutenants of the bands having bought certain of them, went and sook them buyon his Lieutenants of the bands having bought certain of them, went and sook them force, through Eumenes Engines of Battery which he suffered them to carry with him: and having taken them, they went and divided the spoil, paying every Souldier ratably his wages due. This device brought him again in favour among his Souldiers. For certain Papers being found in his Camp caft abroad by his Enemies, promiting great Offices, and a hundred Talents befides to any man that killed Eumenes: the MACEDONIANS that ferved under him were fo offended withall, that they presently set down an Order, that from that time forward a thousand of the best Souldiers among them (which also had Charge under them) should always guard his Person, keeping Watch every night about him, as fell out by turns one after another. Whereunto they all agreed:

give unto their Friends, and which they gladly received. For through their grant he had Authority to give Purple Cloaks and Hats to whomhe thought good, which was the honourableft Gift the King of Macedon could give. It is true, that proferrity maketh fimple men high-minded, whereby they feem (though they be not) very honourable, but specially when Fortune bath raifed whereby they retail amongs and to horse them to Honour and Wealth. But indeed he that is of anoble mind and from courage, is best different ned in adversity: for he never yieldeth to any troubles, as appeareth by Eumenes. For when he The conflarcy had loft a Battle among the ORCYNIANS, in the Realm of CAPPADOCIA, through the treason of Eumenter in of one of his Souldiers he being purfued, yet never gave the Traitor any leifure to fly to his Enemits for fafety, but took him and truffed him up. And after he had fled for a time, he turned his Horfe head upon a fudden, and leaving his Enemies fide-hand of him that had him in chafe, he closely ftole by them without their knowledge, and held on journeying to long, untill he came to the felf faine plain where the Baute was fought. There he camped, and gathering up the dead Bodies (the Captains by themselves, and the Souldiers apart) he burnt them with the Doors, Gates and Windows of all the Villages and Towns thereabouts that he could get together: and inflead of Tombs for them, he raifed up great heaps of Earth, Infomuch as Antigonus coming thither immediately after, he wondered much at his valiantness and invincible courage. Removing thence, he met with Ansigonus Carriage, and might easily without danger have taken a number of Priloners as well free as bond, and have gotten all the Riches and Treature which they had spoiled in so many fundry Wars, Towns and Countries: howbeit he was afraid that if his Souldiers were loden with that spoil, it would make them more heavy to march, and unable to fly, but specially more tender to abide to run from place to place a long time together, being the onely mean wherein he trufted to come to end this War. For he made account that Anisgonus in the end would be weary in following him fo long a time, and therefore that he would turn fome other

But in the mean time he fecretly fent a Messenger to Menander (who had the Charge and Conduct of all the Carriage) to will him to fly with all fpeed out of the plain, and to get him to the Hanging of a Hill not tar from thence, and fafe from Horfemen, where they could be environed, and there to fortifie himfelt, fending him word also, that he fent him this advertifement, for the old friendship and acquaintance that had been between them afore. Menander hearing what danger he was in, made his men trufs up their Carriage straight. Thereupon ε umenes openly fent certain light Armed men to discover, and to bring him news : and therewithall commanded them to Arm, and bridle their Horses, as if he had meant to have led them against the Enemies. His Scouts were now returned, and told him that it was unpossible either to distress or take Menander, for that he was fled into a place of fuch ftrength, and therefore was not to be come by. Eumenes seemed to be very forry for it, howbeit he led his Army from thence notwithstanding. Menander asterwards reported this matter to Anigonus, and the MACEDONIANS that were in his Army, who did greatly commend Eumenes, and after that loved him better then ever they did before: because that having their Children in his hands whom he might have made Slaves, and their Wives alsowhom he might have defiled, he spared them all. Howbeit Antigonus to put them out of this humour, told them, Ye are deceived, my Friends: for it was not for your fakes, nor yet to pleasure you, that Eumenes took not your Wives, your Children, and your Goods, but onely for the fear he had to have fhackles on his heels, to let him from speedy flying. So Enmenes departing from thence, fled still before Antigonus, and wandring up and down, did himself with his Souldiers to get them fomewhere elfe; either indeed for that he was carefull of them, or for that he was unwilling to have such a number about him, being too few to fight a Battle, and too many to hide his flying. In fine, he went to a ftrange place of fituation, called Nora, in the Confines of Lyconia and Cappadocia, with five hundred Horfemen, and two hundred Footmen well Armed: and when he was come thither also, he gave every one leave to depart that asked him licence, because they could not have abidden the discommodity of the place, which was very straight, and the lack of necessary Victuals, which they must needs have wanted, if the Siege did continue long: and thus departed from them with very good words and loving counte-nance. Shortly after came Antigonus before the Fort, but would not befiege it, before he fent for Euments to come to him upon his word. Eumenes answered him, that Antigonus had many of his friends about him, that after him might come to be the Heads of his Tribe, and that himself on the other side had not a Nobleman for whom he fought: and therefore if Antigonus would have him come and speak with him, that he should fend him one of his chiefest Friends in Hostage. Again, Antigonus being earnest with him, and telling him, it was reason he should come to him, for that he was the better man, and of greater power; Eumenes answered him: I will achowledge none better than my felf, so long as I can hold my Sword in my hand. In the end, Asrigonus (according to Eumenes request) tent his own Nephew Prolomy into the Fort, and then Eumenes talk came Eumenet, out. At their meeting they both embraced and faluted each other, as friends of old with Anigoacquaintance and familiarity, and to fell in talk of divers matters: but all this while Eumenes ne- nus, and his ver once made request to depart in safety, neither yet demanded pardon, but onely desired the magnanimity. confirmation of his Charge and Government, and that he might be reftored to that which was given him. They that were prefent at that meeting, marvelled much at Eumenes, and greatly commended his froutness. Now whiles they were thus in talk together, the MACEDONIANS came out of all parts of the Camp, to fee what manner of man Eumenes was : because that after the death of Craterus, there was no talk among the MACEDONIAN Souldiers of any Captain but of Eumenes. Nevertheless, Antigonus fearing they would do Eumenes some mischief, commanded them aloud to give back, and made stones to be thrown among them to keep them off him. All this notwithstanding he was fain in the end to put them off with his Guard, and to take \mathcal{E}_{k-1} menes in his Arms, and had much ado to deliver him fafely into his Fort again. After this imparlance, Antigonus compafied this Fort of Nora round about with a Wall, and left a sufficient Euments, benumber of men to continue the Siege, and to went his way with the reft of his Army. In the mean fieged in the time Eumenes remained befieged within his Fort, where there was plenty of Wheat, Water, and Fortot Nats. Salt, but of no other thing that was good to eat, nor of sweet tafte, to sustain them with their Bread. Yet with such as he had he kept them in good liking that were in house with him. For he made them every one after another fit at his Board with him, and withall did fashion out that manner of diet, with a certain life and familiarity of pleasant devices to entertain them at their Meat. For belides that he fought to shew them as pleasant a countenance as he could, yet naturally he had a fweet fair Face, not looking like a man of War, that all the days of his life had Ements perbeen trained up in it: but like a fresh youth, being of such a constitution of body, that the excellentest Workman that ever was, could not better set out all the parts and proportion of a man, then were naturally to be feen in him. His speech was not harfh nor churlish, but very mild and pleafant, as appeareth by the Letters he wrote. Now for the Siege, there was nothing that more annoyed the belieged then the narrownels of the Fort, wherein they were, which was not above two Furlongs compals about, and their Houses so little and narrow, that they could scant turn them in them, and did eat and drink without any manner of Exercise for themselves, or their Horse. Now Eumenes to take away the sluggishness that growing the land with travell and pains, to keep them in Breath, and to make them the lighter to fly, if occasion were offered, put his men into the longest and widest Siege for Mar- Hall he had in his House (being fourteen Cubits long to walk up and down in) and taught them first of all to march fair and fortly, and then by little and little to hasten their pace : for the Horses he had, them he made to be girt before, one after another, and then did fortly trife them up with long Pulleys aftned to the beams, their hindmost part standing on the ground, and their formost being aloft. The Horse being triled up in this manner, their Riders came with loud cries behind them and some with whips in their hands to lash them, that the Horse being mad withall, yerked out behind, and fprang forward with his formost legs to touch the ground, that they did but even rafe it a little, fo that every vein and finew of them were strained by this means, that they blew, and were all of a foam withall ; fogood an exercife to them it was, as well to put them in breath, as to keep their legs supple to run. After that, they had their Oats very clean pickt and dressed, that they might digeft them the sooner. Antigonus having long continued this Siege, news came unto him that Antipater, was dead in MACEDON, and that the Realm was in a great broil, through the Factions of Casander and Polyperchon. Ansigonus whose head was straight full of great imaginations, greedily coveting with himfelf the whole Kingdom of MACEDON, thought good to make Eumenes his Friend, that through his help he might attain his desired purpose. Thereupon he fent Hieronymus unto him to treat of Peace, and gave him the form of the Oath which he would have him swear unto him. When Eumenes had seen it, he would not be sworn in that manner, but corrected it, and faid: that he did refer himself to the judgement of the MACEDONIANS which kept him belieged, to judge which of those two forms was most meetest, that which Antigenss had fent him, or the same which he had corrected. For in Antigonus form of Oath, there was a little mention onely made at the beginning of the blood Royal, but in all the reft following, was a little mention onely made at the beginning of the blood Royal, but in all the reft following, he bound Eumenes particularly to himfelf. But Eumenes in his form of Oath, did first of all put Olympias the Mother of King Alexander, and the Kings his Sons afterwards: and for the reft he fwore he would be Friend of the Friends, and Enemy of the Enemies, not of Antigonus onely, but of the Kings, and of Olympias. The MACEDO NIANS being at the Siege before Nora, did bener like the form of Eumenes Oath, then they did that of Antigonus. So having given Eumenes his Oath, and made him swear according to that form, they raifed their Siege, and sent also unto Antigonus to take his Oath. All this accomplished, Eumenes redelivered the Cappadocians their Hostages, (which he had kept in NORA with him) and they that came from them, gave him in their flead, Horse of War, Beafts of Carriage, Tents and Pavillions. Thus he began to gather his men again rogether, which were dispersed abroad after his overthrow, so that in few days he was above a thouland Horsemen, with whom he fled, fearing yet Anigonus: and he did wifely. For Antigons had not onely commanded them to thut him up again straighter then he was before: but besides that wrote sharp Letters, and very angerly unto the MACEDONIANS, which had accepted the correction of the Oath. Whilst Eumenes wandred up and down flying still, he received Letters from certain in MACEDONIA (fearing Antigonus greatness) and specialof rousp. rather to Alex. ly from Olympias, which fent unto him to come into Macedon, to take the Charge and Government of her young Son Alexander, whom they fought to put to death. Furthermore, helikewife received Letters from Polyperchan, and from King Philip, who commanded him to make War DES: and besides, to defray the Charges of the Wars, as much as he thought meet. And therewithall also they wrote unto Antigenes and Tentamus, the two Captains of the ARGYRASPIDES, to wir, the Souldiers with the Silver Shields, or Shields Silvered, which were of the old bands of Alexanders Army. These two Captains having received these Letters, did use Eumenes with conjecture that they envied him; for either of them both thought themselves men sufficient, and worthy to command Eumenes, not to aid him. Howbeit Eumenes behaved himself very wifely, for as touching their envy, he pacified that, because he took not the Money which lie was commanded to take for his own use, for that he had no need of it. And as for their ambition and prefumption, disdaining to be commanded by him, though they could neither tell how to command nor obey, he did reclaim them by a superstition he laid before them, which friewed him a Pavillion sumpruously set out in the state and magnificence of a King, in the which was a Royal Throne : and told him, that if they would keep their Council-place in that Pavillion, he would be prefent among them, and aid them in all their Counfels, and Conducts of their Wars, so that they would alwaies begin by him. He easily perswaded Antigenes and Teutamus to believe that which he spake, who would not go to him to consult of any matters: neither did he think it honourable for himfelf to be feen to go to other mens Gates. Wherefore with all their confents they incontinently fet up a goodly rich Pavillion, which was called Alexanders Pavilhion: and their they kept their Councils and Affemblies for dispatch of all their weightiest Causes. After this, they went towards the high Countries, and met with Pencestas on the way (Eumenes very great Friend) who joyned with them, and other great Peers of the Realm, with all their power befides. This did greatly strengthen the Army of the Noblemen of MACEDONIA, as touching named Philip.

Burners made with Antigonus with his Army he had in CAPPADOCIA, and to put in his Purse of the Kings five Eliments made hundred Silver Talents (which had been taken from him before) which were in the City of CY N-King Philips Lieutenant of his Army. Argyrajpides called, fortheir very good words, and shewed him great countenance: yet a man by their looks might easily filvered Shields. perance. Eumenes fain-was this. He made them believe that Alexander did appear unto him in his sleep, and that he the minter of men, and their brave Armours and Furniture : but for their own persons, because they had no man to command them fince the death of Alexander, they were grown felf-willed by diffolute liberty, and effeminate in their manner of life; and moreover they had gotten a Tyrannical fierceness, nourished and encreased by the vanities of the barbarous People. So that many of them being then together, could not be quiet one with another, but shamefully flattered the old bands of the MACEDONIAN Souldiers, giving them Money, and making them Banquets and Feasts of Sacrifices. And thus in short time, of a Camp they brought it to be a dissolute Tavern, where the Noblemen got into the Souldiers favour that they might be chosen Chieftains of all the Army: like as the common Peoples Voices are bought in tree Cities (where the People do rule) to be preferred to honourable States and Offices of the Commonwealth. Now Eumenes wilfound straight that these Peers of the Realm disdained one another, howbeit that they all seared lingues to and mistrusted him, and fought but for opportunity to kill him. Wherefore to prevent this, he wind himfelf made as though he had occasion to occupy Money, and so borrowed a great Sum of them speci- out of danger. ally whom he knew most hated him, to the end that from thenceforth they should no more diftruft, but truft him, standing in fear to lose the Money they had lent him. And thereof followed a strange thing: for other mens Money and Goods was the safety of his Life. For where others give Money to fave their Lives, he by taking of Money faved his own Life. Now for the Souldiers of the MACEDONIANS, whilft they faw they were without danger of Enemies to make them afraid, they still hung upon them that gave them, being defirous to be made Generals, and came every morning to their uprifing to wait upon them, and follow them wherefoever they went. But when Antigonus was come to Camp hard by them with a great and puissant Army, and that their case required then a valiant Captain and skilfull Leader: not the Souldiers alone, but all the Peers and States belides (which in Peace did brave it out) did then willingly (without motion made) submit themselves unto Eumenes, to be at his Commandment. For when Antigonus affayed all the ways he could to pass over the River of Pastigris, the Peers which were layed Pastigris ft. in divers placestolet him from paffing over, heard nothing of it, fo that there was none but $\mathcal{E}ume$ nes onely that refifted him, and fought with him, where he flew fuch a number of his men, that Eumenies Bathe filled the River with them, and took four thouland of them Priloners. Again, when Eu- the with Antimenes was fick, these old bands did more plainly shew what opinion they had of him, and of gonus, and his others, to wit, that they could banquet them, and make them good cheer at their Houses, vet that Eumenes onely of all other was worthieft to be their Captain, and to command them. For Peucestas having feasted them in the Kingdom of Persia, and given every Souldier a Mutton to Sacrifice, thought he had wongreat favour and credit among them. But shortly after, as the Army marched against their Enemies, Eumenes by missortune fell dangerously sick, and therefore would needs be carried in a Litter far from the Camp, to be out of the noise, because he Antizonus could take no reft. But they had not gone far, before they faw their Enemies, which having paffed Souldiers are over certain little Hills between them, were coming down into the Valley. When the Souldiers med with gilt faw the gliftering of the gilt Armours of their Enemies that glared in the Sun, and the good order they marched withall in Battle ray, the Elephants with the Towers upon their backs. and the men at Arms with their Purple Coats upon their Armours (which was the Apparell they wore when they went to fight with their Enemies) then the foremost staid upon it, and cryed out, willing them to fend for Eumenes to lead them, for they would else go no further if they had not him for their General. And therewithall they raifed their Pikes, and laid down their Shields at their feet, calling from one to another to ftay, and to their private Captains also: and told them plainly, that they would not ftir a foot from thence, nor fight at all, unless Eumenes were among them to lead them. Eumenes hearing of it, came to them with great speed, halftning his Slaves and Littermen to bring him thither: and then opening his Litter on every fide he held out his right hand to the Souldiers, and told them he was very glad of the good opinion they had of him. The Souldiers also as soon as they saw him, saluted him in the MACEDONIAN Tongue, and took up their Shields, clapping them against their Pikes with a great shout, bidding their Enemies come when they would, they should be fought withall, now that their Captain was among them. Antigonus on the other fide, being informed by certain Priloners which his Souldiers had taken in Skirmish, that Eumenes was fallen very fore fick, and by reason thereof was carried in a Litter, thought now he should have no great ado to discomfit the rest of the Army, and therefore made all possible speed he could to fight. But when he came so near, that he might eafily fee the order and countenance of his Enemies, who were fet in fuch good order of Battle, that it could not any ways be amended, he was much amazed withall, and paufed a great while; and in the mean time spied Eumenes Litter a far off, carried from one end of the Battle to the other, whereat he laughed out aloud, as his manner was, and turning himself to his Friends, said: See, faid he, I believe it is that Litter that maketh War with us, and doth offer us Battle. But with those words, he founded the retreat, and brought his men back again into his Camp. When this fear was a little passed over, the MACEDONIANS sell to their old trade again, the Peers to flatter the Souldiers, and the Souldiers to wax brave and ftout against their Captains: so that when they came to take their Garrisons for the winter time, they divided in a manner among them the whole Countrey of the GABENIANS, the first from the last being lodged almost a thouland furtongs off. Which Antigonus understanding, desermined to fet upon them, they miftrufting nothing; and so went suddenly towards them, by a shorter way then that he had already come, but the worfer way a great deal, and where no water was to be track in bone thank the men thus differfed afunder, their Captains could not readily aftended them. But while he was in this his Journey, in the defart crooked way, he was fo overtaken with fuch bouterous winds and extream bitter cold, that his Souldiers could go no further, but were forced to rous whose and extream once come, that its soundard come go no actions a sur was rotted to tarry fill, to provide them prefent remedy against the fury of the time. Now the onely remedy they had, was to make numbers of fires: and by them their Enemies knew of their coming. For the barbarous People inhabiting the Mountains, towards the Defart, being amazed to fee fuch a number of fires in the Valley, fent prefently with speed upon two Camels light loden, to advertife Pencestru, who being nearest unto the Mountains was so scared with these news, that he was at his wits end, not knowing what to do. For feeing his other Companions as much afraid as himself, he fled upon it, and carried all them with him which he met in his way. But Eumenes qu'eted this great fear, affuring them that he would ftay the sudden attempt of their Enemies, and that they should come three days later then they looked for: which they believed. Then and that they mount come and the captains, commanding them speedid Eumenes send Messengers into every quarter to all the Captains, commanding them speedid ly to put their men in readinels, and to meet him in a certain place which he appointed. Himfelf went in the mean time with other Captains to chuse a fit ground to lodge a Camp, the which might eafily be feen from the top of the Mountains which they must pass that come from the Defart: and there fortified the same with Trenches, and divided it out into quarters, making Fire in every place, such a distance off one from another, as they use commonly to make in a Camp. It was no fooner done, but Antigonus came to the top of the Mountains, and faw these Fires afar off, which grieved him much: for he thought that his Enemies had long before known of his coming, and that they came against him, Being afraid therefore less this Enemies would compell him to fight, coming fresh upon him, his own men being weary and done with the pains they had abidden, coming through that Defart Countrey: he took his way to lead back his Army, not the nearest way by the which he came, but through the Country richly inhabited and replenished with great Cities and good Towns, to refresh his over-wearied People. Yet feeing he had none Alarms given, nor any Skirmiftes offered him, (as they use commonly when both Armies are near together) and that the Valley-men told him that they had feen none other Army but his, faving that round about there were store of Fires: then he thraight mittrufted that it was one of Eumenes Stratagems of War, wherewith he had deceived him. And therewithall he was in such a rage, that he went straight to the place where he thought to find him, determining no more to fteal upon him, but to put all to the hazard of a Battle. But in the mean time, the most part of the Host was gathered about Eumenes, for the great estimation every man had of his wifdom and fufficiency: infomuch that they agreed and ordained, that he onely as their Lieutenant Generall should command the whole Army. This spited the two Captains of the ARGYRASPIDES, Antigenes and Teutamut, who bare him fuch an inward grudge, that from that time forth they practifed his death : and affembling together with many Emments death of the States and particular Captains, they fate in Council to know when, and in what fort they of the States and particular Captains, they have a ffembled in this Council, were whole of opinion, that they should take the benefit of his service in leading the Baule, and that immediately after they should put him to death. This being thus resolved upon, Eudamus Captain of the Elephants, and another called Phedinsus, went fecretly and told Euments what they had concluded upon in the Affembly against him, not for any good will that they bare him, or for that they fought to pleafure him, but onely because they were afraid to lose the Money they had lent him.

Eumens gave them great thanks, and commended their fidelity, and then reported it unto his best Friends, and told them: You see how I am environed with a Troop of wild and brurish beasts. That done, he made his Will, and tore all the Letters and Writings that had been fent him, because all his Friends he would not have them fuffer for him after his death, that had fent him fecret advertisements. au nu Friends in cround not door than none; for min and the private matters in this fort, he frood in a doubt whether our of the the doubt the Bull of the private matters in this fort, he frood in a doubt when ther he should lose the Battle, giving his Enemies the Victory, or whether it were better for him to fly into Cappadocia, through Media and Armenia. Howbeir he reloved of nothing before his Friends. But when the milchief he was in, had put divers thoughts into his head, in fine, he determined to fight, and did fee his Army in Battle-ray, perfecting the Grecians as well as trouble. the barbarous People to fland to it like men. And as for the old Souldiers of the Macedonians, they so little needed exhortation, that they themselves did exhort Eumenes to be of good courage, faying that their Enemies would never abide them, because they were all the oldest Souldiers, and of greatest experience that had been in all the Conquests of King Philip, and of his Son Alexander; and that it was never heard that they had been overthrown in any fer Battle, the most of The old bands them being threefcore and ten years old, and the youngest no less then threefcore. Whereupon, when they ran with great fury to give charge upon their Enemies, they cryed out aloud fpeaking to the Souldiers of the MACEDO NIANS that were under Antigonus: Ah wretches, come ye to fight with your Fathers? And so assaulting them with a lufty courage, and in rage withall, years old, and In a (hort space overthrew the Squadron of the Enemies, and flew the most part of them in the most above. Field. Thus was Antigonus Army clean overthrown on that fide: but on the other fide where Emerges Con- his men of Arms were, through Penceffus cowardliness (that handled himself very ill at that Baitle) he had the upper hand and wan all their Carriage, through his forefight in the greatest fury of the Battle, and, the strength of the place where the Battle was fought. great plain of length, neither too deep, nor yet too hard underfoot, but covered over with a small fine fand, much like to a dry fand the Sea castethup, and leaveth upon the shoar. This sand being feattered abroad by riding and going too and fro of fo many thoulands of men and Horses during the time of the Battle foughten, had raifed fuch a mighty dust and white smoak in the Element, as if they had stirred or tempered white-lime together : which troubled their fight so fore, as they could see nothing before them : in respect whereof Antigonus might easily seize all their Carriage, themselves being never a whit the wifer. The Battle being come to this pass you have heard, Tentamus sent presently unto Antigonus, to pray him to redeliver them their Carriage again, which he had taken and carried into his Camp. Anigonus made him answer, that he would not onely redeliver the goods unto the ARGYRASPIDES, but would moreover use them with all the favour he could, so farforth as they delivered Eumenes into his hands. Whereupon the ARGY- Eumenes be-RASPIDES took prefently a wicked refolution, to deliver him alive into the hands of his Enemies, trayed by the And with that determination they came near unto him, not making any countenance as though Argyrafidet. they would lay hands on him, but rather feeming to guard and defend his Person, as their manner was: fome of them lamenting that their goods were gone : others telling him that he cared not now that he had won the Battle: and others accusing the Noblemen of cowardliness, saying, that the fault was in them that they had not the whole Victory. But in fine, one of them having spied his time, flew to him, and took his Sword out of his hand: the others ftraight laid hold of him, and bound both his hands behind him with his own girdle. Antigonus understanding it, sent Nicator thither to take him out of their hands, and to bring him to him. Then Eumenes having made request unto them to fuster him to speak, as they brought him through the bands of these old MACEDONIAN Souldiers, it was granted him with condition, that he should make no motion unto them to turn from that they were determined to do, but to tell them of things, which (as he said) tended greatly to their benesit. Whereupon silence being made, he got up upon a little hillock, and there spake unto them, putting forth his hands being bound. O wretched and faithless men, the wickedest that ever MACEDON bred | What so great Triumph or Victory, hath ever Antigonus won of you, having fought it fuch infinite wates, as you your felves do now put imo his hands, delivering him your Captain bound and manacled? Will not this be to your great shame, that being Masters of the Field, you will grant the honour of the Victory unto your Enemy, onely for a little coverousness of Money and pattry stuff which you have loft? And yet is not this all, but the worst behind : to fend your Captains as you do to pay the Ransom of your baggage. " For my felf, though now they lead me bound, yet do I remain free unovercome, van. The Oration "quither of mine Enemies, and fold by them that should be my friends. Well, yet this request I of Eumenes of " onely make unto you in the Name of Japiter, Protector of Arms, and for the honour of the gods, Argraphiles "(unto whom all vowed Oaths ought faithfully to be kept) I pray and conjure you, to kill me your his Souldiers. " felves in this place. For all cometh to one end. To be flain in Anisgonus Camp by the hands " of mine own Enemies, will ever be counted your deed: and you may be affured he will not be " angry withall, for he onely defireth Eumenes death, and not his life. If you will needs hold your " hands from this attempt, unloose yet one of mine onely, that shall suffice to do the feat. And "if for fear ye will not put a Sword in my hand, throw me bound yet hand and feet unto wild "Beafts: which if ye perform, then do I difcharge you of your Oath taken between both my hands "which ye have sworn unto your Captain, as holily and perfectly performed. Upon this speech of Eumenes, all the rest of the Army had compassion of him, that they wept for tender affection. But the ARGYRASPIDES cryed out to carry him away, and not give ear to his Preaching; and that it was a good deed to punish this wicked CHOERONESIAN, according to his deferts, considering that he had turmoiled the MACEDONIANS with endless War and Battle. And moreover, that it were too much shame that the worthiest Souldiers that ever served King Philip and Alexander, to painfully in all their Wars, thould for recompence of their Service in their old age be turned a begging, their Wives having now lain three nights with their Enemies. With thole words, they violently drave him on towards Antigonus Camp, who fearing left the multitude of People that ran to fee him, would smoother him in the press, because every man ran out of the Camp, he sent thither ten of the strongest Elephants he had, and a good number of men at Arms of the MEDES and PARTHIANS, to make way for him in the preads. When Eumenes was now come into Antigonus Camp, his heart would not ferve him to fee him in that miserable state, for that they had once been familiarly acquainted together. Whereupon, such as had him state, for that they had once been familiarly acquainted together. Whereupon, such as had him Antigonas and in their custody, came to Antigonas to ask him, how he would have him kept: who answered werfor keeping them : Like a Lion or an Elephant. Yet within a while after he took pity of him, and difchar of Eumenether ged him of his weightieft Irons, and fent one of his houlhold Servants to him to fee him well ufed, ing Priloner. and fuffered his friends to come and bring him any thing he lacked. Thus did Antigonus defer many daies before he would determine ought of Eumenes, hearing every man ipeak, and pondering their purposes and several opinions. Nearchus CRETAN, and his own Son Demetring spake for Eumenes, and made fuit to fave his life, contrary to all the other Lords and Captains that were about Antigonus, who would in any case have him die. Eumenes standing on these termes, asked his Keeper Onomarchus one day, what Antigonus meant, that having his The noble Enemy in his hands, he did not quickly rid him out of his pain, or nobly deliver him? Onomar-mind of Euroch chus churlishly answered him again, that the time was past now to shew his courage, as though ness. he feared not death; and that he should have shewed it in the Field at the Battle. So help me fupiter (quoth he) fo have I done, and if thou believest not me, ask them that set upon me: for I never met with man yet more strong then my self, Onomarchus replied again: fith now therefore thou haft found a stronger then thy felf, why then canst thou not abide his pleasure? In fine, when Antigonus had refolved of his death, he commanded them to give him no more Meat: and thus taking his fuftenance from him, Eumenes was three days a dying. In the mean time came fuch News, that fuddenly the Camp removed, and therefore before their departure, a man was fent to Eumenes to dispatch him out of his pain. Antigonus licenfed his friends to take his Body and burn it, and then to gather his after and bones to fend them to his Wife and Children. Eumener being flain in this manner, the gods appointed none other Judges to revenge the dilloyalty and treason of the ARGYRASPIDES and their Captains, for betraying Eumenes, but Ansigonus felf: who detefting them as cruel murtherers, and perjured Perfonsto the gods, appointed Ibyrtim Governour of the Province of ARACHOSIA, to kill them every Mothers Son what way he could, that none of them might ever fee MACEDON again, nor ward of treason the Greekish Sea.

The end of the Life of Eumenes.

THE COMPARISON OF EUMENES with SERTORIUS.

The Government of Eumenes and Serto-Tius.

Ere we have fet down the things worthy memory of Eumenes and Sertorius. Now to compare them together, in this they were both alike : that they being ftrangers in a ftrange Countrey, and banished out of their own, had alwaies been Captains of divers Nations, and Chieftains of great and warlike Arm ies. But this was proper to Sertorius, that all those of his Faction gave him the chiefest place of Authority, as the most sufficientest man among them, and worthiest to command: where Eumenes having many that contended against him for the chief rule and conduction of the Army, through his noble Deeds, obtained the chief place and Authority in the fame. So that they obeyed the one, defiring to be governed by a good Captain: and for their own fafety gave place to the other, feeing themselves unable to command. For Servorius being a ROMAN, governed the SPANIARDS and LUSITANIANS: and Eumenes a CHOERRONE-SIAN, the MACEDONIANS. Of the which the SPANIARDS of long time had been fubject to the Empire of ROME: and the MACEDONIANS at that time had subdued all the World. Furthermore, Servorius being then of great estimation, for that he was a Senator of Rome, and had charge of men of War before, came to the Dignity and Estate to be Chiestain of a great Army. Where Eumens came with small reputation, distained for that he was but a Secretary: and when he began to come forwards, had not onely lefs means to prefer him then Servorins had, but greater lets and impediments alfo, to hinder his rifing and eftimation. For many openly stood against him, and secretly conspired his death: and not as Serverius, whom no man contraried from the beginning, untill his latter end, when certain of his Companions secretly conspired against him. Therefore Servorius end of all his dangers, was to overcome his Enemies: where Euwenes greatest dangers came through his Victories which he wan of his own men, through the malice of them that envied his Honour. Now for their Deeds of Arms, they are both in manner alike: but on the other fide for their Conditions, Eumenes naturally loved War and contention, and Sertorius embraced peace and quietness. For Eumenes that might have lived in fafety with Honour, if he would but have given place to his betters, and forfaken the Wars : liked better with the danger of his life to follow Martial Feats, with the greatest Personages of Macedon, and in the end so came to his death. Sertorius contrarily being unwilling to come in trouble, was forced for the fafety of his Perfon to take Arms against them that would not let him live in Peace. For had not Eumenes been so ambitious and stour to strive against Antigonus for the chiefest place of Authority, but could have been contented with the second, Antigonus would have been right glad thereof : where Pompey would never fo much as fuffer Sertorius to live in rest. So the one made voluntary War onely to rule, and the other against his will was compelled to rule, because they made Wars with him. Whereby it appeareth that Eumenes naturally loved War, preferring the covetous defire of a better Estate, above the fasety of his life: and the other as a right Souldier, used the Wars onely for a mean to fave his life by valiant defence of Arms. Furthermore, the one was flain, miftrufting no treason against him and the other, looking every hour for present death threatned him. Whereof the one argued a noble mind, not to miffrust them whom he thought his Friends: and the other shewed a faint heart, being taken when he meant to fly. So Sectorius death dishonoured not his life, suffering that of his own Companions, which his deadly foes Sectorius death could never make him fuffer. The other having no power to avoid his destiny before he was taken, more honest and having fought means to live being in Prison and Captivity, could neither patiently nor manfully athen the death bide his death. For begging life at his Enemies hands, he gave him his heart with his body, who before of Eumenes. had but his body in his power.

his Royal State and princely behaviour grafted in him by nature, with that courtefie and familiarity, which he had attained by education. At that time when he went incompany with the Boys which were brought up together, Lysander fell in love with him, wondring at the modefty of his wit. For having better Spirit, and being more constant in his opinion then any of the other Children, striving ever to excell in all things, with fuch a vehemency he took all Travels in hand, that it was unpoffible to overcome him, much less to compell him. He was on the other fide fo mild and gentle, that every courteous word wrought in him better obedience then any fear could do: because it grieved him more to be reproved, then to take upon him any pain or labour. And for the deformity of his Legs, the one being shorter then the other, in the flower of his youth, through his pleasant wit, he used the matter fo pleafantly and patiently, that he would merrily mock himself: which manner of merry behaviour did greatly hide the blame of the blemish. Yea further, his life and courage was the more commendable in him, for that men faw that notwithstanding his lameness, he refused no pain nor labour. Of his Person we have drawn no counterfeit, because he would not in any wise have it drawn, and did exprefly command by his Will, that they should neither draw his Picture nor make any Mould or Image of his Body. Howbeit we find that he was fmall of Stature, whereby his prefence promifed no great matters to them that beheld him. Yet for that he was ever merry and pleasant, and never pensive nor troublefome in word nor look, even to the laft end of his life he was better loved, then the most fair creature that lived. Notwithstanding, the Ephori (as Theophrastus writeth) did condemn King Archidamus in a sum of Money because he married a little Woman: saying, that he would beget them demy Kings, no Kings indeed. In the time that his eldeft Son Agis reigned King, Alcibiades being banished ATHENS, Hed out of SICILE into LACED MON, and had not long remained in SPARTA before they suspected him that he kept King Agis Wite, called Timea: for which cause Agis would not acknowledge the Child she brought to be his Son, saying that Alcibiades had begotten him. But Times cared not much for it, as Duris writeth: for other while as the fate amongst her Women, fostdultery with ly the called him Alcibiades, not Leotychides. On the other fide they report, that Alcibiades him-King Agis Wife. felf said, it was for no hurt he meant to any man, that he lay with Queen Timea, but onely for the defire he had that fome of the Kings of LACEDEMON should be begotten of his Seed. Nevertheless at the length he was driven to for fake LACEDEMON, miffrufting King Agu, who ever after doubted of the Child, and thought him a baftard : untill such time as being on his death Bed, Leotychides falling on his knees, wept, and so behaved himself, that Agis before many Witnesses, faid he did acknowledge him for his Son. This notwithstanding, when King Aqu was dead, Lysander that had then overcome the ATHENIANS by Sea, and was more in credit and Authority in the City of SPARTA vercome the ATHENIANS by Sea, and was more in create and Authority in the City of SPARTA Agestians create then any other, practifed to put the Crown upon Agestian head, saying that Leotybides had no interest tunto it, because he was a bastard. The like did divers other Citizens say of him, which loved through Lipan Agestian Agestian Vertue, and liked him passingly; for that he had been brought up from his childhood among there means. them. But on the contrary partallo, there was a Sooth fayer or Wizard in SPARTA called Diopithes, that had a number of old Prophecies without book, and was accounted a very skilfull man touching Prophecies and Divinations. He maintained that it was not lawfull for any lame man to be King of SPARTA: and for proof thereof he told this ancient Oracle before the Council.

As stately as thy stomach is, O Sparta take good heed. And stand upon thy guard, and look about thee, I thee read, For halting one day down will cast thine Empire to the ground. By mean of Wars and troubles great that shall inclose thee round.

Lyfander replyed against it, faying, that if the SPARTANS were afraid of this Oracle, they should rather beware of Leorychides. For the gods cared not, if any man lame of a foot afpired to be King: but rather if he were a bastard, and not lineally descended of the Race of Hercules. For that, said he, were to make the Kingdom halt. Agefilaus furthermore alleadged, that the god Neprune himfeli had witnessed that Leorychides was a bastard : for he drave Agis by an Earthquake , to run Agefilians pro- out of his Wives Chamber, and that ten Moneths after that, and more, Leotychides was born. So claimed King was Agestlaus upon these allegations not onely proclaimed King of Sparta, but he had given and Leonybides him moreover, as lawfull Heir, all his Brother Agis Goods, and Leonybides rejected as a baftard. Notwithstanding, confidering that his Parents by the Mothers side were very poor (yet honest men) he left them the moiety of all the goods: by which Act, Agesilans won all their good wills, where elfe they had envied him for his succession in the Kingdom. And (as Xenophon saith) by obeying his Countrey, he grew to fuch power that he might do whatfoever he would. The Ephori and Senators at that time bare all the fway and Government of the Commonwealth; the Ephores Office changing yearly, the other being for life: the which Ephori were onely ordained to bridle the infolency of the Kings, for that they should not (as we have more amply written in Lycurgus Life) have absolute power in their hands. Upon this occasion, the Kings that succeeded in the Government, had (as it were) by Inheritance a present grudge and malice against them. This notwithstanding, Agessiaus took a contrary course to all his Predecessors. For where others cert suthorified prefently quarrelled with the Ephori and Senators, Agefilans did honour and reverence them, cers authorited prefently quarrelled with the Ephori and Senators, Agejuans and notion and rectain the to controll the and would never dispatch any matter without their privity, but was alwaise ready to go when Kings infolential and would never dispatch any matter without their privity, but was alwaise ready to go when congression information in the Election of the Ephori and the Election of the Ephori is any were by chanced to come in, he would rife up unto them; and at the Election of any new Senator, he is any were by chanced to come in, he would rife up unto them; and at the Election of any new Senator, he is any were by chanced to come in, he would rife up unto them; and at the Election of any new Senator, he would for honours fake prefent him a Gown and an Ox. And thus cunningly feeming to honour and increase the dignity of the Senators, winning their good wills, he made his power great, and the Realm much greater. Furthermore, his behaviour towards the rest of his Countreymen was such, as his enmity was lefs faulty then his friendship. For he did never hurt his enemies withour just caute, as in sensing was related in unjust causes. And whereas he thought it a stame not to honour his A_{SCF} that an Dut we alreed its friends even in anjour each of the could not find in his heart to rebuke his friends when they did uprighter encennies when they had done well, he could not find in his heart to rebuke his friends when they did uprighter encennies when they had done well, amifs, but rather gloried in succouring and helping of them in their evil doings. For he thought it my than a no shame to serve his friends turn, howsoever it were. Again, when any of his adversaries offend. ed, he was as forry for it as any man, and as ready to bear with it if he were entreated: whereby he allured and wan the hearts of all men. The Ephovi feeing that, and fearing his power, punished him in money, for that he made the common love of his Countrey private to himfelf. For as natural Philosophers hold opinion, that if contention and strife were taken out of Nature, it would come to pass that the heavenly bodies should stand still, and also that the generation of all things should be at a stay, by reason of the mutual agreement between the world and them: even so, the Law-maker of LACEDEMON feemed to have allowed ambition and strife in the Commonwealth, as a spur to Whether convertue, by procuring always fome contention and emulation among great persons. And his reason tention among was, that this base and effeminate favour, in winking one at another when men are to be rebuked, the nobility be was, that this bale and ettemmate tayour, in winking one at another when then are to be reduced, profitable in a ought not of right to be called by the name of Concord. And fure fome think that Homer also faw Common. the same, for he would never else have made Agamemnon to have rejoyced to see Ulifes and Achil- wealth. ks at great words together, if he had not been of opinion, that envy and contention among great men, were very available for the Commonwealth. Yet is not this thus fimply to be allowed: for contentions are hurtfull to Cities, where they are violent, and do bring great dangers with them. Now when Ageflaus was entred into his Kingdom of LACEDEMON, news were brought him out of Asia, that the King of Persia prepared a great Navy to conquer the Lacedeno-NIANS figniory by fea. Lyfauder being glad of this occasion, longing to be fent again into ASIA to fuccour his friends whom he left there as Governours and Lieutenants of Cities and Provinces(of the which, some of them were driven away by their Citizens, others also put to death for abuting their authority, and ruling over-cruelly) perfivaded Azefilaus to go into Asia, to make War upon this barbarous King, far from GREECE, before his Army were gathered together. And to compass this the cashler, he wrote unto his friends in ASIA, that they should send unto SPARTA to require Agessiaus for their Captain, and so they did. Thereupon Agessiaus going to the assembly of the people, accepted the charge, with condition that they would give him thirty Captains of the Spar-TANS to be Counsellors and Affistants to him in these Wars, two thousand free ILOTES, and fix thousand of the confederates of LACEDEMON. All this was immediately granted through Lyfanders friendship towards him, and he was feat away straight with the thirty Captains which he had requefted , of the which Lyfander was the chiefeft, not onely for his riches and authority, but also for the good will he bare unto Agefilaus: who thought himfelf more beholding to him for procuring Afia. him this charge, then for his friendthip he thewed him in bringing him to be King. Now Ageflians Army being affembled at the Haven of Gereffa, himself with certain of his friends went unto the City of AULIDE, where in his sleep he dreamed that one said unto him: O King of the LACEDEMONI-ANS, thou knowest that never none but Agamemnon, and now thy self, was chosen General of all GREECE: considering therefore that thou commandest the same people he did, that thou makest Agestians Wars with the felf fame enemies, departing from the felf fame place to go thither, it is reason that lide. thou make the felf same sacrifice unto the goddes, the which he made at his like departure. Agest-Laus straight upon this vision, remembred that Agamemnon through the perswasion of the Soothfayers did facrifice his own daughter in the fame place: yet this made him not afraid, but the next day he told it to his friends, and faid, he would facrifice that unto the goddels, which he thought would please her well enough; and that he would not follow that cruel devotion of this ancient Captain Agamemnon. And with that, he brought a Hinde crowned with a Garland of Flowers, and commanded his Soothfayers to facrifice her, and would not fuffer him to have the honour to do the facrifice that was appointed for the same purpose by the Governours of BOEOTIA according to the cultom of that place. The Governours of BOEOTIA understanding it were much offended, and fent their Officers to will Agefilaus not to do any facrifice there, contrary to the law and cuftom of their Countrey. The Officers that were fent, performed their commission: and finding that the beaft was flain, and the quarters of it upon the Altar, they took and flung them off the Altar every way. This vexed Ageillans, being ready to imbarke, and depart thence in choler against the THE BANS, and miltrufted much his good fuccess by this unlucky prediction, which seemed to prognofficate unto him, that he should prevail according to his desire. Furthermore, when he was arrived at EDHESUS, he presently missisked the honour he saw done unto Lysander, and the great train that waited on him. For all the Countreymen there repaired continually to his house; and when Landing global and the countreymen there repaired continually to his house; and when the diminished he came abroad, they all followed him whereforver he went; as though Lyfander had indeed been in 19 diminished, authority to do what he would, and that Agestians onely had but the name to be General, so appointed by the law of LACEDAMON. For in truth there was never GRECIAN Captain in thole parts that had won him fuch estimation, nor that was more feared then he : nor there was never man that was more beneficial to his friends, neither also that was more hurtfull to his enemies. All these things being fresh in memory, the Countrymen of that Countrey perceiving the simplicity of Agestlans, and how he was given to please the people, and carried no great majesty nor countenance with him, and observing in LyJander that wonted roughness and sharp speech wherewith they had been acquainted before; every man obeyed him, and nothing was done but what he commanded. This first of all made the other Spartans angry, for that it appeared they were come as it were to ferve Lyfander, and not as to countel the King: but after that, Agefilans himself also grew miscontented, although of his own nature he was not envious, nor forry to fee others honoured befides himfelf, Yet being a man ambitiously given, and of a noble courage, fearing if he should do any noble exploit in this war, that they would impute it to Lyfander, for the great estimation he was of, he began to deal in this fort with him. First he contrarred all his counsels: and what matters soever he preferred, which he was defirous should have taken effect; Agefilans would none of that, but took some other in hand. Furthermore, if any of Lyfanders followers came to make fuit to him for his favour, perceiving that they did lean unto Lyfander, he fent them away without any thing done for them. In ceiving that they and that they are the cale also in matters of judgements, if Lyfander were against any, they were fure to have the matter pass on their side. On the contrary part also, if Lysander bare good will to the party, and favoured the cause to gratific him, they hardly escaped from setting a fine on their heads: Agestiaus continuing these shews ordinarily of purpose, not by chance to one or two, but indifferently to all: Lyfander looking into the caule, diffembled not with his friends, but told them plainly, that it was for his fake they had those repulses and wrongs, and therefore did counsel them to wait upon the King, and those that had more credit then himself. Now Agestians supposed he gave that advice to make every man to malice him : wherefore, to despite him the more, he made him diffributer of his victuals: and having done fo, fome fay that he spake these words in open presence of many: Now let them go and honour my flesh-diftributer, Lyjander being grieved withall, said unto the King: My Lord, you know how to oppress your friends. And so do 1, laid Agefilaus, how to keep them under that would be greater than my felt. It may be yet (replied Lysander) I have not done as your Grace doth fay: yet if you so conceive of me, put me I befeech you in some place of charge or office, where I may do you good service without offence. After this talk between them, Agesilans sent him into Helle-SPONT, where by practife he took prisoner a Noble man a PERSIAN, called Spithridates, out of Pharnabazus Province whereof he was Governour, and brought him to Agefilans with a great fum of Gold and Silver, and near about two hundred horsemen with him. All this notwithstanding, he forgat not his grudge to Agestians, but being offended still, sought opportunity and means to defeat the two houses of the priviledge of the Kingdom, and to bring it in common to all the other houses of Sparta: and furely he had made great broil (in my opinion) in the City of Sparta, had he not been prevented by death, in a journey he made into BOROTIA. Thus we fee, that ambitious minds observing no mean, are in a Commonweal oft times more hurtfull then beneficial. For though Lysander was indeed intollerable, to shew himself so ambitious, and out of time: yet was not Agessaur ignorant neither, that there were diversother means less reproachfull to punish such a Noble man, that offended onely by greediness of honour. But to tell you my opinion, they were both blinded with one felf passion: the one not to know his Princes power; and the other not to bear with his friends imperfection. Now Tisaphernes at the first being afraid of Agestians, made league with him, colourably letting him understand that the King would be content to set the Cities of GREECE in ASIA at liberty: notwithstanding, when he thought he had gathered force sufficient to fight with him, he proclaimed war. Agefilaus was very well content withall : for the expectation was great of him through GREECE, that he would do fome noble exploit in his journey, Moreover he thought himselt dishonoured for ever, that the ten thousand GRECIANS which were returned back from the fartheft part of Asia, even unto the sea Major (under the conduct and leading of Xenophon their Captain) had overcome the King of Persia's Army as off as they lifted themselves; and that he which was the Lieutenant General of the LACEDAMONIANS (who at that time commanded both fea and land) should not do some deed worthy memory among the GR E-CIANS. Presently therefore to revenge Tisaphernes perjury by just deceit, he made a countenance as though he would first invade the Countrey of CARIA. Whereupon this barbarous person Ti-Agefilaus deeds saphernes gathered all his power together. But Agesilaus on a sudden returned back again, and ehin Apa, and the fillhood of Ti- tred into PHRYGIA, took there many Cities, and wan great spoil, making his men see by experience, that to infringe and break a league made and avowed by oath, was a facriledge, and contemning of the gods. On the other fide also, that to beguil his enemies, it was not onely just and honourable, but also profitable and pleasant. Now Age flass being weaker in horsemen then his enemies, and finding the livers of the beafts which he had facrificed, without heads, he returned into the City of EPHEsus, and there gathered horsemen together, letting the rich men understand (which would not themfelves ferve in person) that he did dispence with their persons, so that they did set outstorfe and man furnished for service in their place. Many of them took that course, and by this means Age silans Agefilian craft. within few days had levied a great number of men at Arms, instead of footmen that could do small fervice. For they that were unwilling to go to the Wars, did hire them that were willing to ferve in their place; and such as would not serve on horseback, did give them pay that were desirous to ferve in their steads. In this he wifely followed King Agamemnons example, who did dispence with the person of a rich coward for going to the Wars, by taking a good mare of him. Then Agestlaus commanded them that fold the prifoners by the Drumtaken in the Wars, that they should strip them naked, and to fell them, which they did. And fundry persons willingly bought their spoils and raiment, but they fcorned their bodies, because they saw them white skinned, soft and delicate : fo that few men would out-bid the price for them, for that they thought those men unprofitable and good for nothing. Agefilam also being present at this sale of purpose, said thus unto his men: See, my friends, quoth he, these bethe men against whom ye are to fight, and here be the spoils for the which ye shall fight. The time being come now to pur himself into the field; and to invade h s Enemies Countrey again, he gave out that he would enter Lydia, not meaning to deteive Tisaphernes again, but Tisaphernes deceived himself. For he being deceived before by Agestland, gave no credit to this second rumour, but perswaded himself that doubtles Agestan meant then to enter into CARIA, and the rather for that it was a Woody Countrey, very ill for horiemen; it the which he was the weaker. This notwithstanding, Agesilam invading (as he had given it out) the Champion Sardis, the Country, in the which stood SARDIS the capital City of Lydia, Tifaphernes was compelled to chief City of come to refere it in haft; and being come thither with great speed with his horsemen he ftole upon Lydia. many of his Enemies whom he found stragling out of order, spoiling the Countrey, and put the most of them to the fword. Agefilans having intelligence of this, imagined with himfelf that the footmen of his enemy could not yet be arrived, and confidering also that he had his Army whole about him, thought it best forthwith to bid him battle, rather then to delay time any longer. Thereupon he thrust in among the borsemen his light armed footmen, and commanded them straight to charge the enemy, whilft he caused the heavier armed men to follow at their heels, as they did. But the barbarous people fled upon it immediately: and the GRECIANS luftily following the chafe, took barbarous people fled upon it immediately; and the GRECIANS intrity following the cnate, took agofitant vitheir Camp, and made great flaughter of them that fled. After this field foughten, they had leifure agoff them that fled. enough not onely to spoil and over-run the Kings Country at their pleasure, but also to see the re- phermes. venge taken of Tisaphernes, that was a vile man, and a cruel enemy to the GRECIANS. For the King of Persia made another his Lieutenant immediately in his room, called Tithraustes, who strake off Tifaphernes head, and fent unto Agesilam to pray him to take peace with them, and to offer him store of gold and filver to depart out of his Country. Thereto Azefilaus answered, that for peace, it was not in him to make it, but the LACEDAMONIANS; and that for his own part, it was an eafier matter to enrich his fouldiers then himfelf. And furthermore, that the GRECIANS thought it a difhonour to them, to take any gift of their enemies, other then fpoils. This notwithstanding, to gratifie Tithraustes some what, for that he had taken revenge of a common enemy of all the GRECIANS: for the fum of thirty talents given him to defray his charges, he withdrew his Army out of Lydia, and went into PHRYGIA. In his journey he received from the Council of LACED & MON the Scytala and went into PHRYGIA. In his joining the track at the Chizzens had made him also their Geagestian or fcrowl of parchment wreathed about, advertifing him that the Chizzens had made him also their GeAgestian or fcrowl of parchment wreathed about, advertifing him that the Chizzens had made him also their GeAgestian or fcrowl of parchment wreathed about, advertifing him that the Chizzens had made him also their GeAgestian or fcrowl of parchment wreathed about, advertifing him that the Chizzens had made him also their GeAgestian or fcrowl of parchment wreathed about, advertifing him that the Chizzens had made him also their GeAgestian

In this not-demonians withstanding he was not to be blamed, when he made choice of one Pifander his wives brother, to be Navy. Lieutenant of the Navy, and forfook other Captains of better experience and elder years: feeking rather to pleafe his wife, and to advance one of his kin, then to regard the weal and fafety of his Country. Afterwards he led his Army into Pharnabazus Country which he had in charge, where he found not onely plenty of all forts of victuals, but gathered together also a wonderfull maffe of money. From thence he went into the Realm of PAPHIAGONIA, and made league there with King Corfe, Cotys King of From thence ne went must be recalled to the recall the for faking Pharnabazus, and came unto Agesslam: and after he was come to him, he never went from laws fiend. him, but always followed him wherefoever he went. Spythridates had a young Son that was paffing fair, called Megabetes (of whom Agesilaus had great liking) and likewise a fair young woman to his daughter, of age to be married, whom Agefilam cauled King Corys to marry. So taking of King Corys a thouland horfemen, and two thouland footmen light armed, he returned back to PHRYGIA, and there destroyed Pharnabazus Countrey which he had in Government, who durst not meet him in the field, nor truft to his holds, but still fled from him, carrying all the chiefest things with him, flitting from place to place, untill that Spythridates accompanied with Erippidas the SpAR- Agefilant TAN, followed him fonear, that he took his Camp, and all his treasure in it. But there did Erip draw Phana-pidas thew himself so hard and cruel, over-straightly searching our part of the spoil that had been begur out of imbezled, compelling the barbarous people to deliver it again, ranfacking every corner for it; histenn. that Spythridates was offended withall , that on a fudden he took the PAPHLAGONIANS with him, and went back unto the City of SARDIS. This more grieved Agefilant then any thing that hapened to him in all his journey, for that he loft fo valiant a man as Spyrbridates, and fuch a number of good fouldiers as he carried away with him. Moreover, he was afraid left they would detect him of miferable covetouiness, a thing which he ever was carefull to avoid, not onely in his own perfon, but also to keep all his Countrymen from it. But besides these known causes, the love he bare to Spythridates Son pinched him nearly, though when the Boy was with him, he strived with his own nature to subdue that naughry affection and desire he had of him. For when Megabetes on a time came to make much of him and to kifs him, Agefilaus turned his face from the Boy. The Boy being ashamed of the repulse, durst no more come to familiarly, but saluted him aloof off. Agestian then repented him that he had nor suffered Megabetes to kis him, made as though he marvelled why he did not kifs him as he was wont to do. Then answered some of his familiars about him: Your felf, O King, is in fault, because you durst not tarry, but were airaid to kis so fair a Boy: for if he knew your mind, he would come again, so that you turned your face no more away. When Agefilaus had heard them, he pauled a while, and faid never a word, but in fine answered them:

It shall not need you say any thing to him, for it would do me more good I could refuse such an other kifs again, than it all that I fee before me were gold. Thus was Agefilans dilposed when had come again into his presence, he would have rejused a kissat his hands. After that, Pharnaba-

Zur fought to speak with him, and one Apollophanes a CY ZICENIAN brought them together, that was a friend unto them both: Agefilant, was the first that met at the place appointed with his friends, and tarrying for Pharnabasas coming, he laid him down upon the deep grafs in the shadow, under a excellently wrought of divers colours, for him to fit upon the ground. But being shamed to see Agefiles laid on the bare ground in that fort, he also lay down by him, though he had upon him a marvellous rich Gown, of excellent Tiffue and passing colour. Now when they had embraced one another, Pharnabaxus began first to speak, and lacked no good perswasions and just complaints, for that he having been (as he was) a friend unto the LACED MONIANS in the War against the A-THENIANS, was then spoiled and sacked by them. Agessaus then finding that the SPARTANS that were about him at that meeting, hung down their heads for shame, not knowing how to answer him, confidering that Pharnabazus had injury offered him, began to speak in this manner: Heretosore when we were friends with the King (my Lord Pharnabazus) we have used his goods like friends, but now that we are his enemies, like enemies we use them : and since we see that thou wilt needs be a flave of his, marvel not though we hurt thee for his fake. But when thou shalt like rather to be a friend of the GRECIANS then a flave to the King of PERSIA, then make account that all these souldiers, this armour, our ships, and all we are to defend thy goods and liberty against him, without which, nothing that is honeft can be looked for of mortal men. Thereupon Pharnabazus told him his mind plainly: Surely, faid he, if the King do fend hither any other Captain to be his Lieutenant, be fure I will then take your part straight; but on the other fide, if he make me his Lieutenant in this War, trust to it, I will do him the best service I can against you. This answer passingly pleased Agefilam, who taking him by the hand, and rifing up with him, faid unto him: I would with (my Lord Pharmbazur) having so noble a mind as thou haif, that thou wert rather our friend then an enemy. So Pharnabazas departing from thence with his men, his Son being left behind, ran to Ageflane, and fmiling told him, King Agefilant, I will make thee my friend: and therewith gave him a dart he had in his hand. Agesslaus took it of him, and liking well the beauty of the young youth, and the courtese he had offered him, looked about him if any man in his company had any proper thing that he might beflow on him. At the laft he spied his Secretary Adam, horse, which had a rich raparison on : he straight took it from him, and gave the horse and surniture to this lively youth Pharnabazus Son, who never after forgat it. For it chanced afterwards, that being driven out of his Countrey by his brethren, and flying into PELOPONNESUS, Agefilans made very much of him, and did not flick to further him in his love abroad. For he had a great fancy and liking to a boy of ATHENS, whom they brought up in wreftling, one day to play for the best games. But when he was grown a big man and strong, and that he came to offer himself to be billed with them that should wraftle at the Games Olympical, being in some perill to be utterly resused; this Persian Agentian to bis friends, was that loved him, went unto Agestians, and belought his help, that this wrettler might not receive the without respect foil to be rejected. Agessland being desirous to please him, performed his request with some diffias a friend. chly. Thus Agefilaus in all things elfe was a frict observer of the Law; but in his friends causes to Agefilaus let- be desirable learning and in manager of indicate the friends. Ageflaur let- be ftraight laced in matters of justice, he faid that was but an excuse for them that would do nothing ter in the befor their friends. To this effect they find a letter of his written unto Idrain Prince of CARHA, for the delivery of his friend. If Nicias have not offended, let him go; if he have offended, then pardon him for my fake: but how loever it be, let him go. This was Ageflaus manner in the most part of his friends causes. Notwithstanding, occasions fell out often times, that he rather inclined to the benefit of the Commonwealth. As appeared one day when he was driven to remove in hafte on a fudden, Other read to and to leave one fick behind him whom he loved dearly; the fick man calling him by his name as have pity and he, was going his way, befought him that he would not for fake him. Agefilans (as Hieronymus the to be wife.

Philosopher reported) turned back again and faid: O how hard is it, both to love and to be wife!

Now had Agestians spent two years in this War, and was spoken of throughout As1A, being maring. Now had Agestians spent two years must were and for his great horefly, his continence, his courteste, and for his great horefly, his continence, his courteste, h and plain dealing. For when he rode out into the Country with his own train onely, he would ever lie in the holiest Temples of the gods, because he would the gods themselves should be witnesses of his private doings; whereas commonly we are loath that men should see what we do. Furthermore, amongst to many thousand fouldiers as were in his Camp, there could hardly be found a worse mattress then that himself did lie upon every night. And as for heat and cold, he could as easily away with either of both, as if by constitution of body he had been born to abide any weather or featon. But above all, it was a pleafant fight to the GRECIANS that dwelt in ASIA, when they faw the great Lords the Kings Lieutenants of PBR SIA (which before were proud, cruel, rich, and given to all luft and pleasure) to honour and fear a man that went up and down in a poor Cape, being afraid of every fhort word that he spake like a LACONIAN, infomuch as many of them called to mind the Poets veries, who said:

Now all Assa being up and in garboil, they willingly yielded to him in every place, after he had taken order with the Chies, and had established the liberty of their Commonweal, without any bloodshed, or banishment of any person : he determined to go further into the land, and transporting the wars from the fea coasts of GREECE, to fight with the King of Persia in proper person, and with the wealth and happiness of the ECBATANIANS and the Susianians, and by that means to his leifure from him, who fitting still before, made the GRECIANS make War one with another, by force of money corrupting the Governours of every City. In the mean time came Epyciday the LACONIAN unto him; and brought him news how SPARTA was grievously troubled with Agestant fent wars, enforced on them by the other GRECIANS: and that therefore the Ephori did fend for him for our of Affa. home, and commanded him to return to defend his Countrey, Ab wretched Greece, how cruell flaughters haft Thou brought upon thee, for to lay thee wast?

For how should a man otherwise call this envy, treason, and civil conspiracy among the GRECT-ANS, who overthrew their good fortune that made them happy before, turning their wars against the barbarous people out of GREECE, and now to bring it against themselves? I am not of Demaratus opinion the CORINTHIAN, that the faid GRECIANS delight was taken from them, which faw not Alexander the Great fitting in Darius Royal throne ; but rather I would think they should have wept, to have left this honour unto Alexander and the MACEDONIANS, fondly lofing fo many famous Captains of GREECE, at the battles of LEUCTRES, of CORONEA, of CORINTH and of ARCADIA. Nevertheles, Agefilaus never did better act in his life, nor ever shewed better ex- Agefilaus obeample of obedience and justice due to his Countrey, then he did in his return home. For fith Hannibal dience to his that began to have ill success in his Wars, being in a manner driven out of ITALY, thought never Countrey. (but sompelled) to return again into his Countrey, to obey his Countreymen, which called him home to defend the Warsthe ROMANS had made artheir own doors; and that Alexander the Great also being fent home upon the like occasion, did not onely refuse to return into MACEDON, but made a jest at it, when news was brought him of the great battle which his Lieutenant Antipater had fought with King Agis, faying: Methinks when I hear these news, whilest we are overcoming of King Darius here, there hath been a battle of Rattes fought in ARCADIA. Sith then (I fay) these two famous Captains have made so little account of their Country, may we not think the City of SPARTA Lleffed to have had fuch a King, that fo much reverenced his Country and obeyed the Law, as receiving onely a little fcrowl of Parchment commanding him to return, he forfook a world of goods and wealth that he quietly enjoyed (with affured hope and certainty of more) and imbarked forthwith, leaving all the allies and confederates of his Country very forrowfull, for that he had given over so noble an enterprise, which he had so happily begun? Yes sure: Nay furthermore he passed not for the saying of Demostratus PHEACIAN, who said, that the LACEDEMO-NIANS, in publick matters were the worthieft men, and the ATHENIANS in private causes. For as he had shewed himself a good King and an excellent Captain to the Commonwealth, so was he always courteous privately to his familiar friends. And because the Persian coin was stamped on the one fide, with the print of an Archer ; Agefilaus being ready to depart, faid, that Agefilaus dark ten thouland Archers drave him out of ASIA. For so much was brought unto THEBES and A. speech. In his return Agestlaw having paffed the straight of HELLESPONT, took his way through the Countrey of THRA-CIA, and never entreated barbarous King nor people to fuffer him to pass, but onely sent unto them to know whether they would he should pass through their Countrey as a friend, or an enemy. All Countries and Nations else receded very honourably to their power, fave the people called THRO-CHALIANS, unto whom King Xerxes himself gave presents that he might pass friendly through their Countrey: who fent unto Agefilans to demand a hundred filver talents, and an hundred women Agefilans deto fuffer him to pals through their Countrey. But Acefilaus laughing them to fcorn, answered a fpifing and degain: Why, how chanceth it that they came not themselves to receive them? The King made him answer, he would confider of it. Well, let him think of it, quoth Agefilans: we will go on in the mean time. The King then wondering at his great boldness, and fearing left he would do him fome hurt as he went, fent to pray him that he would pass through his Countrey as a friend. Now it chanced to that the THESSALIANS at that time were in league with the enemies of the LACEDEMONIANS: therefore as he passed through their Countrey, he did spoil and forrage it as his Enemies Countrey, and fent Xenocles and Scytha to the City of LARISSE, hoping to perswade them to take part with the LACEDEMONIANS. These two Ambassadours were retained there as prisoners. The SPARTANS were marvellously offended withall: and thought good that Agesilaus should besiege LARISSE with his Army. But he answered them, he would not lose one of those men, to win all THESSALIE: and therefore found means that he redeemed them again by composition. Peradventure this is not to be marvelled at in Agestians that news being brought him on a time, that in a great battle fought by the City of CORINTH, where were many worthy and valuant Captains slain of the Enemies, and but few of the SPARTANS, he feemed not to rejoyce at it, but rather to fetch a grievous figh, saying: O poor GREECE, how unfortunate art thou, to have flain with thine own hands fo many valiant Captains of thine own people, as joyning together, might at one field have overcome all the

had come again into his presence, he would have resused a kils at his hands. After that, Pharnaba-Zur fought to speak with him, and one Apollophanes a CY ZICENIAN brought them together, that was a friend unto them both: Agefilant, was the first that mer at the place appointed with his friends, and tarrying for Pharnabaxus coming, he laid him down upon the deep grafs in the shadow, under a Tair great tree. Pharnabazus also came thither, and they spread fost skins long haired, and Tapestry excellently wrought of divers colours, for him to fit upon the ground. But being shamed to see Agefilam laid on the bare ground in that fort, he also lay down by him, though he had upon him a marvellous rich Gown, of excellent Tiffue and passing colour. Now when they had embraced one another, Pharnabazus began fust to speak, and lacked no good perswasions and just complaints, for that he having been (as he was) a friend unto the LACED & MONIANS in the War against the A-THEMIANS, was then spoiled and sacked by them. Agestlans then finding that the SPARTANS that were about him at that meeting, hung down their heads for shame, not knowing how to answer him, confidering that Pharnabazus had injury offered him, began to speak in this manner: Heretosore when we were friends with the King (my Lord Pharnabazus) we have used his goods like friends, but now that we are his enemies, like enemies we use them : and since we see that thou wilt needs be a flave of his, marvel not though we hurt thee for his fake. But when thou shalt like rather to be a friend of the GRECIANS then a flave to the King of PERSIA, then make account that all these souldiers, this armour, our ships, and all we are to defend thy goods and liberty against him, without which, nothing that is honest can be looked for of mortal men. Thereupon Pharmabazus told him his mind plainly: Surely, faid he, if the King do fend hither any other Captain to be his Lieutenant, be fure I will then take your part straight; but on the other side, if he make me his Lieutenant in this sure I will then take your part straight; but on the other side, if he make me his Lieutenant in this sure I will do him the best service I can against you. This answer passingly pleased Agefilam, who taking him by the hand, and rifing up with him, faid unto him: I would with (my Lord Pharnabazus) having so noble a mind as thou hast, that thou wert rather our friend then an enemy. So Pharnabazas departing from thence with his men, his Son being left behind, ran to Ageflase, and fmiling told him, King Agefilans, I will make thee my friend : and therewith gave him a dart he had in his hand. Agestians took it of him, and liking well the beauty of the young youth, and the courtefie he had offered him, looked about him if any man in his company had any proper thing that he might bestow on him. At the last he spied his Secretary Adams horse, which had a rich raparison on : he straight took it from him, and gave the horse and surniture to this lively youth Pharnabaxus Son, who never after forgat it. For it chanced afterwards, that being driven out of his Countrey by his brethren, and flying into Peloponnesus, Agefilans made very much of him, and did not flick to further him in his love abroad. For he had a great fancy and liking to a boy of ATHENS, whom they brought up in wreftling, one day to play for the best games. But when he was grown a big man and strong, and that he came to offer himself to be billed with them that should wraftle at the Games Olympical, being in some perill to be utterly resuled; this Persian Ageflus to fhould wratte at the Games Chympinan, using in the state of the might not receive the his friends was that loved him, went unto Ageflust, and belough his help, that this wreftler might not receive the his friends was that loved him, went unto Ageflust, and belough him performed his request with some diffiwithout respect foil to be rejected. Thus Agefilaus in all things elfe was a frict observer of the Law: but in his friends causes to Agefilaus let- be desirable learning to the law. be straight laced in matters of justice, he said that was but an excuse for them that would do nothing for their friends. To this effect they find a letter of his written unto Idrain Prince of CARHA, for the delivery of his friend. If Xicias have not offended, let him go; if he have offended, then pardon him for my fake: but how foever it be, let him go. This was Agefilans manner in the most part of his friends causes. Notwithstanding, occasions fell out often times, that he rather inclined to the benefit of the Commonwealth. As appeared one day when he was driven to remove in hafte on a sudden, Other read to and to leave one fick behind him whom he loved dearly: the fick man calling him by his name as have pity and he, was going his way, befought him that he would not forfake him. Agefilaus (as Hieronymus the Philosopher reported) turned back again and faid: O how hard is it, both to love and to be wife! Now had Agestians spent two years in this War, and was spoken of throughout ASIA, being maragefilms ver. velloully commended to the King himself, and for his great honesty, his continence, his courtesse, and plain dealing. For when he rode out into the Country with his own train onely, he would ever lie in the holiest Temples of the gods, because he would the gods themselves should be witnesses of his private doings; whereas commonly we are loath that men should see what we do. Furthermore, amongst so many thousand souldiers as were in his Camp, there could hardly be found a worse mattress then that himself did lie upon every night. And as for heat and cold, he could as easily away with either of both, as if by constitution of body he had been born to abide any weather or season. barbarous people? The PHARSALIANS harrying and troubling the receward of Agefilans Army, Agefilau over he put forth five hundred horsemen which gave him so lusty a charge, that he overthrew them by force. For this victory, he fet up tokens of Triumph upon the mountain called Narthacium, and this victory pleafed him above all the reft, because with the small number of horsemen which he had gotten together of himfelf, he had overthrown the glory and pride of the enemies horfemen in bat-tle, whereof they had vaunted many years before. Thither came Diphridae one of the Ephories unto him, fent of purpole from SPARTA, to command him immediately to invade Bo EOT1A, with his Army. Now though Agefilans intended some other time with a greater power to enter BOFOTIA, yet because he would not disobey the Councils commandment of SPARTA, he told his men straight, that the battle for the which they returned out of Asia was at hand, and therefore he fent for two Companies of them which lay in Camp by CORINTH. The LACEDAMONIANS that were at Sparta, to honour Agefilaus for that he had obeyed their commandment to readily, proclaimed in the City, that as many young men as were defirous to go aid the King, should come to enter their names. Notwithstanding, they onely chose but fifty of the valiantest among them, and sent them tunto him. In the mean time, Agessians passed through the Countrey of THERMOPYLES, and coafting over the land of PHOCIDE, confederates to the LACEDEMONIANS, he entred into Boe-OTIA, and camped by the City of CHERONIA: where immediately after his arrival, he suddenly faw the Sun Eclipsed, and darkned in the fashion of a new Moon. Even withall, came the news of the death of Pifander unto him, who was flain in a battle which he had loft by fea, fighting against The Eclipse of Plander, Ge Pharnabazus and Conon, hard by the Isle of GNIDOS. and become faint-hearted, being ready to joyn battle, he commanded them that came from the Sea, to brute abroad a contrary tale to that they sold him : and he himfelf to make good their speech, came out among them, with a Garland of flowers on his head, and did facrifice to the gods, as thanking them for their good news, fending to every one of his friends a piece of flesh facrificed, as he commonly used to do, in any publick cause of joy. Then marching forward, he straight discovered his enemies far off, and they likewise him : and thereupon put his men in battle ray, and gave the left wing unto the ORCHOMENIANS, leading himself the right wing. The THEBANS on the other side, placed themselves in the right wing of their Army, and gave the left unto the ARGIVES. Xenophon being at that battle on Agefilans fide, writeth that he never knew of the like field fought. At the first onser, the consist was not great between both, neither held long, because the THE BANS brake the ORCHOMENIANS straight, and Agesilaus the ARGIVES. But when either fide underftood that the left wings of their battle were in great diffres, and that they turned their backs, they returned fuddenly again. And where Agesslaus might easily have had the victory without any danger, if he had suffered the squadron of the enemies to pass by him, and afterwards to have charged ed them in the rereward: of a noble courage to shew his valiantness, he gave charge upon the vaward, to have honour in overcoming them. The THEBANS on the other fide no less valiantly received him, and fought luftily on all hands: but the cruellest fight was about Agestians person, with the fifty young men that were fent to guard him, who shewed themselves very valiant. Agefilans was fore hurt, notwithftanding their valiant refuftance, his armour being paffed through with their Pikes and Swords in fundry places : Whereupon they environed him round amongst them, and kept him from the Enemies, killing a great number of them, and many of themselves also being killed. In fine, finding the THEBANS too strong in the vaward, they were forced to do that which they refused at the first: and opening themselves, gave them passage through them. So when they were passed them, the SPARTANS perceiving how loosely and disorderly they marched, as thinking themselves out of all danger, followed them and gave charge upon their flanck. But all this could not make the THEBANS fly: for they rejoycing for their victory at this battle, Helicon mons. retired fair and foftly unto the mountain Helicon. But Agefilaus notwithstanding he was very The worthiness fore hurt, with many a grievous wound, would not go into his Pavillion to be dressed, before he had of Agesslaus. been first at the place where the battle was fought, and had feen his men that were slain brought The Temple of away in their armours. As many of his enemies as were fled into the Temple of Minerva Itonian, Minerus Itoni- which was not far from thence (where also were set up tokens of triumph offered unto her a long time beforethe THEBANS, when they had overcome the Army of the ATHENIANS, under the conduct of Sparton their Captain, and had flain also Tolmides their Captain in the field) he commanded his men they should let them go where they would. The next morning by break of day, Agefilans defirous to fee if the THEBANS had any courage to come down to fight again, commanded his fooldiers to put Garlands upon their heads, and his Mustitians to found their Shalms or Pipes, whileft he did fet up a token of Triumph as victorious. Moreover, his enemies fending to him to ask leave to take away their dead men, he granted them truce for the time, and thereby confirmed his victory. After that, being carried to the City of DELPHOS, where the Pythian games were played, he made a folemn procession and common facrifice unto Apollo, and offered him the tenth part of all his spoils which he had brought out of ASIA, which amounted to the sum of an hundred Talents. This thing done, he returned into his Country, where he was greatly honoured and efteemed of all his Citizens and Countrymen, for his orderly life and noble behaviour: The confluory for he was no Changeling, but the felf same man in state and condition that he was before he took his journey. He transformed not himself into strangers manners, as commonly other Caprains 60, that return out of a far Countrey where they have made Wars: neither did he foorn his Country fashions, or shewed himself disobedient to the Laws thereof, but alwaies kept and obferved them, without any manner of alteration in his meat and drink, in washing or bathing, in his Wives apparell, in his armoury, or any way elle in his houshold stuff, as if he had never passed over the River of Eurotas. Yet further, he left his old gates flanding, that were of fo great continuance, that they were thought to be those which Aristodemus had set up. Xenophon also said, that his daughters Canathrum was nothing more fumptuous then any others were. Xenophon wrote not what was the name of this daughter of Agesilans : and Dicaarehus also was much offended, that they neither knew Agesslaus daughters name, nor yet the mother of Epaminoridas. Yet we find in the LACONIAN Chronicles, that Agefilaus wives name was Cleara, one of his daughters Cleara, the called Applia, and the other Prolyta. And for them that either were, or had been his enemies, he did them no hurt openly: but found the means to make some of them to be fent as Lieutenants of Armies, or The policy of otherwife to have charge in the Wars. In fine, he made it openly known, what coverous and Ageltan to wicked men they had been in their charges: fo that when they were accused of it before the Council, win his enehe would then help and intreat for them. By this means he made them again his friends, where mies. they had been his enemies: infomuch as in the end, he had not one enemy at all. For the other King Agefilaus, and Agesspolis his colleague, whose father had been banished, he being a very young man, and of a Agesspolis, gentle nature, medled not greatly with government of the Commonwealth. Neverthelets, he to behaved himfelf unto Agefilaus that he made him his very good friend : for both the Kings when they were in the City, did eat together in one hall. Then Agesilans knowing that Agesipolis (as him-felf) was given to love, would ever minister talk to him of the goodly young boys of the City, enticing him to love some one of them, which he himself did love: and therein he was both his companion and helper. For inthefe LACONIAN loves there was no manner of difhonetty offered, but a true affection and honest regard to frame the boy beloved unto vertue and honest conditions: as we have more amply declared in the life of Lycurgus. Agefilam by this means, having the tions: as we have more amply uccutation in his hands, made his half brother Teleusias General whole authority (above all men in the City) in his hands, made his half brother Teleusias General whole authority (above all men in the City) in his hands, made his half brother Teleusias, Ageby fea, and himself with the Army by land went to befiege the City of CORINTH, where with his situate half brobrothers help by fea he took the long walls of the fame. The Arg IVES which kept CORINTH thermade Gearthat time, at Agesilam arrival there, were solemnizing the feast of the Isthmian games: who need of the made them flie, even as they came from facrificing unto the god Neptune, driving them to leave all Army by fee. their preparation and foleranity. Then divers banished men of CORINTH that were in his Army, befought him that he would keep these Ishmian games: but he denied them, yet was contented they should themselves solemnize them , and so himself remained there , during the time of the feaft, for their fafety. Afterwards, when Agefilam was gone thence, the Argives returned and did celebrate the Ifthmian games, and there were fome of them which having won the game at the first, did also win it at the second time : and others that were victorious before, were this second time overcome. Whereupon Agefilam faid, that the ARGIVES shewed themselves rank cowards, that efteening so much (as they did) these plays and sacrifices, they durst not once offer to fight with him for defence of the fame. For himself, touching such like sports and games, he ever thought it good to keep a mean, and not to be too curious. For he was contented to honour fuch folemn affemblies and common feafts with his prefence, as were commonly used in Sparta, and took great pleasure to see the sports between the young Boys and Girles of Sparta; howber it touching the games, he seemed not to be acquainted with some of them, wherein others had great delight. As we read, that Callipides an excellent Stage Player (wonderfully efteemed of among the GRECIANS for a fingular man in that Art) meeting Agefilam on a time, at the first did his duty to him, and then arrogantly thrust himself among them that walked with him, thinking the AGESILAUS. King would have made much of him: but perceiving he made no countenance to him, in the end he asked him: O King Agefilaus, do you not know me? Agefilaus looking upon him, answered: What, are not thou Callipides the Stage-Player? and so made no surther account of him. So, whilft Ageflians was in the territory of CORINTH (where he had taken the Temple of Juno) beholding his fouldiers forraging and spoiling the Countrey round about, Ambassadours came to him from Theres, to pray him to make peace with the Therans. But he that always hated the THEBANS, and belides that thought it then very requifite for the good fuccels of his doings, to make light of it, feemed as he neither heard nor faw them that spake unto him. But even at that very instant, as by divine revenge to cry quittance, there fell a great mishap upon him: for before the Ambassadors were gone from him, he had news that one of their bands called the Mothers, were flain every man by Iphicrates: which was the greatest loss that they in a long time before had fuftained. For they loft a great number of valiant fouldiers, all naturall LACED &-MONIANS: who being well armed every man, were flain by naked or light armed hirelings. Thereupon Agesilaus went straight into the field with hope to fave them, or at the least to be revenged: but receiving certain intelligence by the way that they were all flain, he returned again to the Temple of Juno from whence he came, and then fent for the Ambaffadours of the BOROTI-ANS, to give them audience. But they, to requite his former difdain unto them, made no manner of speech of peace, but onely requested him to suffer them to enter into CORINTH. Agefilans being offended, answered them: If it be to see your friends triumph of their Victory, ye may fafely do it to morrow. Thereupon the next morning taking the Ambaffadours with him, he deftroyed the CORINTHIANS Countrey, even to the walls of their City. And when he had made the Ambassadors fee, that the Citizens of CORINTH durst not come out into the field to defend their Countrey, he gave them leave to depart. Then taking the remain of that band that was overthrown, which by flight had cleaped, he brought them into LACED.EMON again, always removing his Camp before day, and never encamped till dark night, because the Arcadians (their mortal enemies) should not rejoyce at their loss. After this voyage, to gratifie the A-CHAIANS, he entred with them into the Countrey of ACARNANIA, and brought great spoils from thence, after he had overcome them in battle. Moreover, when the ACHAIANS belought him to remain with them all the Winter, to keep his enemies from fowing of their ground, he made them answer, he would not. For, faid he, they will be afraid of War the next year, when all their fields shall be sowen with Corn: and so indeed it came to pass. For the Army returning again, they made peace incontinently with the ACHAIANS. About that time, Pharnabazus and Conon, with the King of Persia's Army, being Lords of the Sea, without let of any deftroyed and spoiled all the coaft of LACONIA. Moreover, the City of ATHENS did rear up her walls again by the help of Pharnabazus money, wherewith he had furnished them. Thereupon the LACEDEMONI-ANS thought good to make peace with the King of Persia, and to that end fent Antaleidas Ambassador unto Tiribazus, most shamefully and cruelly betraying to the King, the GRECIANS inhabiting in ASIA, for whole liberty Agefilan had made Wars with him before. So, it was Agefilaus hap not to be foiled with any part of this shame : for Amaleidas that was his enemy, sought all the means he could to conclude this peace, for that he faw War did daily encrease the authority, honour, and tame of Agefilans. Norwithflanding, he answered one of them, that reproved him for that the LACEDEMONIANS did favour the MEDES: No, faid he, they do not fo, but the MEDES do play the LACED&MONIANS. Nevertheless, threatning War to all the GRECIANS, which would not agree to the conditions of this peace, he compelled them to yield unto that the King of PERSIA liked. But furely he did this chiefly for respect of the THEBANS, to the end that they being enforced by the capitulations of the peace, to fet the Countrey of BOEOTIA at liberty again, should be so much the weaker. This plainly appeared soon after by that that followed. For Phabidas ha-Phibitas pof- ving committed a foul act, in open peace to take the Caftle of the City of THEBES, called Cadmea, felich the Ca. offending thereby all the other GRECIANS (and the SPARTANS themselves also not being very file of Calmets well pleased withall, and those specially which were Agesians enemies) Phebidas being asked in great anger, at whose commandment he had done that ludden enterprise, to lay all the suspition of the fact upon him, Agefilaus for Phebidas discharge, letted not openly to say, that the quality of the fact was to be confidered of, whether it were profitable for the Commonwealth, or not : and that it was well done of him, the thing falling out profitable for his Countrey, to do it of his own head without commandment. All this notwithflanding he was wont to fay in private talk, that juffice was the chiefeft of all vertues, and therefore that valiantness withour juffice was of no validity, and that it all men were just, valiantness were of no estimation. And to them that told him, the great King will have it to: Why, faid he, and wherein is he better then my felf, if he be no juster? Judging very wifely therein, that they should esteem a King (whether he was of great or fmall power) by his justice, as by the beam of Princely ballance. When peace was concluded, the King of PERSIA having fent him a private letter desiring his friendship, Agestlaus resuled it, saying: that common friendship was enough betwirt them, and that they should need none other, so ESILAUS.

long as that was kept. But this notwithstanding, when it came to the point of performance, he went from his first good opinion, and gave place to his will and ambition, specially against the THEBANS, at that time when he did not onely fave Phebidas, but also procured the City of SPARTA to take the fault upon them which he had committed; and to justifie it, by keeping the Castle of Cadmen still and making Archias and Leontidas Governours of the City of THEBES, by whom Phabidas came by the Castle of Cadmea, and possessed it. Thereupon every man thought straight, that Phabidas was he that had put the matter in execution , but that Agefilans gave the counsell to do it : as things falling out afterwards, did manifeftly prove the fulpition true. For, after that the THE-BANS had driven the Garrison of the LACEDEMONIANS out of the Castle of Cadmea, and restored their City again to liberty, burthening them that they had traiterously slain Archias and Leontidas (who indeed were Tyrants, though in name Governours) he made War with them : and Cleombrotus, reigning then King with him after Agespolu death, was sent before into BOBOTIA with an Army: Agefilaus was dispensed with by law for going any more to the Wars, by reason of his age, for that he was fourty years old from the first growth of hair on his face, and therefore went not that journey: being alhamed that the THEBANS should now see him fight to revenge the Tyrants deaths, who had but a little before taken Arms for the banished men, against the PHLI-ASIANS. At that time there was a LACONIAN called Sphodrias, of the contrary faction unto Agefilans: and was then Governour in the City of THES PIES, a valiant and fout man of his hands, Sthedriar ortbut ever fuller of vain hope, then of good judgment. He defiring fame, and supposing that Phabidas the house of came to dignity and great estimation through his valiant enterprize at THEBES: perswaded himself Piras at Athat he should win much more honour, if of himself he took the haven of Pirea, suddenly stealing upon the Athenians by land, cutting them off by that means from all trade by fea. It was though commonly that this was a practife devised by Pelopidas and Gelon, Governours of BOEDTIA, who had allured certain men to fain themselves very devout and friendly to the LACEDEMONIANS. These men praising and extolling Sphodrias to his face, put him in the head that they knew none so worshy as himself alone, to take in hand so noble an enterprise. Thus by their perswasions they trained him on to this attempt, which for vileness was nothing inferior unto that treacherous winning of the Castle of Cadmea at THEBES: although it was attempted with less hardiness and diligence. For day was broken when he was yet in the plain of THRIASIUM, where he made account to have been at the walls of Pirea by night. Furthermore it is reported, that the men he brought with him, feeing certain fires from the Temples of the City of Eleusin, were all afraid and amazed : yea he himfelf also fainted perceiving he was discovered, and so turned back with shame and dishonour to the City of THESPIES, without any exploit done, faving onely a little spoil taken. Thereupon accusers were straight sent from ATHENS unto SPARTA, who upon their arrival found that they needed Sphodrius senot accuse him, for that the Council and Governours of the City had already sent for him to come un- culed of tretto them, to condemn him of high treason. But he durst not return to Sparta, fearing the fury of for, his Countrymen, thinking indeed that they would feem as though the wrong had been done to them, because it should not be thought that they had caused it to be done. This Sphodrian had a Son called (leonymus, a very fair Boy, with whom Archidamus (Agefilaus Son) was far in love: who then was marvellous forry to fee this Boy he loved, in so great danger to lose his Father, and yet durft not be feen to help him, because Sphodrias was one of Agestians: adversaries. Notwithstanding, Cleonyones making his moan to him with tears in his eyes, and praying him to pacifie his Father Agest-lans (whom they feared above all men elfe) Archidamus followed his father three or four days to- How Sphodrias gether, and durst not break the matter to him: in fine, the day of the next Session being at hand, was laved from when judgment should be given on Sphodriss, he boldly ventured to tell him, how that Cleonymus death; had prayed him to be an humble fuiter to him touching his Fathers fact. Ageflians understanding that his Son loved Cleonymus, would not withdraw him from loving him, because the Boy even from his childhood gave alwaies good hope that one day he would fure make as honest a man as any other wholoever: neither made he any countenance to his Son, as though he would do any thing at his fuit, but onely answered him, for that, he would do as became him in such a case. Whereupon Archidamus being bashfull, lest coming any more to Cleonymus, where before he would see him oftentimes in a day. This made Sehodrias friends despair of his life more then before, until Etymocles, one of Agefilasu familiars talking with them, told them that for the fact it felf, Agefilam thought it a shamefull deed, and as much disliked it as might be : but for Sphodrias felf, that he took him for a valiant man, and faw that the Commonwealth had need of men of fuch service. This was Agesslaus common talk to please his Son, when any man came to speak to him of Sphodrias acculation. Insomuch that Cleonymus found straight how Archidamus had dealt as faithfully and friendly for him as might be: and then Sphodrias friends also took heart again unto them, to folicite his cause, and to be earnest suiters for him. Agestians 2- Agestians cocmong other had this special property, that he loved his children dearly: and a tale goeth of him, that kered his chilhe would play with them in his house when they were little ones, and ride upon a little cock-horse, drentoo much. or a reed, as on horfeback: infomuch as a friend of his taking him one day with the manner, playing among his children, he prayed him to fay nothing, till he had little children himfelf. In fine, Sphodrias was quit by his Judges. The ATHENIANS understanding it, fent to proclaim War with the LACEDEMONIANS. Whereupon Agefilans was much reproved, because that to please the fond affection of his Son, he had hindered justice, and brought his City to be accused among the GREGIANS for fuch grievous crimes. Agefilans perceiving that King Chembrotus his companion went with no very good will to make War with the THEBANS, he breaking the order fet down Agefilian jour- for leading of the Army, which was kept before, went to the Wars himself in person, and so inny into Bestit. vading BOEOTIA, he both received and did great hurt. Whereupon Antalcidas feeing him hurt one day, Now truly (aid he) the THEBANS have paid you your deferved hire, for teaching them against their will to be souldiers, that neither had will nor skill to fight. For indeed they the THE-BANS became better fouldiers and warriours than they were before, being daily trained and exercifed in Arms through the continual invations of the LACEDEMONIANS. Also this was the reason, why the old Father Lycurgus his laws called Rhetra, did forbid them to make war too oft with one Rhetta, of Ly- feli people, because that by compulsion they should not be made expert souldiers. For this cause did the confederates of LACEDAMON hate Agefilans, faying, that it was not for any known offence to the state, but for very spite and private malice of his own, that he sought to undo the THEBANS in this manner: and that to follow his humour, they confumed themselves going yearly to the Wars one while this way, another while that way, without any necessity at all, following a few LACED. &-MONIANS, themselves being always the greater number. Then it was, that Agefilans desiring Agefilias fub. to make them fee what number of men of War they were, used this device. On a time he commanded all the allies to fit down together one with another by themselves, and the IACEDÆMONI-ANS also by themselves. Then he made an Herauld proclaim that all Pot-makers should stand upon their feet. When they were up, he made them cry to the Brafiers to rife alfo. After them in like manner, the Carpenters: then the Masons, and so consequently all occupations one after another. So that at the length the confederates obeying the proclamation, were all in manner on their feet, The LACEDEMONIANS, not one of them role: because all base mechanical crass were forbidden them to occupy. Then Ageilans laughing at them : Lo, my friends (faid he) do you not fee now that we bring moe fouldiers to the field then ye do? At his return from this journey of THE-BES, passing by the City of MEGARA, as he went up into the Council-house within the Castle, Agefilaus fell there fuddenly took him a great Cramp in his left leg, that swelled extreamly, and put him to great fuddenly fick of a dangerous pain, men thinking that it was but blood which had filled the veins: a Physician of Syracus a in SIGILE being there straight opened a vein under the Ankle of his foot, which made the pain to cease: notwithstanding there came such abundance of blood, that they could not stanch it, so that he swounded oft, and was in great danger of present death. In fine, a way was found to stop it, and they carried him to LACEDEMON, where he lay fick a long time, fo that he was past going to the wars any more. The SPARTANS in the mean time received great overthrows both by fea and land, and among other, their greatest overthrow was at the battle of LEUCTRES, where the THEBANS overcame and slew them in plain battle. Then the GRECIANS were all of one mind to make a general peace, and thereupon came Ambassadors and Deputies from all the Cities of GREECE, and met at LACEDAMON to that end. One of these Deputies was Epaminondas, a the Phibata fent notable learned man, and a famous Philosopher, but as yet unskilfull in Wars. He feeing how the other Ambassadors curried savour with Agestlant, onely he of the rest kept his gravity to speak freely, and made an Oration, not for the THEBANS alone, but for all GREECE in general, declaring to them all, how wars did onely encrease the greatness and power of the City of SPARTA, and contrarily did minish and decay all other Cities and Towns of GREECE: and for this cause, that he did counfel them all to conclude a good and perfect peace indifferently for all to the end it might contime the longer, when they were all alike. Agefilant perceiving then that all the GRECIANS prefent at the affembly gave him good ear, and were glad to hear him speak thus boldly of peace, asked him openly, if he thought it meet and reasonable, that all BOEOTIA should be set clear at liberty again? Epaminondan presently and boldly again asked him, if he thought it just and requisite to fer all LACONIA clear again at liberty? Azefilaus being offended therewith, flood up on his feet, twist Agefilans and commanded him to answer plainly whether they would fet all BJEOTIA at liberty or not? Epaand Epiminan minondas replied unto him with the felf fame speech again, and asked him whether they would ass for the li berry of Bania fet all LACONIA at liberty or not? That netled Agestians so, that (being also glad of such a cloak, for the old grudge he ever bare unto the THEBANS) he prefently put the name of the THEBANS out of the Bill of those which should have been comprised within the league, and cryed open Wars upon them in the Market-place. For the reft he licenfed the other Deputies and Ambassadors of the people of GREECE to depart, with this conclusion, that they should lovingly take order among themselves for the controversite betwitt them, if they could peaceably agree together: and they that could not fall to such agreement, that then they should try it by wars, for it was a hard thing to take up all quarrels among them. King Cleombroins by chance was at that time in the Countrey of PHOCIDE with his Army, unto whom the Ephori wrote, that he should forthwith spoil the THE-BANS Countrey: and therewith also they sent to all their confederates to come and aid them, which had no great fancy to the journey, and were loth to make War with them, but yet durft not refuse to go, nor disobey the LACEDEMONIANS. And notwithstanding that there were many fignes prelaging ill luck, as we have written in the life of Epaminondas, and that Prothous LACONIAN was against the enterprise of this war all that he could, Agessians would needs forward, hoping he had now found opportunity to be revenged of the THEBANS, fish all GREECE besides was in peace and at liberty, themselves onely exempted from Treaty of peace. If there had been no other thing in it but the very shortness of time, that made it manifest enough that this war was begun in a jeer, without any manner of reason. For the general peace amongst the GRECIANS was concluded at SPARTA the fourteenth of May, and the LACEDAMONIANS were overcome at the battle of LEUCTRES the fifth of June: fo as there was but twenty days between them. There were flain a thousand LACE-DEMONIANS with their King Cleombrotus, and the choicest and the valiantest Spartans a- The Lacedabout him. Among them was allo flain that goodly young man Cleonymus, Sphodrias Son, of whom moniass flain bout him. Among them was also lian triat goodily young main the triple of the foot, three times got up again, at the battle of we spake before: who having been beaten down thrice at the Kings stoot, three times got up again, at the battle of the spake before is who having been beaten down thrice at the Kings stoot, three times got up again, at the battle of the spake before is who having been beaten down thrice at the Kings stoot, three times got up again, at the battle of the spake before is who having been beaten down thrice at the Kings stoot, three times got up again, at the battle of the spake before is who having been beaten down thrice at the Kings stoot, three times got up again, at the battle of the spake before is who having been beaten down thrice at the Kings stoot, three times got up again, at the battle of the spake before is who having been beaten down thrice at the Kings stoot, three times got up again, at the battle of the spake before is who having been beaten down thrice at the Kings stoot, three times got up again, at the battle of the spake before is who having been beaten down thrice at the kings stoot, the spake before is who having been beaten down thrice at the kings stoot, the spake before is who have the spake before it will be spaked by the spake before it will be spaked by the spake before it will be spaked by the spaked by but at the length was slain, valiantly fighting against the THERANS. notwithflanding deserved no less honour and commendation for her fortitude and worthiness, then flain.

Cleonymus the did the victorious City of Thebes. For as Xenophon writeth, that as among good men even in Son of Sphetable talk, and in their sports and mirth, there falleth out ever some thing of wit worth the noting drive flain at and bearing away: even to in like cate, no less but rather more, ought Noblemens words to be Cleombroaus we ghed, and their countenances marked, as well in adverfity as in prosperity. At that time by chance foot. there was a common feast day in the City of Sparta, which was full of strangers that came to see Xengtions say-the dances and sports of them that shewed naked in the Theatre, when as the messengers arrived that brought the news of the battle loft at LEUCTRES. The Ephori knowing then that the rumour ftraight ran all about, that they were all undone, and how they loft the figniory and commandment over all Greece, would not fuffer them for all this to break off their dance in the Theatre, nor the City in any thing to change the form of their feast, but sent unto the parents (to of the Spartant every mans houle) to let them understand the names of them that were slain at the battle, they themselves remaining still in the Theatre to see the dances and sports continued, to judge who carried the best Gameaway. The next morning when every man knew the number of them that were flain, and of those also that were escaped, the parents and friends of them that were dead, met in the Market-place, looking chearfully on the matter, and one of them embraced another. On the other fide, the parents of them that escaped, kept their houses with their Wives, as folk that mourned. If any of them had occasion to go abroad out of their houses for any matter of neceffity, ye would fee him look fo heavily and fad, that he durft not talk with you, lift up his head, The fortiode nor look you in the face. Belides all this, even amongst the women there was greater difference: for of the Spartan themothers of them that were to return from the battle, were fad and forrowfull, and spake not a Women. word: contrarily, the mothers of them that were flain, went friendly to vifit one another, to rejoyce together. Now when the people faw that their confederates began to forfake them, and did daily look that Epaminondas glorying in his victory, would invade Peloponnesus, then they began to be pricked in confcience about the Oracles of the gods, thinking that this misfortune came to their City for that they had thrust out of the Kingdom a man perfect of limbs, to place an impotent person, being specially warned by the gods to beware of that above all things. This notwithstanding, they had him in such veneration for his valiantness, and his authority was such thereby, that they did not onely use him in War as their King and soveraign Captain, but in civil causes also wherein there rose any question, they ever used his counsel and advice: as they did, when they durst not punish them (according to the penal laws) that fled from the battle, whom they call at SPAR- Tresants be not punish them (according to the penal taws) that the first the states whole they can be covards, or TA Trefantas (being a great number of them, and men of the nobled houses, and of greatest power faint heatred er within the City) left they should move some stir or commotion among them. For by law, they men. can bear no Office in the Commonwealth: it is shame and reproach to give them any wives, and Punishment as alfo to marry any of theirs: who foever meeteth them, may lawfully strike them, and they must a Sparia, for bide it, and not give them a word again: they are compelled to wear the poor tottered cloth cowardly foul-Gowns, patched with cloth of divers colours; and worst of all, to shave one side of their beards, diets. and not the other. Whereupon, finding the danger great to deal with them, to execute the law according, to the infamy they deferved, specially then standing in need of a great number of men of War, they referred themselves altogether unto Agehlaus, to take such order in it as he thought good: but Agefilaus then, without changing or altering any thing of the law, faid in open affembly at Laced.emon, that for that day they should let the law alone, notwithstanding, that afterwards it should stand in force. By this policy he kept the law inviolate, and saved also the honour of those poor men : and withall, to put these youths again in heart, being amazed with this sear, he led the Army into the Countrey of ARCADIA, and would give no battle, but onely took a finall City of the MANTINEANS, and forraged the Country. This again did a little revive the City of SPAR-TA with some hope, to make that it should not utterly despair. But shortly after, Epaminondas Epaminondas invaded the Countrey of LACONIA with fourty thousand footmen well armed, befides an infinite invadeth Laconumber of other light armed, and naked people, that followed his Camp for the spoil: so that in nia with threeall, there were about threefcore and ten thousand fighting men that came in with him to invade LA. four and ten CONIA. It was well near fix hundred years fith the DORIANS pofferfied LACED & MON, and in all thouland mea. that time till then they never faw enemies in their Countrey that durft invade them: but then they facked and burnt all that came in their way, even unto the River of Eurotat, and hard adjoyning unto SPARTA, and no mandurit come out to refift them. For Azefilaus (as Theopompus writeth) would not fuffer the LACEDAMONIANS to go out to fight against such a tempest and sury of War; but having fortified the middeft of the City, and guarded every end of the streets with fouldiers, he patiently bare all the brags and threats of the THEBANS, which challenged him out to fight, and bade him come in the field to defend his Countrey, that onely was the cause of all these their calamities, having himself procured this War. If this went to Agefilans heart, no less grievous were those troubles to him that rose within the City: as the cries and running to and fro of the old men, which were mad to fee that they did before their eyes: and of filly women alfo, which no ground nor place, could hold, but ran up and down as ftraught of their wits, to hear the noise the enemies made, and to fee the fire which they raifed all the fields over. Much more forrowfull also did this make him, when as he bethought himfelt, that entring into his Kingdom at fuch times as the City of Sparta was in greatest prosperity that ever it was, he now saw his honour eclipsed, and the glory of his Kingdom overthrown: and the rather, for that himself had often vaunted, that LACONIAN womenhad never feen the smoak of any enemies Camp. And as they say of Antalcidas one day, that he answered an ATHENIAN that contended with him about the valiantness of one anothers Nation, alledging for himself, that the ATHENIANS had often driven the LACEDEMONIANS from the River of Cephisus: It is true, faid the LACO NIANS, but we did never drive you from the River Eurotas. The like answer made a mean man of SPARTA, to one of the ARGIVES that cast him in the teeth. There are divers of your LACONIANS buried in the Countrey of ARGOLIDE. So are there none of yours, faid he, buried in LACONIA. It is reported, that Antalcidas being one of the Ephori at that time, did fecretly fend his children into the Isle of CITHERA, fearing left the City of Sparta should be taken, Agestians perceiving that the enemies forced to pass over the River to enter the City, he flood to detend the middle part of the City, being the highest place of the fame, and there had his men fet in order of battle. Now at that time, by chance the River of Eurotas was swelled greater then ordinary, by reason of the Snow waters that fell abundantly: which troubled more the THEBANS with the coldness, then roughness of the same in passing it over. Some shewing Agestlaus how Epaminondas murched formost before his battle, he beheld him a great while, and hiseye was never off him, faying never a word but this only: Oh, what a noble fellow is that? Epaminoudas having done all that he could possible to give the LACEDEMONIANS battle, even within the City felf of SPARTA, that he might there have fet up some tokens of triumph, he could never entice Agefilans to come out of his Fort : wherefore he was driven in the end to depart thence, and so went to destroy all the rest of the Countrey. There fell out a conspiracy of two hundred men in SPARTA, who of long time had had an ill meaning with them, and took that quarter of the City where the Temple of Diana stood called Isforium, a place of strong situation, and ill to distrets, Hereupon the LACEDEMONIANS in fury would straight have set upon them. Bur Agestians fearing great mutiny and stir upon it, commanded that no man should stir and himself unarmed, in a poor Gown went thither, crying out to them that had taken that ftrength : Sirs, ye have A fine device not obeyed my commandment, this is not the place I appointed you to assemble in, neither all of you in one place; for I willed you to disperse your selves, some one way, some another way, shewing them the quarters of the City. The traitors hearing these words, were glad, as thinking that their intent was not betrayed: and so leaving that strength, went into those parts of the City that he had shewed the traitors. them. Agestiaus then bringing othersthither, possessed the Fort of Issorium, and took fifteen of those conspirators, and put them to death the next night following. Howbeit then there brake our another conspiracy far greater then the first, of the SPARTANS themselves, which were secretly gotten together into a house, to make some sudden stir and garboil; and to punish them in so great a trouble, it was hard : on the other fide to neglect it, the conspiracy was over dangerous. Agefilaus having consulted with the Ephors, did put them all to death, without any judgment of law: where never Spartan before them suffered death, without due order of law. Again, whereas divers of their neighbours, and of the ILOTES themselves (whom they had billed in their bands of fouldiers) stole away and ran to their enemies, which did much discourage them that remained: he warned his men that they should every day go to their Couches where they lay, and that they The departure should take away their armour that were fled, and hide it, because they should not know the numof the Thobars ber of them that were fled in this fort. Now for the departure of the THEBANS, some say that out of Laconiii they went out of LACONIA by reason of the Winter that came on, whereupon the ARCADI-ANS discharged their Bands, and every one departed his way in disorder. Others also hold opinion, that they continued there three moneths together, during which time they deftroyed the most part of the Countrey. Theopompss writeth notwithstanding, that the Captains of the THEBANS having determined to depart, there came one Phrixus a SPARTAN unto them, fent from Agefilans, who brought them ten talents that they should depart out of their Countrey. Thus had they money given them to defray their charges homewards, to do that, which they themselves had long before determined to have done. And yet do I wonder, how it is possible that all other Historiographers knew nothing of this, and that Theopompus onely could tell of it, All do acknowledge truely, that Agestians onely was the cause that the City of Sparta was faved: who leaving his ambition and felf-will, being paffions born with him, did wifely forefee their wed the City of fafety. Nevertheless, after this great overthrow, he could never raise Spart a again to her former greatness For like as a whole body, which having acquainted it self continually with a moderate diet, with the least diforder doth furfeit presently, and so putteth all in danger: even so Lycurgus having framed a perfect state of Government in the Commonwealth of SPARTA, to make her Citizens live in peace and amity together; when they did enlarge it by great Kingdoms and Realms, the which the good Law-maker thought unmeet to continue happy life, they were straight overthrown, and all went to wrack. By this time Age filans was grown old, and could no more go to Wars for very age : but his Son Archidamu, with the aid which Dionysius the tyrant of SYRACUSA fent unto them, wan a battle against the ARCADIANS, Parlets Butte: for their died not one of his men, and they flew a great number of their Enemies. This Victory plainly shewed the great weakness and decay of the City of SPARTA, The tearless For in former times it was to common a thing unto them to overcome their Enemies in Battle, that Battle of Arthey did facrifice nothing elfe to the gods in token of thanks, within the City, but a poor Cock: this distance overand they that had fought the Battle, made no boast of it, neither did they that heard the news, Arcadians. greatly rejoyce at it. For when they had won that great Battle at the City of MANTINEA, The Lacedawhich Thucydides describeth, the Ephori onely sent the Messenger that brought the news, for re- monians were ward, a piece of powdered meat, and no other thing. But then when news was brought of this not wont to Victory, and that they understood Archidamiu came home victorious, neither man nor woman could at any Victory: keep the City, but the father himself went first of all to meet him, with the tears in his eyes for joy, and after him all the other Magistrates and Officers of the City; and a swarm of old folk both men and women came down to the Rivers fide, holding up their hands to Heaven, and thanking the gods, as if their City had redeemed and recovered her shame and lost honour, and began now to rife again, as before it did. For untill that time, some say, that the Husbands durst not boldly look their Wives in the faces, they were to alhamed of their great loffes and miferable effate. Now Melling refly. the City of MESSINIA being by Epaminondas re-edified and replenished with People, he called red again by home again out of all parts, the natural Inhabitants of the fame. The SPARTANS durft not fight Epaminonias with him nor hinder his purpose (though it spighted them to the hearts) and were angry with Agestlans, for that in his reign they had lost all that Territory, which was as great as all LA-CONIA felf, and for goodness and fertility to be compared with the best parts of all GREECE, the which they had quietly possessed many years before. And this was the cause why Ageplans would not agree to the Peace which the THEBANS fent to offer him; and all because he would not relinquish that in words, which the Enemies kept in deeds. Therefore being wilfully bent once more to fight with them, he went not onely without recovering the thing he looked for, but had in manner also loft the City of SPARTA by a warlike Stratagem, in the which he was deceived. For the MAN-TINEANS being newly revolted again from the alliance of the THEBANS, and having fent for the LACEDEMONIANS, Epaminondas receiving intelligence that Agefilaus was departed from SPARTA with all his Power to aid the MANTINEANS, marched away fecretly by night from TEGEA, without the privity of the MANTINEANS, and went straight to SPARTA; the which he had almost furprized on the fudden, going another way then Agentaus came (being in manner without men to defend it.) Howbeit a THESPIAN called Euthynus, as Callifhenes faith (or as Xe-fecond four-feed of the control of the contr nophon writeth, a CRETAN) brought Agestlans news of it; who dispatched a Horseman straight nevunto Sparto advertise them of the City of SPARTA, and marching forward himself to return, stayed not ta long after before he arrived. He was no fooner come, but incontinently also came the THEBANS, Agefilant rewho passing over the River of Euro TAS, gave assault to the City. Then Agesilans perceiving that pulled Epamithere was no more place nor time of fecurity as before, but rather of desperation and courage, he Lacedamoni valiantly defended it, more then an old mans years could bear. Thus, through courage and defperate mind, whereto he was never brought before, neither did ever use it, he put by the danger, and faved the City of SPARTA from Epaminondas hands, fetting up marks of Triumph for repulfing of the Enemies, and making the women and children of SPARTA to see the LACEDEMO-NIANS how honourably they rewarded their Nurse and Countrey for their good education, but Archidamus chiefly of all other, fought wonderfully that day, running into every part of the City, The forting with a few about him, to repulse the Enemies wheresoever the danger was greatest. It is said also, of Archidamus. that at that time there was one Isadas the Son of Phabidas, that did marvellous strange things to behold, both in the face of his Enemies, as also in the fight of his Friends. He was of goodly perionage, and at that time in the prime of his youth; and being stark naked, and unarmed, his body nointed with oyl, having in one hand a Bore-staff, and in the other a Sword, in this manner he went out of house, and ran amongst them thatt fought, killing and overthrowing his The valiant-Enemies that withflood him, and was not once hurt, either for that the gods preferved him for his nels of Isadas; manhoods fake, or else because men thought him more then a man. The Ephori immediately a Sportan. gave him a Crown, in honour and reward of his valiantness: but withall they fet a Fine on his Madas rewardhead to pay a thousand Silver Drachma's for his rash attempt, to hazard himself in Battle, tun-ed and ametarmed for defence. Shortly after they fought another great Battle before the City of MANTI- ced. NEA. There Epaminondas having overthrown the first Ranks of the LACEDEMONIANS, and couragiously distressing the rest, valiantly following the chase, there was one Anticrates a LA-CONIAN, who receiving him (as Dioscorides writeth) flew him with his Bore-spear. The LA- The death of CEDEMONIANS to this day notwithftanding, do call the off-spring of this Anticrates, Macha- Epiminondas. riones, as much to fay, as Sword-men, as though he had flain him with a Sword. The LACEDE- Machariones MONIANS did efteem this Anticrates fo much, for that deadly stroke he gave (because they were why so called. afraid of Epaminondas while he lived) that they gave him that slew him, great Honours and Dignities, and discharged all his off-spring and kindred from payment of Subsidy and common Contributions, which priviledge one Callicrates, a Kinsman of this Anticrates, enjoyed even in our time. After this Battle, and death of Epaminondas, the GRECIANS having taken peace generally amongst them, Agefilans would needs exclude the MESSENIANS from being fworn to this Peace, faying: That they need not swear, because they had no City. Now, forasmuch as all the GRECIANS esse did receive them as amongst the number, and took their Oath unto this Peace, the LACEDEMONIANS brake off from this general Peace, and none but they onely made War, in on none country; and all through the allurement of Agefilam, who for this caufe was thought of the Grecians a cruel and unfatiable man for Wars, to deal fo craftily, and all to break this general League. Again, he brought himself in discredit with all men, being compelled to make his City bare of Money, borrowing of them still, and raising fundry Contributions amongst them: whereas indeed it had been his best way to have ended all these miseries, having so happy an occasion offered at that time, and not to have loft fo great an Empire of fo many Towns and Cities both by Sea and Land, and all to plague his Countrey, to win the Land and riches of the MESSENIANS. But yet was this most shame unto him of all other, when he gave himself unto one Tachos, a Captain of yet was uns mon mame oncommon at our, when he gare manufacture are one a second a capitant of the EGYPTIANS, every manthinking it a shamefull part of him, that such a personage as he (reputed the chiefest man of all the GRECIANS, and the which had filled the World with report of his same and glory) (hould for Money let out his person to hire, and the glory of his name, unto a barbarous person, a traytor and rebell to his King and Master, to become a mercenary Captain and Souldier to do him Service. And moreover, he being now four core years of age and upwards, his body all mangled with wounds, though he had undertaken this honourable charge for the recovery of the liberty of the GRECIANS, yet had his ambition deferved fome blame: for noble acts have their time, yearather the good and ill do nothing differ from other, but in mean and mediocrity. But Agefilam had no regard of all this, and thought no manner of shame in service, specially for benefit organism nau no regain or an time, and thought no manner of an activity, specially for centre of the Commonwealth, but perfeated himfelf that it was a dishonour to him to live idle in a City and do nothing, till death should come and make his funmons: thereupon therefore he leavied men of War through all Greece with the Money Tachos fent unto him, and with them took Sea, having thirty Spartans Councellors and affiftants to him, as he had in his first Journey. Now Agestlans being arrived in ÆGYPT, all the chief Captains and Governours of King Tachos came to the Sea shore, and honourably received him: and not they onely, but infinite numbers of EGYP-TIANS of all forts (that were marvellous desirous of him, for the great fame that went abroad of Agefilan) came thither from all parts to fee what manner of man he was. But when they faw no frately Train about him, but an old gray-beard layed on the grafs by the Sea fide, a little manthat looked fimply of the matter, and but meanly apparelled in an ill-favoured thread-bare Gown: they fell a laughing at him, remembring the merry tale, that a mountain should bring forth, and was delivered of a moule. Besides all this, they wondered when they saw men bring him Presents to welcome him, that he took Meal, Calves, and Geese, and such gross things: and resusted all Con-Agefilaus de-rided of the Egyptians. wearone must make took mean, carrer, and occur, and offered those dainty things to him, to give fections, Perfumes, and other delicacies, praying them that offered those dainty things to him, to give them to the ILDTES his Slaves. Theophrastus writeth, that he delighted marvellously in the Rush Papyrus, and liked the Garlands they made of them, for their fitness and the handsomness, the which he carried home with him when he departed thence. Having spoken at that time with Tachos, who was affembling his Army to go on his Journey, he was not made Captain-general, as he looked he should have been, but was appointed onely Colonel of all the strangers, Chabrias General of all the Army by Sea, and the chief of all the reft was Tachos himself in person. This at the first grieved Agestians to the heart, being driven whether he would or not, to bear with the vanity and pride of this ÆGYPTIAN. So he failed with them into PHENICE, against the PHENICE ANS, imbasing himself against his noble disposition and mind, and gave him place, untill he saw time of revenge. It chanced that one Nettanebos 2 Nephew of this Tachos, having the leading of part of this Army, rebelled against him, and being chosen King by the ÆGYPTIANS, he sent unto Agessan, and prayed him to come and take his part. The like he did also unto Chabrian, and prayed him to joyn with him, promiting great rewards unto them both. Tacker understanding that, befought them both that they would not for fake him. Chabrias for his part also did likewise entreat Agefilaus, and perswaded him what he could, to continue friendship with Tachos. Agefilaus anfwered him : For thee, Chabrias, thou camelt of thine own good will, and therefore mayeft do what thou thinkeft good, but so is it not with me: for I am fent hither a Captain by my Countrey, to ferve the ÆGYPTIANS, and therefore it were no honefty for meto make War with him, whom I am fent to ferve and aid: were it not that they themselves which sent me, do now command me the contrary. This answer being made, he sent certain of his men to Sparta to accuse Tachos, and to commend Nellanebos. Both they also for their parts sent to entreat the Council of Lac &-DAMON: the one as being always their friend and confederate, and the other promifing to be their faithfull friend thenceforth. The LACEDAMONIANS having heard the requests of both, anfwered them openly, that Agefilam should consider of this matter: and wrote secretly to him, that he should do what he thought best for the Commonwealth of SPARTA. So Agessians 12king with him the mercenary Souldiers which he had brought out of GREBCE, went unto Nothenebs, cloaking his departure, that it was for the benefit of his Countrey, to bewray a wicked thing: but indeed taking away the Vizard to benefit his Countrey, they might by a better name rightly have tearmed it Treason. Howbeit the LACEDAMONIANS placing the chiefest point of honour, to confift in the benefit of their Countrey, did acknowledge nothing to be justice, but that which they thought might ferve for the advancement of the glory of Sparta. Tachos feeing himfeli forfaken thus by his mercenary strangers, fled. But now on the other side, there arose another King in the City of MENDES against this Nettanebos, who having levied to the number of a hundred thouland fighting men, came to fight with Neltanebox. But he thinking to encourage Ageflant, told him, that indeed they were a great number of men of all forts together, and specially men of handy-craft, and therefore that they were not to be feared, because they knew not what War meant. But Agefilaus answered him again: It is not their number that I fear, but their rudenels and unskillulnels, which is hardeft of all to deceive. For Warlike stratagems do most pre- In whom stravail against men that have greatest jear and experience; and therefore they forcice one thing rather tagems take then another. But men of no judgement nor experience, neither tear danger, nor have forecast, and most effect: therefore do give him no more advantage that feeketh to deceive them; then the Wrestler by sleight is able to overthrow him whom he cannot ftir nor remove. Afterwards the MENDESIAN King himfelf fent unto Agesilaus, to win him if he could. Nestanebos then began to beafraid. For when Agefilans counfelled him to try it by Battle as foon as he could, and not to prolong this War against ignorant men that had no skill to fight, but yet for their over-multitude might intrench him round about, and prevent him in divers things: then he began to fear and suspect him more, and thereupon retired into a great City, well walled about, and of great ftrength. Agestlans being offended that he mistrusted him thus, took it inwardly t but being ashamed to turn again unto the third, and also to depart without any Exploit done, he followed him, and inclosed himself within those Walls. The Enemies purfuing him hard, came unto the City, and began to intrench it round, to keep him in. Then the A.-GYPTIAN Ne Tanebos fearing a long Siege, determined to give them Battle. Thereto the hired GRECIANS gave consent, as desiring no better match, and the rather also for that there was but small flore of Cornwithin the City. But Agestlans perswading the contrary, would in no wise consent to it ; whereupon the EGYPTIANS thought worse of him then before, and plainly called him Traytor to their King. Howbeit he did patiently bear all these accusations, expecting time to perform an Exploit he intended, which was this. The Enemies had caft a deep Trench without to compass them in. When this Trench drew near to end, and that both ends lacked not much of meeting, tarrying till night came on, he commanded the GRECIANS to arm and to put themselves in readiness: then he came unto the ÆGYPTIAN, and faid unto him: Lo here is an excellent occasion presented to save thee, which I would not acquaint thee withall till I faw it brought to the perfection I looked for, fearing left otherwife we should have lost it. Now sith the Enemies themselves have with their own hands given us the way to fave our felves by this Trench they have cast, the which as much as is finished thereof doth hinder their great multitude to help themselves, and that which is yet lest unfinished, doth give us opportunity to fight with them of even hand : determine to shew thy valour, and following us, save thy felf The strategein and thy People. For the Enemies which we shall affail before us, shall never be able to abide us: and of Agostian and the shall never be able to abide us: the other by means of the Trench which defendeth us on every fide, can no way hurt us. Nettanebos gyptians: hearing his words, wondered at his great wildom, and to thrufting in among the GRECIANS, did affail the Enemies: the which were foon overthrown and put to flight as many as durst resist and make head against them. Agestiant having won Nestanebos again to trust him, he once again deceived his Enemies with the like subtilty wherewith he had first beguiled them, and which they knew not how to avoid. For one while he made as though he fled, and inticed them to follow him: fuddenly again he would turn this way and that way. In fine, he brought all this great multitude into a straight fluce; walled about on either fide, with great broad ditches full of running water: to that when they were even in the midft of it, he fuddenly stopped their passage with the front of his Battle, which he cast to the breadth of the fluce, and thus made his number of fighting men equal with the multitude of his Enemies, which could never compassim in behind, nor flank him on the fides. They having in this fort made some small resistance, in the end turned their backs and fled, and left a great number slain in the Field : the refidue after that last Overthrow forfook their Gaptains, and fled stragling here and there. Thus the Affairs of the ÆGYPTIAN King after that time had good fuccels, and he was quietly ftablished in his Kingdom, making much of Agefilaus: and doing him all honour possible, prayed him to tarry with him all that Winter. Howbeit he would needs haften home to his Country, which was in War with others, knowing that his City of SPARTA was without Money, because they were driven to give Pay to Strangers. Thereupon Neltanebos in the end took his leave of him very honourably, presenting him a Gift (besides all other honours he did him) of two hundred and thirty Silver Ta- The liberality lents in ready Money, to defray the charges of the War in his Countrey. His Son Archidamus succeeded him in the Kingdom, whose Issue successively reigned after him, unto the time of Agus (who was the fifth King in fuccession after Agesilaus) whom indeed Leonidas put to death, because he fought to restore the LACEDEMONIANS ancient discipline and form of life.

THE LIFE OF POMPEY.

Ann. Mund. 3873.

Ant. Chrift.

He ROMANS seemed to have loved Pompey from his childhood, with the self-affection that Promethem in the Tragedy of Affebylm appeareth to have born unto Hercules, after that he was delivered by him : when he faid : So great a hate I bare not to the Father,

But that I love the Son of him much rather. For the ROMANS never shewed more bitter hate against any other Captain, then they did unto Strabo Pompey's Father. Truly to long as he lived, they feared his greatness obtained by Arms, for indeed he was a noble Captain: but being stricken with a Thenderbolt, and dead, they took him from the Bier whereon his body lay as they carried him to burial, and did thereto great villany. Contrariwise never any other ROMAN (but Pompty) had the Peoples earnest good wills so soon, nor that in prosperity and adversity continued longer constant, then unto Pom, ey. One onely caule procured the Fathers bate, and that was, an unfariable and greedy defire of Money. But Pompey his Son, was for many occasions beloved: as for temperance of life, apinels to Arms, eloquence of tongue, faithfulnels of word, and courtelie in convertation: fo that there was never man that requefted any thing with lefs ill will then he, nor that more willingly did pleasure any man when he was requested. For he gave without disdain, and took with great honour. Furthermore, being but a child, he had a certain grace in his look that wan mens good wills before he spake: for his countenance was sweet, mixed with gravity, and being come to mans flate, there appeared in his gesture and behaviour a grave and Princely Majesty. His hair also stood a little upright, and the cast and soft moving of his eyes, had a certain relemblance (as they faid) of the Statutes and Images of King Alexander. And because every man gave him that name, he did not refuse it himself: infomuch as there were some which sporting-wise did openly call him Alexander. Whereupon Lucisa Philippus a Conful, was not afhamed to fay openly in an Oration he made in Pompty's favour, that it was no marvell if he being Philip did love Alexander. It is reported also, that when Flora the Curtizan waxed old, the much delighted to talk of the familiarity which the had with Pompey being a young man: telling that after the had lien with him, the could not possibly rise from him, but the must needs give him some sweet quip or pleasant taunt. She would tell also how one of Pompey's familiars and companions called Geminim, fell in love with her, and was a marvellous earnest Suiter to obtain her good will: and that the answered him flatly, the would not, for the love the bare to Pompey. Geminisse thereupon brake the matter to Pompey himself. Pompeydestrous to pleasure him granted the request: howbeit Geminisse after that, would not come near Flora, nor speak unto her, albeit it appeared that he yet loved her. But Flora took this not Curtizan-like, for she was sick a long time for very grief of mind, and the thought the took upon it. All this notwithstanding, it is faid that this Flora had then fuch fame of her passing grace and beauty, that Cecilius Metellus Florathe Curfetting forth and beautifying the Temple of Caffor and Pollux, with goodly Tables and Pictures, tizan was paramong the reft, he caused her Picture to be lively drawn for her excellent beauty. Furthermore, sing fair Pompey against his nature, dealt very hardly and uncourteoully with the Wife of Demetrius, his tranchized Bondman (who while he lived was in great credit with him, and dying, left her worth four thousand Talents) fearing to be taken with her beauty, which was very fingularly fair, left he should be thought in love with her. Now though herein he feemed to be very circumspect, and to cast the worft, yet could be not thus scape the detracting tongues of his ill-willers: for they did accuse him, that to please and content his Wives, he would let pass and wink at many things that were against the profit of the Commonwealth. To prove his lober and temperate diet, and how he was contented with common Meats, a word (they fay) he spake when he was very sick, and could taste no The temper meat, is specially noted. For to bring his stomach to him again, his Physician willed him to eat rance of Ponta Thruth. So feeking all about to get him one, there was no Thruth to be bought for Money, for 107 in diet. they were out of season. Notwithstanding, one told him that he should not miss of them at Lucullus House, for he kept them up all the year through. Why, what then, said he, if Lucullus riot were not, should not Pompey live? Therewithall, letting his Physicians counsel alone, he made them dress such meat as was every where common. But of that we will speak more hereaster. Now Pompey being a young man, and in the Field with his Father that was in Arms against Cinna. there lay with him in his Tent a companion of his, called Lucius Terentius; who being bribed with Money, had promifed Cinna to kill him, and other Confederates also had promifed to set their Captains Tent on fire. This Conspiracy was revealed unto Pompey as he sate at supper, which nothing The Treasant amazed him at all, but he drank freely, and was merrier with Terentins then of cultom. So when of Lucius Teit was bed time, he stole out of his own Tent, and went unto his Father to provide for his safety. remius against Terentins thinking the hour was come to attempt his Enterprize, rose with his Sword in his hand, and Pompey. wentto Pompeys Bed where he was wont to lie, and gave many a thrust into the Mattress. After he had done that, all the Camp was straight in an uprore for the malice they bare unto their Captain, and the Souldiers in all hafte would needs have gone and yielded to their Énemy, beginning already to overthrow their Tents, and to truss away bag and baggage. The Captain for fear of this tumult, durst not come out of his Tent: notwithstanding Pompey his Son ran amongst the mutinous Souldiers, and humbly befought them with tears in his eyes, not to do their Captain this villany; and in fine threw himself flatling to the ground overthwart the Gate of the Camp, bidding them march over him, if they had such a delire to be gone. The Souldiers being ashamed of their folly, returned again to their lodging, and changing mind, reconciled themselves with their Captain, eight hundred onely excepted, which departed. But immediately after that Strabo, Pompey's Father, was departed out of the World, Poinpey being his Heir, was accused for the Father, pey's Father, was departed out of the World, Fompey being his axin, was account of the Father, by Pompey accuse to rob the common Treature. Howbeit he contessed and avowed, that it was Alexander one of his fed for robbing Fathers infranchized Bondmen that had ftoln the most part of it, and brought him in before the fed for robbin Judges. Notwithstanding he was accused himself, for taking away the toyles and arming cords of Treasure. Hunters nets, and Books that were taken in Asculum. He confessed the having of them, and that his Father gave him them when the City was taken: howbeit that he had loft them fince, when Cinna returned unto ROME with his Souldiers, who breaking into his House by force, spoiled him of all that he had. His matter had many days of hearing before definitive fentence, in which time Pompey shewed himself of good spirit and understanding, more then was looked for in one of his years: infomuch as he wan such fame and favour by it, that Antifitius being Prætor at that time, and Judge of his matter, fell into such a liking with him, that secretly he offered him his Daughter in marriage. Then that matter being by friends broken to Pompey, he liked of the match, and the parties were fecretly affured. This was not fo closely conveyed, but the People perceived it, by the care and pains Antiftim took to favour his matter. Infomuch, when the Judges gave judgement, and cleared him, all the People together, as it they had been agreed, cryed out with one voice, Talassio, Talassio, being the usual and common cry they used of old time at Marriages in Rome. This custom by report of ancient folk came up in this manner. At what time The cause of the chiefest Peers and Lords of ROME did ravish the SABINES Daughters, which came to ROME the cry of Tathe chiefest Peers and Lords of ROME did ravish the Sabinas Dauguetts, white team to down justice at Marton fee common Sports played, there chanced a few ralcals (as Hog-heards or Neat-heards) to carry lates in Romei away a goodly fair woman. They fearing the should be taken from them, cryed out in the streets as they went, Talassio, as if they would have said, she is for Talassius. This Talassins was a young Gentleman well known, and beloved of most men : so that such as heard him but named onely, did clap their hands for joy, and cried out with them, Talaffio, commending the choice they had made for him. So, hereof they say came this custom, that ever fince they have cryed this word Talaffio unto them that are newly married, because the marriage of that fair young Maid proved fortunate, and happy unto Talassius. And this methinks soundeth nearest to the truth of that they report of this Wedding-cry of Talassio. Shortly after this Judgement given, Pompey Pompey matrimarried Antifia. After that, going unto Cinna's Camp, they wrongfully accused him of some-ed Antifia. what, whereupon he being atraid, secretly stole away. Now when they could not find him in Cinna's Camp, there ran straight a rumour abroad, that Cinna had put him to death. Thereupon, they that of long time had maliced Cinna, did fet upon him for this occasion. But he thinking

to fave himfelf by flying, was straight overtaken by a private Captain that followed him with his Sword drawn in his hand. Cinna feeing him, fell down on his knees before him, and took his Seal from his finger wherewith he fealed his Letters, which was of great price, and offered it him, Tush, said the Captain, I come not to seal any Covenant, but to chastise a Villain and cruel Tyrant : and therewithall thrust his Sword through him, and slew him presently. Cinna being slain in this fort, Carbo succeeded him, and took the Government in hand, being a more cruel Tyrant then the first. Shortly after came in Sylla, being wished for, and desired of the most part of the Ro-MANS, for the grievous oppressions and miseries they endured, that they thought themselves happy to change Governour: for their City was brought into fifth milery, as hoping no more to fee ROME recover her last liberty, they desired yet a more tolerable bondage. Now Pompey at that time was in a place of ITALY called PICENUM (now the Marches of ANCONA) where he had certain inheritance, but much more great love and good will of the City for his Fathers fake. He feeing that the nobleft men of Rome forfook their Houles and Goods, to fly from all parts unto Syna's Camp, as unto a place of fafety, would not go to him as a fugitive and cast-away to save himfelf, without bringing him some Power to increase his Army, but would honourably go thither with an Army, as he that meant first to do himself pleasure. So he felt the good will of the PICEN-TINES, who willingly took his part, and rejected them that were fent by Carbo. Among them there was one Vindius, that stepping forth, said that Pompey which came from the School the last day, must now in haste be a Captain. But they were so offended with his speech, that they straight dispatched him, and killed him out of hand. After that time Pompey being but three and twenty years old, tarrying to receive no authority from any man, took it upon him of himself; and causing a Tribunal to be set up in the middest of the Market-place of Auximium, a great populous City, he commanded the two Brethren called the VENTIDIANS (being the chiefest men of the City, and they that for Carbo's fake withstood his doings) without delay forthwith to avoid the City: and fo began to levy men, and to appoint Captains, Serjeants, Centiniers, and such other Officers as appertain to Martial Discipline. Then he went to all the other Cities of the same Marches, and did the like. They that took part with Carbo, fled every man, and all the rest willingly yielded unto him: whereby in flort space he had gotten three whole Legions together, Munition to entertain them, Carts, and all manner of Beafts for carriage. In this fort he took his Journey towards Sylla, not in hafte: as a man afraid to be met with by the way, but by small Journeys, staying still where he might hurt his Enemy, causing the Cities every where as he came to revolt from Carbo. Nevertheless, three Captains of the contrary patt, Carinna, Calini, and Brutus, all three did fet upon Pompey together, nor all in a front, nor of one fide, but in three feveral places they compaffed him with their Armies, thinking to have made him fure at the first onset. This nothing amazed Pompey, but putting forth his force together in one place, he first marched against Brutus, having placed his Horsemen (among the which he was himself in person) before the Battle of his Footmen. Now the men of Arms of the Enemy which were Gaults, coming to give Charge upon him, he ran one of the chiefest among them through with his Launce and slew him. The other GAULS seeing him flain, turned their backs, and brake their own Footmen: fo that at length they all fled for life. Therewithall the Captains fell out among themselves, and some sled one way, some another way, the best they could. Then the Towns round about, thinking that they were dispersed for sear, came all in to Pompey, and yielded themselves. Afterwards Scipio the Consul coming against Poms pey to fight with him, when both Battles were in manner ready to joyn, before they came to throwing of their Darts, Scipio's Souldiers falured Pompey's men, and went on their fide: fo was Scipio driven to fly. And in fine, Carbo himfelf having fent after him divers Troops of Horsemen by the River of Arsis, Pompey made towards them, and did so siercely assail them, that he drave them into such places as was almost impossible for Horsemen to come into. Whereupon they seeing no way to fcape, yielded themselves Horse and Armours, all to his mercy. Sylla all this while heard no news of these Overthrows: wherefore, as soon as he understood of it, searing lest Pompey should miscarry, being environed with so many Captains of his Enemy, he made haste to march towards him for to aid him. Pompey understanding of his approach, commanded his Captains to arm their men, and put them in Battle ray, that their General might fee them bravely appointed when he should present them unto him: for he looked that Sylla would do him great honour; and indeed he did him more honour then Pompey looked for. For when Sylla faw him afar off coming towards him, and his Army marshalled in so good order of Battle, and such goodly men that so bravely advanced themselves, being couragious for the Victory they had obtained of their Enemies, he lighted on foot. When Pompey also came to do his dury to him, and called him Imperator (as much as Emperour, or Soveraign Prince) Sylla refaluted him with the felf-name, beyond all mens expectation prefent, little thinking that he would have given to honourable a name unto to young a man as Pompey, who had not yet been Senator: confidering that he himfelf did contend for that Title and Dignity, with the Faction of Mariss and Scipio. Furthermore, the entertainment that Sylla gave him every way, was answerable to his first kindness offered him. For when Pompey came before him, he would rife and put off his Cap to him, which he did not unto any other Noblemen about him. All this notwithstanding, Pompey gloried nothing the more in himself. Wherefore when Sylla would straight have sent him into GAUL, because Meiellas that was there, was thought to have done no exploit worthy of fo great an Army as he had with him: Pompey answered him again, that he thought it no reason to displace an ancient Captain that was of greater same and experience then himself: yet if Metellus of himself were contented, and would entreat him, that he would willingly go and help him to end this War. Metellus was very glad of it, and wrote Pomber wont for him to come. Then Pompey entring GAUL, did of himself wonderfull Exploits, and did so to aid Metellus revive Metellus old courage and valiantness to fight, which now began to faint, like boyling Cop. in Gral. per that being poured upon the cold and hard Copper, doth melt and diffolve it, as fast or faster then fire it felf. For like as of a Wreftler, who hath been counted very ftrong, and the chiefeft in all Wenderfull Games, having ever born the prize away where he had wreftled, they never record among them his Victories of childish victories and wreftlings, as things of no account : even so I am afraid to speak of the wonderfull deeds that Pompey did in his childhood, because they are obscured in respect of the infinite great Wars and Battles which he had won afterwards. For I am afraid that whileft I should go about particularly to acquaint you with his first beginnings, I should too lightly pass over his chiefest Acts and most notable Enterprizes, which do best declare his natural disposition and singular wit. Now when Sylla had overcome all ITALY, and was proclaimed Dictator, he did reward all his Lieutenants and Captains that had taken his part, and did advance them to honourable place and dignity in the Commonwealth, frankly granting them all that they requested him. But for Pompey, reverencing him for his valiantnels, and thinking that he would be a great flay to him in all his Wars, he fought by fome means to allie him to him. Metella his Wife being of his opinion, they both perfiva- Pemperput aded Pompey to put away his first wife Antistia, and to marry Anylia the Daughter of Metella, and way his Wife other fift Husband, the which also was another mans Wife, and with child by her Husband. These married ## Marriages were cruel and tyrannical, fitter for Sylla's time, rather then agreeable to Pompey's na-mylia, the ture and condition: to see Amylia, this new married Wife taken from her lawfull Husband, to Daughter of marry her great with child; and shamefully to forfake Antifita, who not long before had loft her Mercila Sylla's marry her great with china; and manifolding to forther Antifins, who not long outsite had toler than toler than Wife.

Father, and for respect of her Husband that did put her away. For Antifins was murthered within The death of the very Senate-house, being suspected to take part with Sylla for his Son-in-law Pompey's sake: Antifine. and her mother voluntarily put her felf to death, feeing her Daughter received fuch open wrong, By these apparent causes, those unfortunate Marriages tell out into a miserable Tragedy, by means of the death of Amylia, who shortly after miserably died with child in Pompey's House. Then came news to Sylla, that Perpenna was gotten into Sicile, and that he had made all that Island at his devotion, as a fafe place to receive all Sylla's Enemies: that Carbo also kept the Sea thereabouts with a certain number of Ships: that Domitius also was gone into Africk: and divers other Noble men that were banished, that had scaped his Proscriptions and Outlawries, were all in those Pompey Sent parts. Against them was Pompey sent with a great Army. Howbeit he no sooner arrived in Sici- from Sylla into LE, but Perpenna left him the whole Island, and went his way. There he favourably dealt with all Sicile. the Cities, which before had abidden great trouble and mifery, and fet them again at liberty, the MAMERTINES onely excepted, which dwelt in the City of Messina. They despising his Tribunal and Jurisdiction, alledged the ancient Order and Priviledge of the ROMANS set down in times past amongst them. But Pompey answered them in choler: What do yo prattle to us of your Law, that have our Swords by our fides? It feemeth alfothat Pompey dealt too cruelly with Carbo in his mifery. For fith he must needs die, as there was no remedy but he should, then it had been better they had killed him when he was taken: for then they would have imputed it to his malice that to had commanded it. But Pompey after he was taken, made him to be brought before him, that had been thrice Conful at Rome, to be openly examined, and he fitting in his Chair of State or Tribunal, condemned him to die in presence of them all: to the great offence and misliking of every one that was present. So Pompey bade them take him away and carry him to execution. When Carbo came to the Scaffold where he should be executed, and seeing the Sword drawn that The death of should cut off his head, he prayed the Executioners to give him a little respite and place to untrus Carbo. a point, for he had a pain in his belly. Catur Oppius also (one of Julius Casars friends) writeth, that he dealt very cruelly in like manner with Quintus Palerius. For Pompey faid he, knowing that he was excellently well learned, as any man could be, and few like unto him: when he was brought unto him, he took him afide, and walked a few turns about that when he had questioned with him, and learned of him what he could, he commanded his Guard to carry him away, and to dispatch him. Howbeit we may not give too light credit to all that Oppins writeth, speaking of Julius Cafars friends or foes. For Pompey indeed was compelled to make away the greatest personages of Sylla's Enemies that fell into his hands, being notoriously taken; but for the reft, all those that he could secretly suffer to steal away, he was contented to wink at it, and would not understand it : and moreover did help some besides to save themselves. Now Pompey was determined to have taken sharp revenge of the City of the HIMERIANS, which had stoutly taken the Enemies part. But Sthenis one of the Governours of the City, craving audience of Pompey, told him he should do them wrong and injuffice, if he should pardon him that committed all the fault, and should destroy them wrong and injultice, it he infome parton injulian communication and informations. The Love of the Souldiers unto Pompey.

War upon Domitius with all his power, who had levied already more men of War then Marius had, not long before, when he came out of AFRICK into ITALY; and had there overthrown all the ROMANS doings, being become of a fugitive out-law, a cruel Tyrant. Pompey thereupon Pompry Jour having speedily put himself in readiness to take the Sea, lest Menmius his Sisters Husband Governour of SICILE: and fo himfelf imbarked, and hoifed Sail with fixfcore Galleys; and eight hundred other Ships or Bottoms, to transport their Victuals, Munition, Money, Engines of Battery, and all other carriage whatfoever. After he was landed with all his Fleet, part at UTICA, and part at CARTHAGE, there straight came to him seven thousand Souldiers from the Enemies, and yielded themselves, besides seven whole Legions that he brought with him. They say moreover, that at his arrival, he had a prefent chance happened unto him to be laughed at : for it is reported, that certain of his Souldiers stumbled on a Treasure by chance, and got thereby a great masse of Money. The residue of the Army hearing that, thought sure that the Field where this Treasure was found, was full of Gold and Silver, which the CARTHAGINIANS had hidden there long before in time of their calamity. Pompey hereupon, for many days after, could have no rule of his Souldiers; neither could be choose but laugh to see so many thousand men digging the ground, and turning up the Field: untill in the end they wearied themselves, and came and prayed him then to lead Domitius came them where he thought good, for they had payed well for their folly. Domitius came to Pompey, pomities came them where he thought good, for they had payed well for their long. Domities canne to 1000/15, peed by PomPt with his Army fet in Battle ray. Howbeit there was a certain quagmire before him, that ran with a fwilt running ftream, very ill to get over: befides that, from the very break of day it had poured down and rained fo faft, and was fo great a wind withall, that Domities thinking all that day they should not fight, commanded his People to truss away and remove. Pompey on the other fide, finding this an excellent fit occasion for him, suddenly made his men to march, and passed over the Valley. The Enemies perceiving that, being altogether out of order, were marvelloully amazed, and in that hurly burly would have made refiftance. But they were neither all together, nor yet evenly fet in Battle ray, and had befides the wind beating the rain full in their faces. So did the fform much hurt unto the ROMANS also, for they could not one see another: insomuch as Pompey himself was in great danger of being killed by one of his own Souldiers, who not knowing him, asked him the word of the Battle, and was somewhat long before he answered him. In fine, when he had overthrown his Enemies with great flaughter (for they fay, that of twenty thousand of them, there were but three thousand faved) Pompey's Souldiers falured him by the Pompess vitto. name of Imperator: but he answered them, that he would not accept the honour of that Name; fo long as he saw his Enemies Camp yet standing: and therefore, if it were so they thought him worthy of that Name, that first they should overthrow the Trench and Fort of their Enemies, wherein they had intrenched their Camp. The Souldiers when they heard him fay fo, went pre-fently to affail it. There Pompey fought bare-headed, to avoid the like danger he was in before, Domitius flain. By this means they took the Camp by force, and in it flew Domitius. After that Overthrow, the Cities in that Countrey came and yielded themselves, some willingly, and others taken by sorce: as also they took King Jarbas that had fought for Domitius, and his Realm was given to Hiempfall. But Pompey being defirous further to employ his Power, and the good fortune of his Army, went many days journey into the main Land, and still conquered all where he came, making the Power of the ROMANS dreadfull unto all the barbarous People of that Countrey, the which made but small account of them at that time. He said moreover, that the wild Beasts of Africk also should feel the force and good success of the ROMANS: and thereupon he bestowed a sew days in hunting of Lions and Elephants. For it is reported, that in forty days space at the unterrompeti con most, he had overcome his Enemies, subdued Africk, and had established the Affairs of the ty four years of Kings and Kingdoms of that Countrey, being then but four and twenty years old. So when he returned unto the City of UTICA, Letters were brought from Sylla, willing him to discharge all his Army, and to remain there with one Legion onely, tarrying the coming of another Captain that should be sent to succeed him in the Government of that Countrey. This commandment grieved him not a little, though he made no shew of it at all: but his Souldiers shewed plainly that they were offended. For when Pompey prayed them to depart, they began to give out broad specifies against Sylls, and told directly that they were not determined (what soever became of them) to for lake him, and they would not that he should trust unto a Tyrant. Pompey seeing that he could not perswadt them by any reason to be quiet, rose out of his Chair and retired into his Tent weeping. But the Souldiers followed him, and brought him again to his Chair of State, where he spent a great part of the day, they entreating him to remain there and command them, and he desiring them to obey $ylla, and leave their mutinies. But in fine, seeing them importunate to press him to it, he sware he would kill himself, rather then they should compell him; yet they feant left him thus. Hercupon it was reported unto Sylla, that Pompey was rebelled against him. Syila when he heard that, faid to his friends: Well, then I fee it is my destiny in mine old days to fight with children. He meant fo, because of Maring the younger, who had done him much milchief, and had belides put him in great danger. But afterwards understanding the troth, and hearing that all generally in Rome were determined to go, and meet. Pompey, and to receive him with all the honour they could: because he would go beyond them all in thew of good will, he went that the because him and the second him home and out of his House to meet him, and embracing him with great affection, welcomed him home, and called him Magnus, to say, Great, and commanded all them that were present to give him that Name also. This notwithstanding some say, that it was in Africk this Name was first given him

by a common cry of all his whole Army, and that afterwards it was confirmed by Sylla. Indeed it is true, that Pompey himself being sent Proconsul into SPAIN, long time after that, was the last that subscribed all his Letters and Commissions with the name of Pompey the Great : for this name then was fo commonly known and accepted, as no man did envy it. And therefore rightly is the wildom of the ancient ROMANS to be both commended and had in admiration, which did not The wildom of onely reward fervice in the Field with fuch honourable Names and Titles, but Civil Service and good commended for Government also in Peace at home. For there were two, whom the People of Rome called Maximi, to fay, very great: of the which Valerius was the one, for that he made Peace and agreement raign and home betwixt the People and Senate : the other was Fabin Rullin, for that he put from the Senate certain service. Bondmen infranchifed, who through their riches and favour had obtained that place. After that, Valerthus and Pompey required the honour of Triumph, but Sylladenied it, alledging that none could enter in Tri-Maximi in a called the property of the property umph into Rome but Confuls or Prators. For fith Scipio the first, who in Spain had overcome Rome. the CARTHAGINIANS, never defired this honour of Triumph, being neither Conful nor Prator, much less should be stand upon demand of 1 riumph into Rome, when that through his young years he was not yet a Senator: and befides, it would purchase him envy of his Honour and Greatness. These reasons did Sylla alledge against Pompey, and told him plainly, that if he were bent to stand in it, he would refist him. All this blanked not Pompey, who told him frankly again, how men Pompey's flour did honour the rifing, not the fetting of the Sun: meaning thereby, how his own honour in- answer unto creafed, and Sylla's diminished. Sylla heard him not very perfectly what he said; but perceiving by Sylla. their countenances that stood by, that they wondred at it, he asked what it was he faid. When it was told him, he marvelled at the boldness of so young a man, and then cryed out twice together. was told him, he marvened at the bordeness of the property (as it is reported) to Lethim then Triumph a Gods name. Many being offended therewith, Pompey (as it is reported) to Pompey notbeanger them more, would needs be brought in a triumphant Chariot drawn with four Elephants: Pampey notbing Sensor, for he had taken many of them from those Kings and Princes which he had subdued. Howbeit the triumpheh s-Gate of the City being too narrow, he was driven to leave the Elephants, and was contented to be gainft the Law. drawn in with Horses. Now his Souldiers that had not all things as they looked for, and which was promifed them, going about to trouble and hinder his Triumph, he faid he paffed not for it, and that he would rather let alone all his preparation of Triumph, then once to yield to flatter them. Whereupon, there was a famous man at that time called Servilius, who at the first was one of the chiefest against Pompey's Triumph, who said openly, Now I know that Pompey indeed is great, and deserveth Triumph: being evident enough, that if he would, he might then have eafily been made Senator: he fued not for that, but as they fay, fought honour by a stranger mean less honourable. For if he had been made Senator so young, it had not been so great a matter: but to have such honour before he was Senator, that was marvelloufly to be noted. But this wan him the more favour and good will still amongst the common People: for they were glad when after his Triumph they faw him in company amongst the ROMAN Knights. On the other fide, it spighted Sylla to see him come fo fast forward, and to rife to fo great credit: notwithstanding being ashamed to hinder him, he was contented to keep it to himself untill that Pompey by force, and against Sylla's will, had brought Lepidus to be Consul, by the help and good will of the People, that surthered his defire. There-Marcus Lepidus upon Sylla feeing Pompey returning overthwart the Market-place from the Election, with a great created Confull Train of followers to honour him, he faid unto him: O young man, I fee thou art glad of this Victory, and so hast thou cause; for it is a goodly thing out of doubt to have had such favour of the People, as for thy fake to have made Lepidus Conful (the vileft person of all men) before Catulus the honestest man of the City: but I will tell thee one thing, see that thou sleep not, and look well to thy business, for thou hast advanced a dangerous enemy to thy felf. Now the chiefest thing from the love wherein Sylla discovered most his ill will unto Pompey, was in his last will and Testament : for he gave of Pompey. Legacies unto every one of his friends, and fome of them he made Tutors and Overfeers of his Son, but he made no mention of Pompey at all. This notwithstanding Pompey took it well enough. And where Lepidus and some other would have kept Sylla's body from burial in the Field of Mars, and that his Funeral should not be openly solemnized, he contrariwise brought him very honourably and faiely to the ground. Shortly after Sylla's death, his words of Prophecy unto Pompey concerning Lepidus mo-Lepidus, proved true. For Lepidus usurping the Authority which Sylla had before, not colourably, veth Civil but openly entred straight in Arms, stirring up again those of Marius saction, whom Sylla could Was. not be avenged of, and which lay lurking a long time, spying for occasion to rise again. True it is, that his Collegue and fellow-Conful Catulus (whom the best and soundest part of the People followed) was thought a marvellous honest man, both just and modest howbeit, a better Governour in Peace, then a good man of War, infomuch as time required Pompey's skill and experience. So Pompey stood not doubtfull which way he would dispose himself, but took part straight with the Nobility and honestest men, and was presently chosen Captain of their Army against Lepidus, who had already won the greatest part of IT ALY, and with an Army under the conduct of Brutus. kept GAUL on this fide the Mountains called GALLIA CISALPINA. And for the rest, Pompey eafily overcame it: howbeit he lay a long time before Modona, befieging of Brutus. In the mean feafon Lepidin came to Rome, and being hard at the Walls, demanding the fecond Confulthip, made them afraid in the City with the great numbers of men he had about him, gathered together of all forts. Howbeit this fear was cooled straight by a Letter which Pompey fent to Roma, advertifing how he had ended this War without any blood-shed: for Brutus either betraying his Army, or being betrayed of it, yielded himself unto Pompey, who gave him a certain number of Horsemen that conducted him into a little Town upon the River of Po; where the next day after, Geminius being sent by Pompey, slew him. But hereof Pompey was greatly blamed, for that he had written Letters to the Senate from the beginning of the change, how Brutus had put himfelf into his hands; and afterwards wrote Letters to the contrary, which burthened him for putting him to death. This Bruiss was Father of that Bruiss, which afterwards by the help of Cassius flew Julius Cafar: howbeit he shewed not himself so like a coward, neither in Wars nor in death, as his Father did, as we have declared more at large in his Life. Furthermore, Lepidus being driven to forfake ITALY, fled into SARDINIA, where he died (as it is reported) of a ficknels that he had, not for any forrow or grief of his own affairs, but for a Letter that was brought him which went to his heart, knowing thereby that his Wife had played the Harlot. There remained at that time Sertorias in Spain, who was another manner of Warriour then Lepidus, and that kept the Ro-MANS in great awe: for that all the fugitives of the late Civil Wars were fled to him, as from the last disease of the Wars. He had already overthrown many inferiour Captains, and was now wreftling with Merellus Pins, that in his youth had been a noble Souldier, but now being old, made Wars but flowly, and would not couragiously take prefent occasions offered him, which Sertorius by his nimbleness and dexterity took out of his hands. For he would ever hover about him, when he thought leaft of him, like a Captain rather of Thieves then of Souldiers, and would still lay Ambushes in every corner, and round about him: where the good old man Metellus had learned to fight in Battle-ray, his men being heavy armed. Hereupon Pompey keeping his Army alway together, practifed at Rome that he might be fent into Spain to aid Metellus. But notwithstanding that Catulus at ROME that he might be tent into Spain to and Presents. But notwinitesiming that Cashing commanded him to disperse his Army, Pompey fill kept them together by colour of new devices, and was continually about Rome in Arms, until that by Lucius Philippus means he had obtained the government of that Countrey. They say, that one of the Senators marvelling to hear Philip programment of that Countrey. Pound that matter to the Senate, asked him: How now Philip, doeft thou then think it meet to fend Pompey Proconful (to fay, for a Conful) into SPAIN? No truly, faid Philip, not Proconful onely, but pra Consultibus (to say, for both Consuls) meaning that both the Consuls for that year were into Spain 2 guind Serrorius men of no value. Now when Pompey was arrived in SPAIN, men began straight to be carried away (as the manner is commonly where no Governours be) with the hope of a thing that they had not before. Thereupon Sertorius gave out proud and bitter words against Pompey, faying in mockery, he would have no other Weapon but rods to whip this young boy, if he were not afraid of this Metallus given upon his guard, and went stronger to fight there he did before, being afraid of Pompey. For Metallus given upon his guard, and went stronger to fight there he did before, being afraid of Pompey. tellus was very diffolure of life (which no man would have judged in him) and was given over too much to riot and pleasure: howbeit they saw in him a marvellous sudden change, both of his honour and glory which he used before, as also the cutting off of his superfluous expence. That thing, befides that he did honour Pompey greatly by it, wan him also much more the good will of the People, when they faw that he drew himself down to a straighter life. And this was no great pain to him, for of his own disposition he was a grave man and temperately given for his desires. In this War fortune changed divertly, as it is commonly feen in Wars: but nothing grieved Pompey more then Sertorius winning of the City of Lauron. For he thinking to have flut him in, and had given out fome glorious words of the matter, wondred when he faw himfelf straight compassed in, that he could Lauron in the not fit out of the Camp where he lay, and was driven befides to fee the City burnt before his face. This notwithstanding, afterwards at a set-Battle by the City of VALENTIA, he slew Herennius and Perpenna, both notable Souldiers, and Servorius Lieutenants, and with them ten thouland men. This Victory to encouraged Pompey, that he made hafte to fight with Seriorius alone, because Metellus should have no part of the honour of the Victory. So they both met by the River of Su-CRON, about Sun-fer, both fearing Metellus coming: the one, that he might fight alone; and the other, with one alone. In fine, the Victory fell out doubtfull in the end of the Battle : foreign ther of their Wings had the upper hand. Between the two Captains, Sertor ins had the greater honour: for he alone overcame all them that stood before him. And as for Pompey, there was a great man of Arms that being on foot, came and fet upon him; and having both their Swords in their hands, they both lighted upon their hands, but not both in one fort; for Pompey's hand was but a little hurt, and the man of Arms had his hand clean cut off. Then Pompey's men fell upon him, all his own fellows on that fide being fled from him: notwithftanding, beyond all hope, he faved himfelf after a strange fort, by casting up his Horse among his Enemies, that was richly trapped with gilt Harnels, having a Caparison of great value; and in the mean time while they were busine dividing his booty among them, and fighting for it, he escaped their hands. The next morning by break of day, both of them paris, heavily, their Bands into the United to confirm the Victorian to the confirmation of the paris the confirmation of the confirmation o of day, both of them again brought their Bands into the Field, to confirm the Victory, which eight ther of them supposed they had gotten. But Mesellus came to Pompey at that present time; whereupon Servorius went his way, and dispersed his Army : for his Camp was easily broken, and suddenly gathered again together. For Sertorius would sometime wander the Fields alone, and at another time again he would have a hundred and fifty thousand fighting men together in the Field; like a vehement stream, that sometime is dried up, and that suddenly again is all of a slood. Pompey after this Battle going to welcome Merellus, when they came near one another, he commanded his Serjeants The modely of and Officers to put down their bundle of Rods and Axes which they carried before him, to honour Metellus withall, who was a better man than himself. But Metellus would not suffer them, but shewed himself equal with him in that, and in all things else, not respecting his seigniority, nor that he that is rad been Comin, and Pompey not, faving when they camped together, Metellus gave the Watchword to all the Camp. Notwithstanding, commonly they camped afunder, for their Enemy that was fo ftirring from place to place, and was feen in fo fundry places in fo short time, compelled them to be afunder to foresee the worst, drawing them suddenly from one purpose to another : so that in fine, cutting them off from Victuals every way, spoiling their Countrey, and keeping the Sea fide, he drave them both out of the Provinces of their charge which they had in Spain, and did compell them to go some other-where for lack of Victuals. Pompey in the mean time having fpent the most part of his Goods in this War, fent to Rome for Money to pay his Souldiers, threatning the Senate, that if they fent him no Money, he would return with his Army into ITALY. Lucullus then being Conful, though Pompey's Enemy, procured they should fend him Money: for be practifed to be fent Captain against King Mithridates, and therefore was afraid to give Pompey any occasion to return, who defired nothing more then to leave Sertorius to bend his force against Mithridates, whose overthrow should be more honourable to him, and also less dangerous. In the mean space Sertorius died, being betrayed by those whom he thought his friends, among the which Perpenna was the chief man, that after Sertorius death would needs counterfeit his doings, having the same means, the same furniture, and the same power that he had : howbeit he lacked his wit and skill to employ them. Pompey therefore marching directly towards him, and finding how ignorant Perpenna was in his Affairs, he layed a bait for him of ten Cohorts which he fent to prev in the Fields, commanding them to disperse themselves abroad as far as they could, one from another. Perpenna ftraight took the occasion, and gave them charge, and had them in chase. But Pompey tarrying him at the Foord, was ready for him with all his Army fet in order: he gave him Battle, ob-came Perpenni tained the Victory, and ended all this War, because the most of the Captains were slain in the and slew him. Field, and Perpenna the chief of all taken Prisoner, whom he presently put to death. But herein Pompey was not to be condemned of ingratitude nor oblivion (as some do burthen him) of Perpenna's friendship shewed him in Sicilia, but rather deserved praise to have determined so wisely for the benefit of the Commonwealth. For Perpenna having in his cultody all Sertorius Writings, he shewed Letters of the greatest Noblemen of ROME (which were desirous of change of Government) willing him to return into IT ALY. Pompey upon fight of these Letters, fearing left they would breed greater fedition and fitr in ROME then that which was already pacified, put Perpenna Pomper burne to death as foon as he could, and burnt all his papers and Writings, not reading any Letter of them. Sertorius Letto death as 10011 as he could, and out the time, till he had pacified all Commotions and Tu-slo did #ulius mults marvelloufly out of order, he brought his Army back again into ITALY, and arrived there Cafar when he when the War of the Bondmen and Fencers led by Spartacus, was in greatest fury. Whereupon he having overcome them, wrote unto the came the refl Senate, that Graffus had overcome the Fencers in Battle, and that he had pluckt up this War by men. the roots. The ROMANS receiving Pompey's Letters, were very glad of this news for the love they bare him. But as for the winning of SPAIN again, and the overthrow of Sertorius, there was no man, although it were in sport, that ever gave any man elsethe honour, but unto Pompey onely. For all this great honour and love they bare unto Pompey, yer they did suspect him, and were afraid of him, because he did not disperse his Army, that he would follow Sylla's steps, to rule alone by plain force. Hereupon as many went to meet him for fear, as there were that went for good will they bare him. But after he had put this suspition quite out of their heads, telling them that he would discharge his Army after he had triumphed, then his ill-willers could blame him for nothing elfe, but that he was more inclined unto the People then to the Nobility, and had a defire to reftore the Tribuneship of the People which Sylla had put down, onely to gratifie the common People in all he could: the which indeed was true. For the Common People at ROME never longed for thing more, then they did to fee the Office of the Tribunes set up again. Yea Pompey himself thought it the happiest turn that ever came to him, to light in such a time to do such an act. For had any other man prevented him of that, he could never have found the like occasion possibly to have required the Peoples good wills unto him fo much as in that. Now therefore this fecond Triumph and first Confulthip being decreed by the Senate, that made him nothing the greater nor better man. And yet was it a shew and fignification of his greatness, the which Crassus (the richest man, the eloquentest and greatest person of all them that at that time dealt in matters of State, and had more estimation of himself then of Pompey and all the rest) never durst once demand, before he had craved Pompey's good will. Pompey was very glad of his request, and had fought occasion of long time to pleasure him : and thereupon made earnest suit unto the People for him , assuring them he would as much thank them for making Crassus his Colleague and fellow-Consull, as he would for making himfelf Confull, All this notwithftanding, when they were created Confuls, they were in all things Craffic first contrary one unto another, and never agreed in any one thing while they were Confulbip. ther. Now if it appeared that they had done good fervice, then were they honourably rewarded : or otherwise, openly shamed and punished. At that time, Gellim and Lentulm the two Cenors, being honourably fet in their Tribunal or Judgement-fear, taking view of all the ROMAN Knights that mustered before them, to be feen and examined, they marvelled when they saw Pom-Romer as a kingle of Rome further end of the Market-place, having all the marks of a Conful born before him, and himself leading his Horse in his hand by the bridle. When Pompey came nearer, and that be dicharged they faw it was he, he commanded his Serjeants that carried his Axes before him, to make room for him to pass by the Bars with his Horse, where the Censors sate. Then the People flocked about him, wondering and rejoycing, being very filent. The Cenfors themselves also were marvellous glad to fee him so obedient to the Law, and did him great reverence. In fine, the elder of the Cenfors did examine him in this fort. Pompey the Great, I pray thee tell me if thou haft ferved fo long time in the Wars as the Law did appoint? Then answered Pompey aloud: Yes verily that I have, and under no other Gaptain then my felf. The People hearing this Anfiver, made an open shout for joy, they were so glad to hear it : and the Cenfors themselves came from their Judgement-feat, and went to accompany Pompey home to his H use, to please the great multitude of People that followed him, clapping their hands with great figns of joy. At the end of their Conlulthip, when milliking enerealed further between Pompey and Craffus, there was one Gaim Aurelim, of the order of Knighthood, who till that time never spake in open Assembly, but then got up into the Pulpit for Orations, and told the People openly, how Jupiter had appeared to him in the night, and had commanded him to tell both the Confuls from him, that they should not leave their Charge and Office before they were reconciled together. For all these words Pompey stirred not. But Crassus first took him by the hand, and spake openly to him before the People: My Lords, I think not my felf dishonoured to give place to Pompey, sith you your selves have thought him worthy to be called the Great, before he had any hair on his face, and unto whom you granted the honour of two Triumphs before he came to be Senator. When he had faid his mind, they were made friends together, and so surrendred up their Office. Now for Crassis. rompey and the held on his former manner of life-which he had begun. Pompey as near as he could, gave over to plead mens causes anymore, and began by little and little to withdraw himself from frequenting the Market-place, and matters of judgment, coming feldom abroad, and when he did, he had alwaies a great Train following him. It was a rare thing also to see him any more come out of his House, or talk with a man, but he was ever accompanied with a great number, and he rejoyced to himself to see that he had alwaies such a Train after him: for that made him to be honoured the more, and gave him greater countenance to fee him thus courted, thinking it dishonour to him to be familiar with mean persous. For men that rise by Arms, are easily despited, when they come to live like private Citizens: because they cannot fashion themselves to be companions with the common People, (who Citizen-like use a common familiarity together) but look to be their betters in the City, as they are in the Field. Yea and contrarily, they that do acknowledge themselves to be their inferiours in Wars, will think foul scorn if they be not their superiours in peace. And by this means when they have a noble Warrier among them that followed publick Causes, (which had triumphed for many Victories and Battles he hath obtained) they obscure his Glory, and make him an underling unto them: whereas they do not otherwise envy any Souldiers that are contented equally to give them placeand authority, as plainly appeared thortly after The beginning by Pompey himself. Their Ships were about 1000 in number, and they had taken 400 Towns. They had spoiled and destroyed many holy Temples that had never been touched before: as the Temple of the Twins in the Ifle of CLAROS, the Temple of Samothracia, the Temple of Earth in the City of HERMION, and the Temple of Afenlapins in Epidaurum : the Temples of Neptune in Is THMOS, TANARIA,

For fome of them came unto him, and put shooes on his feet: others clapt a Gown on the back of him after the ROMAN sashion, for fear (faid they) left he should be mistaken another time. When they had plaid all this pageant, and mocked him their bellies full: at the last they cast out one of their Ship-ladders, and put him on it, and bad him go his way, he should have no hurt: and if he would not go of himself, then they cast him over the board by force, and sent him packing. These Rovers and Sea-pirates had all the Sea Mediterraneum at commandment : insomuch there durst not a Merchant look out, nor once traffick that Sea. And this was the onely cause that moved the ROMANS (searing scarcity of Victuals, and a great dearth) to fent Pompey to recover the Signiory again of the Sea from these Pyrates. The first man that moved it might be decreed, that Pompey should not be onely Admirall or Generall by Sea, but should have absolute power to command all manner of persons Gabinius Law as he thought good, without any account to be made of his doings in his charge, was Gabiniu, for Pompeys Pomerys friend. The sum of this Decree gave him full power and absolute Authority of all the Authority Sea from Hercules Pillars, and of the main Land, the space of four hundred Furlongs from the gainst the Pa-Sea, (for the ROMANS Dominions at that time in few places went further then that : notwith- races. standing within that compass were many great Nations and mighty Kings.) | urthermore, it gave him power to choose of the Senate fifteen Lieutenants, to give unto every one of them severall Provinces in charge, according to his discretion; and also to take money out of the Treasure, of the generall Receivers of the State, to delray the charges of a Fleetlof two hundred fail, with full power besides to leavie what men of War he thought good, and as many Galliots and Marriners as he lifted. This Law when it had been read over among them, the People confirmed it with very good will. Yet the Noble-men and chief of the Senate thought that this Authority did not onely exceed all envy, but also that it gave them apparent cause of tear, to give such absolute power unto a private person. Whereupon they were all against it but Cejar, who savoured the Decree, not so much to pleasure Pompey as the People, whose favour he fought. The Noblemen fell marvelloufly out with Pompty: and at the length one of the Confuls was very hot with him, and told him he looked to follow Rome les steps, but peradventure he would come thort of that end he made. Thereupon the People thought to have killed him. After that, Catulus stood up to speak against this Edict. The People at the first heard him quietly, because he was a worthy man. Then he began without any shew of envie, to speak many goodly things in the praise of Pompey, and in fine, advised the People to spare him, and not to venture in such dangerous Wars (one after another) a man of fo great account , as they ought to make of him. It ye chance to lofe him, faid he, whom have you then to put in his place? The People then eried out: Your felf. Now for them that had disperted themselves betimes, or that otherwise could scape his generall chase they fled all into CILICIA, as Bees into the Bee-hive, against whom he would needs go himself in person with threescore of his best Ships. Howbeit he cared not though he west not before he had scoured all the Thus can Sea, the Coasts of Lybia, Sardinia, SICILE, and of CORSICA, of all thole Theeves which were wont to keep thereabours, and this he did within forty days space, taking infinite pains, both himself and his Lieutenants. Now when one of the Confuls called Pife, did all the best he could to hinder Pompeys preparation, and had discharged his Oar-men, for that he envied Pompeys prosperity: Pompey sent his Ships before to make towards ITALY to arrive at the City of BRUNDUSIUM. He in the mean time went through THUSCAN to ROME, where to foon as his coming was known, all the People ran out to meet him, as if he had been ablent a long time: and that which made the People more joyfull to fee him, was the sudden change of Victuals unlooked for, that daily came to the Town out of all parts. But Pifo went near to be deprived of his Confulfhip: for Gabinisse had the Decree written, and ready to prefent to the People. But Pompey would not fuffer it. So, having gently brought all to pass as he defired, he went unto the City of Brundusium, and there took Sea, and hoised fail. Now though his hafty Voyage, and thormels of time made him pass by many good Cities The courtesie without coming into them: notwithstanding, he would not so pass by the City of ATHENS, but landed there, and after he had facrificed to the gods, returned to imbark again. At his going out of the City, he read two Writings that were made in his praise, the one within the Gate which faid thus:

The humbler that thou doest thy self as man behave, The more thon doeft deferve the Name of God to have :

And the other Writing was without the Gate, which faid, We wisht for thee, we wait for thee,

Now because Powpry having taken certain of these Rovers by Sea that kept together, did use them gently when they required pardon, and having their Ships and bodies in his power, did them no hurt at all: their other Companions being in good hope of his mercy, fled from his other Captains and Lieutenants, and went and yeelded themselves, their Wives and Children into his hands. Passpey pardoned all them that came in of themselves, and by that means he came to have knowledge of the reft, and to follow them where they went, whom he took in the end : but knowing that they deferved no pardon, they hid themselves. Yet the most part and the richest of them, had conveyed their Wives, Children and Goods, and all other their Family unmeet for Wars, into strong Castles and little Towns upon Mount Tanrus: and such men as were able to carry Weapons, imbarked, and lay before a City of CORACESIUM, where they tarried Pompey, and gave him Battell first by Sea, and there were overcome, and asterwards they were belieged by Land. Howbeit shortly after, they prayed they might be received to mercy, and thereupon yeelded their Bodies, Towns, and Illands, which they had fortified , and were hard to have taken and worfe to have approached. Thus was this War ended, and all the Pyrates in lefs then three Moneths driven from the Sea wherefoever they were. He wan also a great number of other Shipa, besides fourof Pompsy upon foore and ten Gallies armed with Copper Spurs. And touching the men whom they had taken (who were in number above twenty thouland perions) he did not onely confider whether he should put them to death, but also thought it no wife part on the other side to let them go at liberty, to gather force again, being fo great a number of them as indeed they were; and all poor men and Soul-diers. Therefore weighing with himfelf that man by nature is not born a wild or a favage beaft, but contrarily becometh a bruit beaft changing nature, when he falleth to Vice : and again is made tame and tivill in time, changing place and manner of life; (as the bruit beafts that being wild by nature do also become gentle and tractable, with gentler usage by continuance) he determined to draw these How men are Pyrates from the Sea into the upland, and make them feel the true and innocent life, by dwelling in Towns, and manuring the Ground. Some of them therefore he placed in certain small Towns of the CILICIANS, that were fcant inhabited, and were very glad of them, giving them Land to keep them with. The Ciry of the SOLIANS also, that not long before had been deftroyed by Tigramer the King of ARMENIA, being defirous to replenish that again , he placed many of them there. He bestowed diversalso in the City of Dy MA in the Countrey of ACHAIA, which at that time lacked Inhabitants, and had great store of very good Land. Now therefore his Enemies reproved him greatly; and for that he did in CRETA, they that were his best and greatest Eriends milliked him. For Metellus that gentle person (a cousin to that Metellus which was his Colleague, and made Wats in SPAIN with him against Servorius) was fent Prator into Cast a before Pompey was chosen Generall against the Pyrates. This CRETA, next unto CILICIA, was even a second Den of Pyrates. Metellin finding there a great number of these Therves, took many of them and put them to death, even all that came to his Itands. Then, such as had scaped from him, being flraightly besieged, tent unto Pompey to pray him of pardon, and to take them to mercy : declaring unto him , that the Isle of CRETA was within the precinct of his charge , because all parts of that Region from the Sea , came just within the compass Pompeys lewd limited him on the Land. Pamper pardoning them upon their fubmission, wrote unto Metellus; and Feet against commanded him to leave off his War, and therewithall charged all the Cities, that they should not Metellus. obey Metellus Commandments. After that he fent Lucius Octavius one of his Lieutenants, who entred into the Towns Merellim befreged, and fought for the Pirates. This made Pompey not onely hated and envied, but derided also : for that under his Name he had protected fuch vile Theeves, that had neither God nor Law, and given them his Authority to fave their lives, for a little envy and emulation he bare unto Metelliss. And therefore they rightly reprove Achilles, and fay that he shewed not Achilles difthe part of a wife man, but of a young fool belides himself, for defire of Glory making a fign to the honest Fact. GRECIANS, forbidding them to ftrike at Hellor, to the end that as Homer faid :

Left le too late should to the Battell run. When others had the Honour of it won.

But Pompers Fact was worse then this: for he fought for the common Enemies of the World. and onely to deprive a ROMAN Prætor of Triumph, who had done great good fervice to have deftroyed them. This notwithstanding, Metellus lest not off his War for Pompeys Letters, but having taken the Pirates by affault, he put them to death : and afterwards having done Octavisus open shame through his Camp, he let him go. When News came to ROME, that the Pirates War was brought to good end, and that Pompey having no other service in hand, went visiting the Cities up and down, one Manliss a Tribune of the People, put forth another Pompey appoint-Decree unto them of this effect: That Pompey taking all the Army Lucullus had, and the Pro- ted Lucullus vinces under his Government, with all BITHYNIA, which Glabrio kept, should go make Successor. War upon the Kings, Tigranes and Muhridates, keeping in his hands notwithstanding all his jurisdiction and Army by Sea, in as Royall manner as he had it before. In fine, this was even to make one man Monarch and absolute Prince of all the ROMAN Empire. For by this second Decree, he had all these Countries, not named in his former Commission, added to amplifie his Authority, as PHRYGIA, LYCAONIA, GALATIA, CAPPADOCIA, CILICIA, high COLCHIDA and Armenia, with all the Armies and Forces with the which he had overcome those two mighty Kings. Then the Senate stuck not so much at the injury that was offered unto Luculus, depriving him of the honour of his doings, to give it to another, that should rather succeed him in honour of Triumph, then in danger of Wars, knowing that they did him too manifest injury, and shewed themselves too unthankfull : but that which most grieved them , was to see Pompeys power established in a plain tyranny. Hereupon therefore one of them perswaded and encouraged another. flourly to withftand this edict, and not to suffer their liberty to be lost in this fort. Notwithstanding. when the day came that this Decree should pass, they were so asraid to anger the People, that The boldness their hearts failed them, and none durft speak against it but Catulus onely, that earnessly inveyed of Canalas in against the passing of it a long time together, and greatly blamed the People. At the length, per-diffusding ceiving he had won never a man to take his part, he oftentimes cried out to the Senate, that they Manifus Law! should look to seek out some Mountain or high Rock to retire safely unto, to defend their liberty as their Ancestors had done in old time before them. All this prevailed not, for the Decree passed by the voices of all the Tribes, as it is reported. And thus was Pompey in his absence made Lord almost of all that, which Sylla by force of Arms, and by great effusion of Bloud (having made himself Lord of Rome) had before in his Power. When Pompey had received Letter's from Rome, advertifing him what the People had past in that behalf, some say that at the receit of them in the prefence of his familiar. Friends that were about him, and rejoyced with him for congranulation, he pretence or nis-raminar receives that was about many a pretence or nis-raminar receives that this browes, and clapped on his thigh, as though it grieved him marvelloully to have such great Pompeys great Offices and charge laid upon him, one in the neck of another, and burft forth in these words: diffimulation. O gods schall I never see an end of such a world of troubles as I have ! Had it not been better for me to have been a mean man born and unknown, then thus continually to be in War with Armour on my back? What, shall I never see the time, that breaking the necks of spite and envy against me, I may yet once in my life live quietly at home in my Countrey with my Wife and Children? When Pompey spake those words , his familiar Friends could not abide to fee his deep diffi- Quarrell bemulation, knowing that befides his naturall ambition, and covetous defire to rule, he was glad in twix Pompey his heart that he had his Charge, for the contention that was betweet him and Lucullus : which his and Lucullus deeds forthwith bewrayed. For he prefently fent out Precepts into every quarter, commanding all forts of Souldiers to come to him immediately, and made all the Princes and Kings within precinct of his Charge to come unto him, and going through the Countries, altered and changed all that Lucullin had established before. Furthermore, he did release the penalties enjoyned them, and took from them allo the Gifts that Lucullus bestowed on them. In fine, this was all his purpose and defire: to make them that honoured Luculius know, that he had no further power and authority to do any thing. Lucullus finding himfelf hardly handled by Pompey, the friends of either fide thought good they should meet and talk together : which came fo to pals, for they meet in the Countrey of GALATIA: And because they both were Captains of the ROMAN Armies and had done many Pompey and famous Acts, they had their Sergeants and Officers that carried the bundels of Rods before them, wrea. Lucultus meethed all about with Lawrell Boughs. When they met, Lucullus came out of a close and woody ting in Galasia: Country , all covered with green Trees; and Pompty on the other fide had paffed through a great Country, all covered wind green 1 rec; and tamp; Lucklim Sergeants feeing the Lawrell Boughs fandy plain, where no Tree was growing. Thereupon Lucklim Sergeants feeing the Lawrell Boughs of ARMENIA, at the request of Tigranes the younger', who was revolted against his Father, and went to meet with Pompey at the River of Araxes; which halt his beginning almost about the head them both : as for the other losses you have sustained heretofore, you must thank Lneullus for them, who bath taken from you SYRIA, PHOENICIA, CILICIA, GALATIA, and SOPHENA: but forthat you have left you till my coming, I will let you enjoy it, paying to the ROMANS a fine

drie and withered away, which Pompeys Sergeants carried, they gave them of their green and fresh Boughs to beautifie the Rods and Ares. This was a plain token that Pompey came to take Lacellus honour from him. In truth Luculius had been Confull before Pompey, and fo was he also an older man then he : yet the dignity of Pompty was greater , because he had triumphed twice. At their first meeting, their entertainment and discourse was with great ceremony and courtesse as might be, one highly praising the others Deeds, rejoycing at each others good success: but at parting they fell to hot words together, Pompey upbrayding Lucullus avarice, and Lucullus Pompeys ambition, to that their friends had much ado to part them. Luculius departing thence, divided the Lands in GALA-214, which he had conquered, and bestowed them and other Gifts on such as he thought good. Pemper on the other fide camping, hard by him, specially commanded the People in every part to obey him in nothing that he did: and belides he took all his Souldiers from him, leaving him onely fixteen hundred; which he supposed were such, as for disdain and ill will they bare him, would do him but fmall fervice. Furthermore, to blemish the glory of his doings, he told every body Luculius had fought with the pomp and fhadow onely of these two Kings, and that he had lest him to fight with all their whole force and power, Mithridates being then prepared for Wars, with Shields, Swords, and Horless Lucullus for revenge on the other fide faid , that Pompey went to fight but with a shadow of War, like a cowardly buzzard that preyeth upon dead bodies, which others have flain: and to cut afunder the remain of this War ended by another, as he had done before, attributing the bonour of the overthrow of Sertorius, Lepidus and Spartacus, to himself, where indeed Metellus Craffus, and Catuliu did overcome them. And therefore it was no marvell, that he fought the glory and honour to Triumph for the Kingdoms of PONTUS and ARMENIA : fith that through his subtile practises he had obtained Triumph for a few slaves and sugitives. Luculius being now gone his way, Pompey fent good Garrisons unto all the Coasts upon the Sea, from the Province of Phoe-NICIA ... unto the Realm of Bosphorus. That done, he took his journey by land towards Mithridates; who had in his Camp thirty thousand Footmen, and two thousand Horsemen, and yet durft not offer Battell, but camped first upon a Mountain of great strength, and hard to get upon: not-withstanding shortly after, he for look it for lack of Water. He was no sooner gone thence, but forthwith Pompin took it: who, conjecturing by the nature of the Plants and Trees in that place which were very green, and also by divers holes he found, that by reason thereabouts should be some Springs; the commanded them to dig welsin every corner; so that in a very short time all his Camp had Water enough, and he wondered at Misbrodates that he could not find that out in all the time be lay there. In the end, he went and camped round about Mitbridates, and intrenched him with a Wall within his own Camp: who after he had abidden the Siege five and forty days, fled away with all the choife of his Army, unknowing unto Rompey, having first flain all the fick and impotent persons within his Camp. inferential, Pompey found him another time by the River of Emphrates, and went and lodged hard by him. But fearing that Mitbridates would pass over the River before he and dependent of the contraction. fore he could prevent him in time, he raifed his Camp again, and marched away at midnight. About that time, they fay, that Mishridates faw that in a dream which did Prognosticate what would happen. He thought, that having the wind in the poop of the Ship, he was under fail in the middelt of the Sea of Mare Bofphorum, and that he was marvellous glad of it, and rejoyced with them that failed with him, thinking himfelf certainly past all danger : yet suddenly again, that all this Joy left him , and that he floated up; and down the waves of the Sea, upon a little piece of the Ship that was broken, trufting to the mercy of the Winds. As he was troubled with this ill favoured Dream, certain of his Familiars came to him and told him, that Pampey was come to near, that aftere was no shift, but they must needs fight to defend their Gamp. Thereupon his Captains straight began to put his men in battell ray, ready to fight. Pempsy understanding they prepared to make defence, was in doubet to venture: his men to fight in the dark, thinking it better to compais them in to keep them from flying, and then in the morning to fet upon them more easily, his men being the better Souldiers. But Rompeysold Captains were focarnefly in band with him to perswade him they thight fight, that in the end he was contented they should give charge, Now it was not so dark but they could four what for, for the Moon that was very low and upon her feeting, gave light enough to differn the body of a man : yet because the Moon was very low, the (hadow which gave our further fat then their bodies, camelalmoft even toutheir very Enemies , which did let them that they could not certainly judge what space of ground was between them, but imagining that they were hard by them, they call their Darts at the ROMAN & then they hurrinever a man, for their bodies were a great way from them. The Rosdam's perceiving that area upon them with great cases. But the barbarous People durft not abide their charge, they were to afraid, but turned their backs; and ran away for life, to that they were hain down right. Thus were there ten thousand of the barbacous Reople flain and more, and their, Camp alfo taken. As for Mubridates himfelf, at the beginning of the onlet, the made a lane through the Roman swith eight hundred Horsmen, and passed clean through them. But incontineolly histmen dispersed upon it, some one way, some another way, so that he was lest alone but with three persons onely, whereof Hypherana was one of the number, which had ever been valuant and had a mans heart combercapon, for that cuife. Some fay also, that there were certain AMAZONES at this Barrell; which fought, on the barbarous Peoples fide, coming from the Mountains that run along the River of Therm Coffiche Kings For, after the Overthrow given, the ROMANS spoyling the dead, found Targets and Buskins of the AMAZONES, but not a body of a Woman among them. After this Battell , Pompey going to invade the Countrey of HYRCANIA, as far as Mare Caspinam, he was compelled to go back again for the infinite number of deadly venomous Serpents which he met with , being come within three days journey of ir. So he returned back again into ARMENIA the lefs, and there received Prefents which were fent unto him from the Kings of the ELYMIANS and the MEDES, and wrote very courteoully unto them again : howbeit he fent Afranium with part of his Army against the King of the PAR-THIANS, who had invaded the Countrey of GORDINEA, and harried and spoyled the King Tigranes Subjects. Notwithstanding he drave him out , and followed him unto ARIELITIDE. Furthermore, all the Lemmans and Concubines of King Mitbridates being brought unto Pempey, he would touch none of them, but fent them all home again to their Parents and Friends, because the most of them were either the Daughters of Princes, of Noblemen, or of Captains. Notwithstratonice Mi. standing , Stratonice that of all the rest of his Lemnans had most credit about Methridates, unto whom he had left the Charge of his Caftle, where the greatest part of his Treasure of Gold and Silver lay, was a Singers Daughter, who (as they faid) was not rich, but an old man. She having fung one night before Mithridates, being at Supper, he fell in such fancy with her, that he would needs have her lie with him the fame night, and the old man her Father went home offended, because the King would not fo much as give him one gentle word. But the next morning when he arofe, he marvelled to fee the Tables in his House full of Plate of Gold and Silver, and a great company of Serving-men, Grooms of Chamber and Pages, and that they had brought him marvellous rich Apparell, and a Horse ready at the Gates bravely surnished, as the Kings Familiars did use when they went abroad into the City: he thought it was done in mockery, to have made sport with him, and therefore would have run his way, had not the Serving-men kept him, and told him that they were a great rich mans goods that died of late, which the King had bestowed on him, and that all this he faw, was but a little Portion in respect of the other Goods and Lands he gave him. So the old man believing them, at the length did put on this Purple Gown they brought bin, and got up on Horfeback, and riding through the Streets cried, All this is mine, all this is mine. Certain laughing him to fcorn for it, he Pompey, abili- told them: Mafters , ye may not wonder to hear me thus crie out, but rather, that I throw not Stones nence from to at them I meet, I am so mad for joy. Such was Stratonices Birth and Parentage, as we have told you, She did then deliver this Caftle into Pempeys hands, and offered him many goodly rich Prefents, but he would take none of them, other then such as served to adorn the Temples of the gods, and to beautifiehis Triumph, and left all the reft with Stratopice her felf, to dispote as she thought good. In like manner also, the King of the IBERIANS, having fent him a Bed-stead, a Table, and a Chair of clean Gold, praying him to take it as a remembrance from him he delivered it over unto the Treasurers custody, to be accountable for it unto the Senate. In another Castle called Camon, he Mibrilates te found certain fecret Letters fent from Mibrilates , which pleafed him marvelloufly to read, because thereby he plainly understood the Kings nature and inclination. For in them were mentioned that he had poyfoned (besides many other) Ariarather his own Son , and Aleass the SARDINIAN, because he had won the Bell, at the Horf-race before him. There was also interpreting of Dreams, that either himself or his Wives had dreamed, and also Love-letters betwixt Monime and him. Theophanes writeth also, that there was found an Oration of Rutiline, in the which he enticed and perfwaded Mithridates to put all the ROMANS to death that were in ASIA. Howbeit in reason men think that this was a shamefull lie, maliciously devised by Theophanes, who hated Rusilius, because he was but a counterfeit to him : or peradventure to gratifie Pompey, whose Father Rusilius in his Histories described to be as wicked a man as ever lived. Thence Pompey departed towards the City of AMISUS. There his ambition brought him to commit such Facts, as he himself did condemn before in Lucullus : for that his Enemy being yet alive ; he took upon him to establish Laws, to give Gifts, and distribute such Honours, as Captains that had obtained Victory were wont to do , when they had ended all War and trouble. For he himself (Misbridares being yet the stronger in the Realm of Bos PHORUS , and having a great puissant Army about him) did all that which he reproved another for , appointing Provinces , and giving out Gifts to every man according as he deferved : to gratific twelve barbarous Kings, with divers other Princes, Lords and Captains that came to him thither. Writing also to the King of PARTHIA, he disdained to give him that Title, which others were wont to do in the direction of their Letters, calling him King of Kings. Furthermore, he had a wonderfull great defire to win Syria, and to go through ney into Syrii. the Countrey of ARABIA, even unto the red Sea, because he might enlarge his Conquests and Vi-Ctories every way, even unto the great Sea Oceanum, that compaffeth all the whole Earth, For in Ly-BIA, he was the first ROMAN that conquered all to the great Sea. On the other fide, in SPAIN he enlarged the Empire of ROMB, and brought the Confines thereof unto Mare Atlanticum. And thirdly, having lately the ALBANIANS in chale, he came almost unto Mare Hyrcanium. Thus he pur himfelf in Journey, intending his circuit unto the red Sea, specially because he saw Mithri-to follow, and worle to overcome by force when he fled, then when he fought anv Bartler and that made him fay, that he would leave a sharper Enemy behind him then himself : and that he meant Famine. For he appointed Souldiers with fufficient number of Ships, to lie in wait for the Merchants that failed to the Countrey of Bos PHORUS, to carry them any Victuals or other Merchandizes, prohibiting them upon pain of death that should attempt it. Then he went forward with the best part of his Army, and in his way, found the bodies of the dead ROMANS which Mithridates had overthrown under the leading of Triarius their Captain, and were yet un- Pompty buried. So he caused them all to be taken up, and honourably buried. Lucullus having forgotten, brought Syria buried. or otherwise neglected to do it, in my conscience that was the chiefest cause why his men did hate and Governhim. Pompey now having by Afranius subdued the ARABIANS dwelling about Mount Amanus, ment of a Prowent himself in Person into Syria, and made a Government and Province of it, being won to vince. the ROMAN Empire, for that it lacked a lawfull King; and conquered all lurie also, where he took King Aristobulus, and builded certain (ities there, and delivered others also from bondage, which by Tyrants were forcibly kept, whom he chaftiled well enough. Howbeit he foent the most part of his time there, deciding of Controversies, pacifying of Contentions and quarrels by Arbitrement, which fell out betwixt the free Cities, Princes and King, and fent of his Friends into those places where he could not come himself. For on a time when he was chosen Arbitrator betwixt the PARTHIANS and the ARMENIANS, touching the Title of a Countrey which both parties claimed, he sent three Commissioners thither to judge definitively betwirt them both. If Pompeys Pompeys Verfame and renown were great, no less was his Vertue, Justice and Liberality, which indeed did hide tues. many faults, his friends and Familiars about him did commit. For truly he was of fo gentle a nature. that he could neither keep them from offending, nor yet punish them when they had offended. Notwithstanding, he did use them so well that complained unto him, or that had to deal with him in any matter, that he made them contented patiently to bear their covetouinels and straight The power and dealing. One of his chiefest Familiars about him whom he loved best, was called Demetrius, a infolency of bondman infranchifed, who otherwife was very discreet in his doings, but being somewhat too bold Demetrius; of his good fortune: of him they make this mention. Cato the Philosopher being at that time a Pompeyo inyoung man, yet of good judgement and of a noble mind, in Pompeys absence went to see the City franchised of ANTIOCH. Now for himself, his manner was always to go on foot, and all his friends be-bondman, fides that did accompany him to honour him, were on Horf-back. He perceiving afar off, a great fort of People coming towards him all in white, and of one fide of the Street little Children, and on the other Boyes, round about him as in a ring : at the first he was angry withall, thinking thev had done it for his fake to honour him, that they made this Procession, which he in no wise would have had done. Thereupon he commanded his Friends to light from their Horses, and go on foor with him. But when they came near to the Gate of the City, the Mafter of the Ceremonies that led this Procession, having a Garland on his Head, and a Rod in his hand, came unto them, and asked them, where they had left Demetrius, and when he would come? Cato's Friends laughed to hear this question: then said Cato, Alas poor City: and so passed by it. Notwithstanding, Pompey Cato'rexelahimself was cause that Demetrius had the less ill will born him, then otherwise he should have mation against himself was cause that Demetries had the cles in with had; because they saw how boldly he would use Pompey, and how well he would take it without Demetries, had; because they saw how boldly he would use Pompey, and how well he would take it without Demetries inoffence. It is reported, that when Pompey oftentimes had bidden some to Dinner or Supper; while franchised he was entertaining and welcoming of them, and would tarry till they were all come: Demetrius bondman. would be fet at the Board, and prefumptuoully have his Head covered even to the very ears. And furthermore, before he returned into ITALY out of his Journey, he had already purchased the goodliest Houses of Pleasure, and fairest Walkes that were about ROME, and had sumptuous Gardens alfo, the which the People commonly called, Demetrini Gardens : though his Mafter Pomper was but meanly housed till his third Consulship. Howbeit afterwards, he built that famous ftately Theater, called Pompeys Theater; and joyned unto that also another House; as a Pent-house Pompeys The to his Theater, far more sumptuous and stately then the first, and yet no more then needed. Informuch as he that was Owner of it after him, when he came into it, he marvelled, and asked whereabouts it was that Pompey dined and supped. These things are reported thus. Now the King of The King of the ARABIANS, that dwelt about the Castle called Petra, having never untill that time made Arabia. any account of the ROMANS Army was then greatly afraid of them, and wrote unto Pompey, Petra Submitthat he was at his devotion, to do what he would command him. Pompey thereupon to prove him, eth himself to whether he meant as he spake , brought his Army before this Castle of Petra. Howbeit this Pompey, Voyage was not liked of many men, because they judged it was an occasion found out to leave following of Mithridates, against whom they would have had him rather have bent his force, being an ancient Enemy to ROME and that began to gather ftrength again, and prepared (as they heard fav) to lead a great Army through SCYTHIA and PANNONIA into ITALY. But Pompey thinking he should fooner diminish his power by suffering him to go on with Wars, then that he should otherwise be able to take him flying : would not toil to follow him in vain. And for these causes he would needs make Wars in other places, and linger time fo long: that in the end he was put by hishope. For when he was not far from the Castle of Petra, and had lodged his Camp for that day: as he was riding and mannaging his Horse up and down the Camp, posts came flinging to him from the Realm of PONTUS, and brought him good news, as was eafily to be discerned afar off by the heads of their Javelings, which were wreathed about with Lawrell Boughs. The Souldiers perceiving that, flocked ftraight about him; but Pompey would make an end of his riding first, before he read these Letters. Howbeir they crying to him, and being importunate flat this, be lighted from his Horfe, and returned into his Camp, where there was no stone high enough for him to stand upon to speak unto them; and again, the Souldiers would not tarry the making of one after the manner of their Camp, which men of War do make themselves, with great Turves of Earth, laying one of them upon another: but for hafte and earnest defire they had to hear what news there was in the Letters, they layed together a heap of Saddles one upon another, and Pompey getting up on them, told how Mithridates was dead, and had killed himself with his own hands, because his Son Pharnaces did rebell against him, and had won all that which his Father possessed writing unto him, that he kept it for himself and the ROMANS. Upon these news, all the Camp, ye may imagine, made wonderfull joy, and did Sacrifice to the gods, giving them thanks and were as merry as if in Mithridates Person alone, there had died an infinite number of their Enemies. Pompty by this occasion, having brought this War more easily to pals then he hoped for, departed prefently out of ARABIA; and having speedily in few days passed through the Countries lying by the way, he came at length to the City of Amisus. There he found great Presents that were brought unto him from Pharnaces, and many dead bodies of the Kings Bloud, and amongst the rest, Mithridates Corps, which would not well be discerned by his Face, because they that had the carrying of his Body had forgotten to drie up the brain: nevertheless, such as desired to see him, knew him by certain scars he had in his Face. For Pompey Would in no wise see him: but to avoid envy, fent him away unto the City of Synope. He wondered much at the marvellous fumpruous rich Apparell and Weapons that he wore. The scabbard of his Sword (which cost four hundred Talents) was stolen by Publim, and sold to Ariarathes. Also a Hat of Mithridates, of wonderfull workmanship, being begged of Caiss his Foster-brother was secretly given to Fastfrus the Spri of Sylla, without Pomjeys privity. But afterwards when Pharnaces underflood of it, he punished the parties that had imbezelled them. Pompey having ordered all things, and established that Province, went on his Journey homewards with greater Pomp and Glory. So coming unto Pompeys return MITTLENE, he released the City of all Taxes and Payments for Theophanes sake, and was present out of Afa. at a certain Play they yearly make for Games, where the Poets report their Works contending one with another, having at that time no other matter in hand, but Pompey: Acts and Gefts. Pompey liked exceeding well of the Theater, where these Plays were made, and drew a Modell or Platform of it, to make a statelier then that in ROME. As he passed by the City of RHODES, he would needs here all the Rhetoritians dispute, and gave every one of them a Talent. Posidonim had written the disputation he made before Pompey, against Hermagoras the Rhetoritian, upon the theam and proposition Pempey himself did give them, touching the Generall question. Pempey did the like at A-THENS unto the Philosophers there. For he gave towards there-edifying of the City again, fitty Talents. So he thought at his return home into ITALY, to have been very honourably received, and longed to be at home to fee his Wife and Children, thinking also that they long looked for him: but the god that hath the charge given him to mingle Fortunes prosperity with some bitter sop of adversity, laid a block in his way at home in his own House to make his return more forrowfull. For Musia his Wife had in his absence played salse at Tables. But Pompey being then far off, made no account of the reports nor tales that were told him. Howbeit, when he drew near unto ITALY, and that he was more attentive to give ear to the ill reports he heard, then he fent unto her to tell her, that he refused her for his Wife, writing nothing to her at that time, neither ever after told the cause why he had forfaken her. Notwithstanding, in Cicero's Epistles, the cause appeareth. Furthermore, there were rumors ran abroad in ROME, which troubled them fore, being given out that he would bring his Army straight to ROME, and make himself absolute Lord of all the Roman Empire. Craffe the supon, either for that he believed it indeed to be true, or (as it was thought) to make the acculation true, and the envy towards Pompey the greater, conveied himself, his family and goods suddenly out of ROME. So Pompey when he came into ITALY, return out of Affia dilcharcalled all his Souldiers together; and after he had made an Oration unto them, as time and occasion required; he commanded them to sever themselves, and every man to repair home to apply his bulinels, remembring to meet at ROME together at the day of his Triumph, His Army being thus dispersed, and straight reported abroad for news, a marvellous thing happened unto him. The Cities feeing Pompts the Great without Souldiers, having but a small train about him of his familiar Friends onely, went all of them to meet him, not as though he were returned home from his great Conquefts, but from fome Journey taken for his pleasure. Such was the love of the People to him, that they accompanied him to ROME, whether he would or not, with a greater power then that he had brought into ITALY: fo that if he had been disposed to have made any innovation in the Common-wealth, he had not needed his Army. In those days there was a Law : that no man should enter into Rome before his Triumph: whereupon Pompey fent to the Senate, to pray them to defer the chufing of Confuls for a few days, because he might be present to further Pife, who fued for the Consulship that year. They denied him his request, by Cato's means that hindred it. Pompey marvelling to hear of the boldness and plain speech, which he onely used of all other to defend his just Causes, had a marvellous destre to win him, and to make him his Friend. So Cato having two Neeces, Pompey, desired to marry the one himself, and the other for his Son. But Cato militrutting this desire of Pompey, that it was a colour onely to win and corrupt him, denied him flatly. His Wife and Sifter on the other fide, they were angry with him for refufing to make alliance with Pompey the Great. About that time it chanced, that Pompey being very desirous to prefer Afranius to be Confull, he caused certain Money to be given among the Tribes of the People, and the same was delivered out to some even in his own Gardens. This thing being reported abroad in the City, every man spake ill of Pempey : that he pur the Confulthip to fale for Money unto those that could not deserve it by Vertue, fith himself onely had obtained it by purchase of many a noble and worthy deed. Then faid Cato to his Wife and Sifter: Lo now, we had been partakers of this fault too, had we matched with Pompey, When they heard it, they confessed he had reason to resuse the match, for equity and his honour. But now to his Triumph, Pompeys third For the statelines and magnificence thereof, although he had two days space to shew it, yet he lacked Triumph. time; for there were many, things prepared for the Shew, that were not feen, which would have ferved to have fer our another Triumen. First there were Tables carried, whereon were written the Names and Titles of all the People and Nations for the which he triumped, as these that follow: The The Countries Kingdom of PONTUS, ARMENIA, CAPPADOCIA, PAPHLAGONIA, MEDIA, COLCHIS, IBERIA, ALBANIA, SYRIA, CILICIA, and MESOPOTAMIA: and furthermore, the People Pompey. that dwell about Phoenicia and Palestine, Judea, and Arabia: and all the Pirates which he had overcome both by Sea and by Land, in all parts of the World. In all these Countries he rook about a thousand Castles, few less then nine hundred Towns and Cities: of Piraces Shins eight bundred , and nine and thirty defolate Towns left without Inhabitants, replenished again with People by him. Moreover, these Tables declared, that the revenue of the Common-wealth of Roms before these Conquests he made, amounted yearly but to five thousand Miriades: and that from thenceforth with the fums he had added unto the former revenue, they should now receive eight thousand and five hundred Miriades : and that he brought presently in ready Gold and Silver, and in Plate and Jewels, to put into the common Treasurie, the value of twenty thousand Talents, besides that which had been distributed already among the Souldiers: of the which, he that had leaft for his share, had sitteen hundred Drachmaes, The Prisoners that were led in the shew of this Triumph, besides the Captains of the Piraces, were these that follow: The Son of Tiorans King of AEMENIA, with his Wife and Daughter : the Wife of King Tieranes himself. called Zohme : Arifobulus King of Juny : Mithridates Sifter, with five Sons of hers , and some Ladies of SCYTHIA. The Hodages also of the IBERIANS and the ALBANIANS and also of the Captives led Kings of the COMMAGENIANS: over and befides a great number of other marks of Triumphs in Pompeys which himself or his Lieutenant had won at fundry Battels in divers places. But the greatest honour third Trithat ever he wan , and which never other Confull of the ROMANS but himself obtained , was this, umph. that he made his third Triumph of the three parts of the World. Divers other ROMANS had trithat it make up him a Anthony the first triumphed of AFRICE: the second time of Europe: Pompeyconqueshe third time of Asia. So that it appeared by these three Triumphs, that he had triumphed in red three parts manner of all the land that is inhabited, being at that time (as it is reported by them which compare of the World : his doings unto Alexander the great) under four and thirty years of age, though in troth at that Africk Europe, time he was near forty. in the end. Whereupon Cato wifely told them afterwards, that faid, the civill Wars betwixt Pompey and Cafar was cause of the destruction of the Common-wealth : that their enmity and difcord was not the chief original cause of this misery, but rather their friendship and agreediffer Law for ment. For by their friendship Casar was chosen Consult, who straight fell to flatter the People and poor men, and made a Law for the restoring of the Colonies belonging to ROMS and for differibuting of Lands to them that had none, imbaling the Majesty and Dignity of the chief Magistrates, and making the Consulship in a manner no better then the Tribuneship of the People. Bibulss his Colleague and fellow Confull, did what he could to refift him, and Caro allo did aid him to his power, until Cafar openly brought Pempey into the Pulpit for Orations before the People, and calling him by his Name, asked him if he did give his confent to the Decrees which he did fet with Cafar, for forth. Pempey answered him, he did. Why then, faid Cefar, if any man will by force let the paffing pulling his Law of this Law by Voices of the People, wilt thou then come to help them? Yes that I will indeed, faid Pompey: against them that threaten with the Sword, I will bring both Sword and Target. Pompey in all his life never did nor spake thing that men more misliked, then that which he said at that time. His Friends excused him, and said it was a word passed his mouth before he was aware : but his deeds afterwards shewed, that he was altogether at Cefars Commandment. For not many days after, hemarried Julia the Daughter of Cefar: which was affianced or made fure before unto Ser-Pompey marti. after, he married Julia the Daughter of Cafar: which was affianced or made fure before unto Seruth Julia the willis Capio, when no man thought of it: and to pacific Capios anger, he gave him his own Daughter in marriage, whom he had also promised before unto Faustum, the Son of Sylla 1 and Cafar also married Calphurnia the Daughter of Pifo. After this, Pompey filling all ROME with Souldiers, did what he would by force. For as the Confull Bibulus came into the Market-place accompanied with Lucullus and Cato, they fuddenly fet upon him, and brake the bundels of Rods which his Officers carried before him: and some one, whatsoever he was, cast a basket of horf-Dung upon his place by Pom- head. Moreover, the two Tribunes that were in his company, were also very fore hurt. By this means having cleared the Market-place of all their Enemies, they passed the Law for division of Lands, as they would themselves. The People being flethed with this bait, were contented to be ruled by them as they would, and would never flick at any matter that they would have passed. So were all Pomp. y. matters confirmed, which Luculing was against: and they appointed unto Cafar alfo, the Government of the Gauls on this fide and beyond the ALPES: and ILLYRIA for five years space, bris appointed with four whole Legions. The next day following were appointed Confuls, Pife Cefars Father in unto Cajar. Pilo and Gabinius the greatest flatterer Pampy had about him. But now while things stood in these Pijo and Gabi.

Cato forethere onely sent out Bills and set them up on every post in open places, accusing Pompty and Cafar. Cato on the other fide, as if he had been inspired with the spirit of Prophetie, told openly in the Senate-House, what would become of the Common-wealth and Pempey. Luculin growing old , lay ftill and took his pleafure, and would no more meddle in the Common-wealth. At that time it was that Pompey faid, it was more unfeafonable for an old man to follow his pleafure, then to attend matters of the Comand of Pompey. mon-wealth. Yet himfelf fhortly after was so doted of his young Wife, that he would follow her up and down in the Countrey, and in his Gardens, and leave all Affairs of weight afide. Whereupon (Value being then Tribune of the People, despited Pompey, and began to enter into seditions attempts. For when he had driven Cicero out of ROME and had fent away Cato to make Wars in Cyprus, and that Cafar also was occupied in GAUL, and finding that the People in like case were at his Commandment, because to flatter them he did what they would have him : he attempted incontinently to undoe fome thing that Pompey had established. Amongst other things, he took young Tigrants out of Prison, and ever carried him up and down with him wheresoever he went, and continually pickt quarrels unto Pompegs Friends, to try what credit he had. In the end Pompey coming abroad one day into the common Affembly, to hear how a matter of his was handled, this Codius having a company of vagabonds and desperate men about him, that cared not what they did: he sitting in a place where he might be feen from the rest, began to ask these questions out aloud: Who is the licentiousest Captain in all this City? What man is he that feeks for a man? What is he that feratcheth his head with one finger? They , like a company of Dancers and Singers , when he spake and clapped his hands on his Gown, answered him straight aloud to every question, that it was Pompe). This went to Pompey, heart, that was not wont to hear himself so ill spoken of openly, neither grierousty pey. This went to Pompeys neart, that was not wont to made him bite the lip more, when he saw scomed of Cle-was acquainted with any such kind of fight: but yet it made him bite the lip more, when he saw scomed of Cle-was acquainted with any such kind of fight: but yet it made him bite the lip more, when he saw the Senate glad to fee him thus ashamed and reproved, as a just revenge and punishment for his vile betraying and forfaking of Cicero. So great stir and uproar being made upon this in the Marketplace, and many men fore hurt, and one of Clodins bondmen being taken also in the prefs of the People with a Sword in his hand; very near unto Pompey: making this his colour (but otherwife fearing Clodius infolency and proud words) he would never after come into the Marker-place, as long as Cloding was Tribune, but kept at home ftill, confulting with his Friends what way he should take to appeale the anger of the Senate against him. Thereupon one of his Friends called Culco, periwaded him to put away his Wife Julia, and utterly to refuse Cafars friendfhip, and to flick again to the Senate: but he would none of that. Norwithstanding he was contented to hearken unto them that gave him councell to call Cicero home again, who was Clodise mortall Eneray, and in great favour with the Senate. Thereupon he brought Cicero's Brother into the Market-place, to move the matter to the People, with a great number of men about him, where they fell to blowes, and divers were flain of either fide: notwithflanding, come, he brought Pompey again in favour with the Senate, and standing with the Law propounded to give Pompey Authority to cause Corn to be brought to ROME, he once again made him have power both by Land and Sea over all the Territories of the ROMANS. For all the Havens, Marts, and Fairs, and all Store-houses of Corn, yea moreover all the trade of Merchan-Commission dize and Tillage, came under Pampeys hands. Then Clodius accusing him, faid: that the Senate had given to Paminot made this Law for the dearth of Victuals, but that they made a dearth of Victuals, because ing Com into the Law should pass, to revive Pompeys Power and Authority again, that was almost under foot. Rosec. Other fay, that this was a device of Lentulus Spiniber the Confull, who gave Pompey the greater Authority, because he might be fent to put King Prolomy again into his Kingdom. This notwith- The Restoring standing , Canidim the Tribune preferred another Law to fend Pompey without an Army, with two again of Pro-Sergeants onely to carry the Axes before him, to bring Ptolomie in favour again with the ALEX limic King of Argyl to his ANDRIANS. This Law feemed not to millike Pompey: but the senate with honest colour put by Resim. this Law, as being afraid left Pompeys person would miscarry in so doing, Nevertheless, little Papers were found thrown about the Market-place, and the Senate-house, declaring that Prolonie defired Pompey might come to aid him in Spinibers stead. Timagenes writeth notwithstanding, that Ptilomie went to ROME, and left EGYPT, without any occasion given him, at the perfwafion of Theophanes, who perfwaded him to do fo, because he would give Pempey occasion to make new Wars. But Theophanes craft and fubrilty made not this matter to credible, as Pompeys wir and good nature made it altogether untrue; for his ambition was nothing fo vile or ill, as that was. So Pompey having now full Authority to cause Corn to be brought to ROME, he sent then his Lieutenants and Friends abroad, and himfelf in person went into Cicile. Now being ready to return again, there arose such a storm of wind in the Sea, that the Mariners were indoubt to weigh their Anchors. But himself first imbarked, and commanded them straight to hoise fail. crying out aloud, It is of necessity I must go, but not to live. So, through his boldness and good fpirit, using the good Fortune he had, he filled all the places of Mart, and Markets with Corn, and all the Sea besides with Ships : infomuch, the plenty he brought did not onely furnish the City of ROME, but all their neighbours also about them, and came like a lively Spring that dispersed it self through all ITALY. About that time, the great Conquests that Casar made in GAUL, did set Great repair him aloft. For when they thought that he was occupied in Wars far off from ROME, with the unto Cafar BELGIANS, SVVISSES, and English-men, he by secret practise, was in the middest among the Luca. People at ROME, and most against Pompey in the weightiest Affairs of the Common-wealth. For he had the power of an Army about his Person, which he did harden with pains and continual practife, not with intent to fight onely against the barbarous People : but for the Battelshe had with them, were in manner but as a hunting sport, by the which he made himself invincible, and dreadfull to the World. But furthermore, by the infinite Gold and Silver, and the incredible spoils and Treasure which he wan upon the Enemies whom he had overcome : and by sending great Presents alfo to ROME, to the Ediles , Prators , Confuls, and their Wives, he purchased him many Friends. Therefore, after he had passed over the ALPES again, and was come to winter in the City of Lu-CA, a world of People (both men and Women) and of the Senate themselves almost two hundred Perfons (and amongst them, Craffur and Pompey by Name) went out of ROME unto him. Furthermore, there were feen at Cefars Gate, fixicore Sergeants carrying Axes before Prætors, or Proconfuls. So Cafar fent every one back again, either full of Money, or good words: but with Pompr) and (rass, he made a match, that they two together, should be to be Confuls, and that he himself would tend them good aid to ROME, at the day of Election, to give their Voices. And if they were chosen, that they should then practise by Decree of the People, to have the Governments of some new Provinces and Armies assigned them : and withall, that they should adjourn the Government of those Provinces he had, for five years more. This pack being bewrayed and spread abroad through ROME, the honestest fort misliked much thereof. Whereupon Marcellinus at an open Affembly of the People, did ask them both, if they would fue for the Confulfhip at the next Election. So, they being urged by the People to make answer, Pompey spake first, and faid: Peradventure he would, peradventure not. Crassus answered more gently, that he would do that which should be best for the Common-wealth. Then Marcellinus sharply inveying against Pompey, he angerly again cast him in the teeth, and faid, that Marcellinus was the rankest churl, and the unthanklullest beast in the world : for that of a dumb man he had made him Eloquent, and being in manner starved and famished, many a time he had filled his belly. This notwithstanding divers that before were determined to sue for the Consulship, went no further in it, saving Luciun Domitiun, whom Caro counfelled and incouraged not to give it over: for, faid he, thou doft not contend for the Confulfhip, but to defend the common liberty of thy Countrey against two Tytanis. Pompey therefore fearing Cate's Faction, lest that having all the Senates good wills; he should draw also the best part of the violence of the People after him, thought it not good to suffer Domitius to come into the Market-place. To of Pompey obthis end therefore, he sent men armed against him, who at the first order, slew the Torch-bearer that taining the fecarried the Torch before him, and made all the rest to flie: amongst whom also fato was the last man cond Consulthat retired, who was hurt in his elbow defending of Domitius. Pompey and Craffus being become thip. that retired, who was hurt in his elbow detending of Domitian. Tompty and Craffes come become from Pompty and Confuls after this fort, they ordered themselves nothing the more temperately, nor honeftly. For Craffes fecond first of all, the People being about to chuse Cate Prætor, Pempey being at the Affembly of the E-Confulfine.

Tection, perceiving that they would chuse him, brake up the Assembly, falsly alledging that he had noted certain ill figns; and afterwards, the Tribes of the People being bribed and corrupted with Money, they chole Aniss and Vatiniss Prators. After that, by Trebenius Tribune of the People, they published Edicts, authorising Casars charge for five years longer, according to the appointment they had made with Casar. Unto Crossim also they had appointed Syria, and the War against the Parthians. Unto Pempey in like case, all Africk, and both Spains, with four Legions besides : of the which, at Cefars desire, he lent him two Legions to help him in his War in Gaul. These things done, Crassus departed to his Province, at the going out of his Confulship: and Pompty remained at ROME about the dedicating of his Theater, where he caused many goodly Playes to be made, both for exercise of person, as also for Learning and Musick, and caufed wild Beafts also to be baited and hunted, and killed five hundred Lions. But of all things, there was no such fearfull fight and terrible Fight, as was between the Elephants. This great charge and bountifull expense, defrayed by Pompey, to fhew the People paftime and pleafures, made him again to be very much efteemed of, and beloved amongst the People. But on the other side, he wan himself as much ill will and envy, in committing the Government of his Provinces and Legions into the hands of his Lieutenants, whilest he himself roamed up and down the pleasant places of ITALY, with his Wife at his pleasure: either because he was far in love with her, or else for that she loved him so dearly, that he could not find in his heart to leave her company. It was reported of her (being known of many) that this young Lady Julia loved her Husband more dearly, not for Tempess flourishing age, but for his affured continence, knowing no other Woman but her : befides also, he was no folemn man, but pleasant of conversation, which made Women love him marvelloully, unless we will reprove the Curtifan Flera's Testimony. It is certain, that at an Election of the Ediles, men rifing fuddenly in hurly burly, drew their Swords, and many were flain about Pompey: infomuch as his cloaths being bloudied, he fenthis men home in hafte to fetch him other to change him. His young Wife that was great with child, feeing his cloaths bloudy, took fuch a fright upon it, that she feil down in a swound before them, that they had much ado to recover her; and yet she fell straight in labour upon it, and was delivered. So that they themselves, which blamed him most for his good will he bare unto Cafar, could not reprove the love he bare unto his Wife. Another time after that, the was great with child again, whereof the died, and the Child lived not many days after the Mother. As Pampi, was about to carry her into the Countrey to be buried, to a House he had there near unto the City of Alba, the People by force took her Corps, and carried it into the Field of Mars, more The death of for the pity they took of the young Lady, then to pleasure either Casar or Pompey: and yet what the People did for them, it appeared rather they did it more for Cafars fake being ablent, then for Pempes that was present. But straight when his alliance was broken, which rather covered then bridled their ambitious defire to rule, there arose a new stir in ROME immediately, and every mans mouth was full of prittle prattle and feditious words. Not long after that also came news that Crassus was overthrown, and flain in PARTHIA: who was a manifest stay and let to keep them two from civill Wars, for that they both feared him, and therefore kept themselves in a reasonable fort together. But when Fortune had taken away this third Champion, who could have withflood the better of them both that had overcome the other, then might have been faid of thefe two which remained, as the Comicall Poet faid:

The beginning of the diffention betwixt Pompey and Cz(ir.

See how these Champions purposing each others force to try,

With nointed shin, and dusty hands, stand vaunting valiantly. So little can Fortune prevail against nature, having no power to stop covetoulness: fith so large and great an Empire, and such a wide Countrey besides could not contain the covetous desire of these two men. But though they had often both heard and read:

Among the gods themselves all things by Lot divided are,

And none of them intrudes himfelf within his neighbours share. Yet they thought that the Empire of Rome was not enough for them, which were but two. But Pempey spake openly in an Oration he made unto the People, that he ever came to Office before he looked for it, and also left it sooner then they thought he would have done : and that he witnessed by discharging his Army so soon. Then thinking that Cafar would not discharge his Army, he lought to make himfelf strong against him, by procuring Offices of the City, without any other alteration. Neither would be seem to mistrust him , but he plainly shewed that he did delpife and contemn him. But when he saw that he could not obtain the Offices of the City as he would, because Citizens that made the Elections were bribed with Money, he then left it without a Magistrate, so that there was none either to command, or that the People should obey. Hereupon there ran a bruit straight, that there must needs be a Dictator made, and the first man that propounded it, was Lucilina Tribune of the People, who perswaded them to chuse Pampey. But Cato stuck so stoutly against it, that the Tribune had like to have lost his Office, even in the Market-place. But then many of Pompeys Friends stepped up, and excused him, saying: that he neither fought, nor would have the Dictatorship. Then Cato commended him much, and prayed him to fee good order kept in the Common-wealth. Pompey being ashamed to deny so reasonable a request, was carefull of it. Thereupon two Confuls were chosen, Domitius, and Messala but afterwards when the state began to change again by the death of one of the Consuls, and that nate for Pom divers were more earneftly bent to have a Dichator then before, Cato fearing it would break out with fury, determined to give Pompey some Office of reasonable Authority, to keephim from the other more tyrannicall. Infomuch, as Bibulus himfelf being chief of the Senate, and Pompeys might be chosen Consul alone : for, faid he, by this means. be rid of the present trouble : or else it shall be in bondage to an ho-

This opinion was marvelled at, in respect of him that spake it. Whereupon, Cato stand- Cato strake in ing up, it was thought straight that he would have spoken against him : but silence being made him, he Pompersfavour plainly told them, that for his own part he would not have been the first man to have propounded that was fpoken: but fithence it was fpoken by another, that he thought it reasonable and meet to be followed. And therefore, faid he, it is better to have an Officer to command, whatfoever he be, rather then none : and that he faw no man fitter to command, then Pompey, in so troublesome a time. All the Senate liked his opinion, and ordained that Pompey should be chosen sole Conful, and that it he faw in his discretion he should need the affistance of another companion, he might name any whom he thought good, but not till two moneths were past. Thus was Pompey made Conful alone Pompey cholen by Sulpiting, regent for that day. Then Pompey made very friendly countenance unto Cato, and Conful. thanked him for the honour he had done him, praying him privately to affift him with his counsel in the Consulfhip. Cato answered him, that there was no cause why he should thank him, for he had fpoken nothing for his fake, but for respect of the Commonwealth onely : and for his counsel, if he would ask it, he should privately have it, if not, yet that he would openly say that which he thought. Such a man was Cato in all his doings. Now Pompey returning into the City, married Pompey married thought. Such a man was caro man in onigs. Her father also, was a noble man, both in blood and life. Notwithstanding, these unlike marriages did nothing please some: for Cornelia was young enough to have been his sons wife. Now the best Citizens thought, that therein he regarded not the care of the Commonwealth, being in such a troublesome time, which had chosen him onely, as her remedy to redress the same : and that he in the mean time gave himself over to marrying and feasting, where rather he should have been carefull of his Consulship, which was disposed upon him against the law for common calamities sake, that of his Community, which was an arrived and the state of t which by bribery and unlawfull means came to office: and having made laws and ordinances for the rity, against administration of justice, otherwise he dealt justly and uprightly in all things, giving safety, order, those that obfilence and gravity, to matters of judgement, with force of Arms, himself being present : faving tained office by that when his father in law was also accused among other, he sent for three hundred and threescore bribery. Judges home to his house, praying them to help him. Whereupon, when the accuser faw Scipio accompanied by the Judges themselves, returning into the Market-place, he let fall his suit. This made Pompey again be condemned, and blamed also more then before, for that he having made a law, that no man should praise the offenders, whilst their matter was a hearing, came himself and openly praised Planess being accused. Thereupon Cato being one of the Judges, stopped his ears with both his hands, faying : that he might not hear an offender praifed, seeing it was forbidden by law. But therefore he was refused for a Judge, before they gave sentence. Notwithstanding, Planeus was condemned by all the reft of the Judges, to Pompey's great fhame and reproach. Shortly after, Hypfus on that had been Conful, being likewife accused, watching Pompey on a time as he came out of his bath to go to supper, upon his knees he belought Pompey's favour and help: but he stally passed by him, and gave him no other answer, but told him, he marred his supper and said nothing else to him. This inconstancy was much reproved in Pompey. Howbeit otherwise he set all things in good order, and chose his father in law Scipio, for his colleague and fellow in the Consulship, for the five last moneths. After that, he caused the government of his Provinces to be appointed him for four Pompeys Proyear more, with commission to take yearly out of the treasure a thousand talents to defray the vinces affigned year more, with committon to take yearly out of the treather a more, with committon the take years charges of his War. Cafars friends feeing that, stepped up for him, and prayed that there might further. also be had some consideration of him, that had likewise great Wars for the Empire of Rome: faying, that his good service deserved, either that they should make him Consul again, or else that they should prolong his charge and government, so as he may yet peaceably enjoy the honour to command that which he had conquered , to the end that no other successour might reap the fruit of his labour. Much stir and contention being about this matter at Rome, Pompey as though for good will he meant to excuse the envy they might have born Casar, said: that he had received letters from him, by the which he requested a successor, and to be discharged of this War: and furthermore, that he thought it good they should grant him priviledge to demand the fecond Confulship, although he were absent. Which Cato stoutly withstood, saying, that he must return home as a private man, leaving his Army, should come in person to crave re-when Pompey thought to levy fouldiers in ROME to bill them, some would not obey him, a few others went willingly to him with heavy hearts, and the most part of them cried, Peace, taining certain offers and reasonable requests, to draw the common peoples affection towards him. For his request was that Pompey and he should both of them resign their governments, and should dismiss their Armies to make all well, referring themselves wholly to the judgement of the

Furthermore, Appins thereupon returned from GAUL, that brought him his two legions Pompry delpife back again which he had lent unto Cefar, reproaching much his doings which he had done there, and giving out many foul words against Cefar. authority, that would feek to make himfelf strong, by other power against him: considering that he might overcome him with his own legious he should bring with him, so soon as they saw bur Pompey in the face, fuch ill will did Cefars own fouldiers bear him, and were marvellous defirous befides to fee himfelt. These flattering tales so pussed up Pompey, and brought him into such a security and truft of himfelf, that he mocked them to fcorn which were afraid of Wars. And to those also which said, that if Cafar came to Rome, they saw not how they could resist his power, he fmilingly answered them again, and bad them take no thought for that : for as oft, faid he, as I do but stamp with my foot upon the ground of ITALY, I shall bring men enough out of every corner, both footmen and horsemen. In the mean time, Celar gathered force still upon him, and thenceforth drew nearer unto IT ALY, and fent of his fouldiers daily to ROME to be prefent at the election of the Magistrates, and many of them that were in Office, he wan with money: amongst whom was Paul, one of the Confuls, whom he wan of his fide, by means of a thousand five hundred talents. And Curio the Tribune of the people, whom he dicharged of an infinite debt he ought: and Mark Antony alfo, who for Cario's lake, was discharged likewise for part of the debt which Curio ought, being also bound as himself. Furthermore, it was found that a Captain or tribunes of the people bribed by Gofar. Well faid he, this shall give it him. So. to be short, all the ground and the people bribed by Gofar. Notwithstanding, the petitions and requests that Curio made in Cafars behalf, seemed somewhat more reasonable for the people: for he requested one of the two, either to make Pompey to put down his Army, or elfe to licence (2) or to have his Army as well as he. For, either being both made private men, they would fall to agreement of themselves: or else being both of like strength, neither of both would feek any alteration, fearing one another, but would content themselves either of them with their own. Or otherwise, he that should weaken the one, and strengthen the other, should double his power whom he feared. Thereto very hotly replied the Conful Marcellus, calling Cafar thief, and faid that he should be proclaimed an open enemy to ROME, if he did not disperse his Army. This notwithftanding in fine, Curio, Antony, and Fifo procured that the Senate should decide the matter. For, faid he, all those that would have Casar leave his Army, and Pompey to keep his, let them stand on the one side. Thereupon the most part of them stood at one hand. Then he bad them again come away from them that would have them both leave their Armies. Then there remained onely but two and twenty that stood for Pompey: and all the rest went on Curio's fide. Then Curio looking aloft for joy of the victory, went into the Market-place, and there was received of his Tribune faction, with thous of joy and clapping of hands, and infinite Nofegaies and Garlands of flowers thrown upon him. Pompey was not then prefent to fee the Senators good will towards him: because by the law, such as have commandment over souldiers, cannot enter into ROME. Notwithstanding Marcellus standing up, faid: that he would not stand trilling, hearing of orations and arguments, when he knew that ten legions were already passed over the Alpes, intending to come in Arms against them; and that he would fend a man unto them, that Straight they changed apparell at Rome, as their manner was in a common calamity. Marcellus then coming through the Market-place unto Pompey, being

Mariny, referring onelyarion legions and the government of Intrana, attending his fecond Confulfhip. Pomper liked nor this motion. Then Cafars friends were contented to grain that he frould have but one of his legions. But Lentulus spake against it, and Carderied out of the other side also. that Pompey was deceived, and they both. So all Treaty of peace was cut off. In the mean time; news came to Rome that Cafar had won ARIMINUM, a fair great City of Fraly, and that he came directly to Rome with a great power. But that was not true; for he came bur with three thouland horfe. and five thousand footmen, and would not tarry for the rest of his Army that was yet on the other fide of the mountains in GAUL, but made hafte rather to surprise his enemies on the fudden, being afraid and in garboil, not looking for him to foon : rather then to give them rime to be provided and to fight with them when they were ready. For when he was come to the River fide of Rubicon Rubicon B. (which was the utmost confine of the Province he had in charge towards IT ALY) he ftayet fuddenly, weighing with himself the great enterprise he took in hand. At the last, as men that being of a marvelous height from the ground, do headlong throw themselves down, closing up their eyes, and withdrawing their minds from the thought of the danger: crying out these words onely into them that drawing their minds from the thought of the danger: crying out their words only mind that that Coffee paffed of were by, in the Greek tongue, 4-19:192208: in English, let Die be caff (meaning hereby to pur ver the River all in hazard, and according to our Proverb, to fet all on fix and feven) he paffed over with his Army. of Rubicon. Now, the news of his coming being carried to ROME, they were in fuch a marvellous fear, as the like Cafars laying to was never feen. For all the senate ran immediately unto Pompey, and all the other Magistrates of Let the Die be the City fled unto him alfo. Tullus asking Pompey what power he had to refult them, he answered cast, him, faultring somewhat in his speech: that he had two legions ready which Cafar fent him back again, and that he thought with the number of them which he had levied in hafte, he should make up the number of thirty thousand fighting men. Then Tullus cryed out openly: Ah, thou hast mocked us Pompey: and thereupon gave order they should fend Ambassadors unto Cafar. There was one Phaonius in the company, who otherwise was no ill man, faving that he was somewhat too Phaonius overbold, thinking to counterfeit Cato's plain manner of speech; he bad Pompey then framp his foot bold words unupon the ground, and make thole fouldiers come which he had promifed them. Pompey gently bare to Pompey. with Phaonius mock. But when Cato told him alfo, what he had prophecied before hand of Cefar, he answered him again : Indeed thou hast propliced more truly then I, but I have dealt more friendly then he. Then Cato thought good that they should make him Lieutenant General of ROME with foll and absolute power to command all, saying: that the self same men which do the greatest mischief, know best also how to remedy the same. So he immediately departed into Sicilie, having the charge and government of that Countrey : and also every one of the other Senators' went unto the charge they were appointed. Thus all ITALY being in Arms, ho man knew what was best to bedone. For they that were out of ROME, came flying thither from all parts: and those on the other Tumultat fide that were within Rome, went out as fast, and forfook the City in his trouble and diforder. Romeupon Ca-That which might ferve being willing to obey, was found very weak; and that that on the other fars coming. fide which by disobedience did hurt, was too strong and ill to be governed by the Magistrates, having law to command. For there was no possibility to pacifie their fear, neither would they suffer Pompe to order things as he would : but every man followed his own fancy, even as he found himself grieved. alraid, or in doubt, and in one day they were in divers minds. Pempey could hear nothing of certainty of his enemies. For some one while would bring him news one way, and then again another way : and then if he would not credit them, they were angry with him. At the length, when he faw the tumult and confusion so great at Rome, as there was no mean to pacifie it: he commanded all the Senators to follow him, telling all them that remained behind, that he would take them for Cafars friends, and so at night departed out of the City. Then the two Confuls fled also, without doing any Pompey forfook facrifice to the gods, as they were wont to do before they went to make any wars. So Pompey, even Rome. in his greatest trouble and most danger, might think himself happy to have every mans good will as he had. For, though divers milliked the cause of this war, yet no man hated the Captain: but there were moe found that could not forfake Pompey for the love they bare him, then were there were inoc tourn in the tourn that the tourn in the tourn pacified their fear : faving that he threatned Metellits, one of the Tribunes of the people to put him Pompey fled, to death, because he would not suffer him to take any of the treasure of the Commonwealth. Unto that cruel threat, he added a more bitter speech also, saying: that it was not so hard a thing for him to doit, as to fpeak it. Thus having pur down Merellus, and taken that he needed to ferve his turn, he took upon him to follow Pompey, thinking to drive him out of ITALY, before that his Army he had in Spain thould come to him. Pompey in the mean time, having taken the City of BRUN- Cefar follow-Dus russ, and gotten forme flips together: he made the two Confuls prefently imbark with thirty eth Pampey. POMPEIV perceiving the walls naked outward, he ftraight miltrufted that Pompey was fleds who hading after him had almost run upon the tharp ftakes, and faln into the trenches, had not the BRUNDUSTANS given him warning of them. So he stayed, and ran not overthwart the City, but setched a compass about to go to the haven : where he found that all the Ships were under fail, but two thips onely excepted, upon the which were left a few fouldiers. Some think that this departure of Pompey, was one of the belt ftratagems of war that ever he used. Notwithstanding, Cefer marvelled much, that he being in a ftrong City, and looking for his Army to come out of SPAIN, and being mafter of the fea belides, Citero reprove that he would ever forlake ITALY. Citero also reproved him, for that he rather followed Themifocles counfell, then Pericles : confidering that the troublesome time was rather to be likened unto Pericles, then Themiffocles time. Yea Cafar himself shewed, that he was afraid of the time, For when he had taken Aumeriss one of Pompey's friends, he fent him unto Pompey at BRUNDUSIUM, when he had taken Aumeriss one of Pompey's friends, he fent him reasonable conditions of peace: But Numeriss followed Pompey, and failed away with him. By this means, Cafar in threefcore days being Lord of all ITALY without any bloodshed: he was very desirous to follow with speed after Pompey. But because he had no ships ready, he let him go, and hafted towards SPAIN, to joyn Pompey's Army there unto his. Now Pompey in the mean space, had gotten a marvellous great power together both by sea and by land. His Army by sea was wonderfull. For he had five hundred good Ships of War, and of Galliots, Foifts, and Pinnaces, an infinite number. By land, he had all the flower of the horfemen of ROME, and of ITALY, to the number of feven thousand horse, all rich men of great houses, and valiant minds. But his footmen, they were men of all forts, and raw fouldiers untrained, whom Pompey continually exercised, lying at the City of Berroea, not fitting idly, but taking pains, as if he had been in the prime of his youth. Which was to great purpose to incourage others seeing Pompey being eight and fifty years old, fight on foot armed at all pieces, and then on horfeback, quickly to draw out his sword while his horse was in his full carier, and easily to put it up again, and to throw his dart from him, not onely with fuch agility to hir point blank, but allo with a strength to cast it away from him, that few young men could do the like. Thither came divers Kings, Princes, and great Lords of Countries, and yielded themselves unto him : and of ROMAN Captains that had born office, he had of them about him, the number of a whole Senate. Amongst them came unto him Labienus also, who before was Cefars friend, and had alwaies been with him in his wars in GAUL. There came unto him alfo, Brutsu the fon of that Brutsu which was flain in GAUL, a valiant man, and which had never fpoken unto Pompey untill that day, because he took him for a murtherer of his father : but then willingly followed him as a defender of the liberty of ROME. Cicero himfelf alfo, though he had both written and given counsel to the contrary, thought it a shame to him not to be amongst the number of them that would hazard their lives for defence of their Countrey. There came unto him also Tidius Sextims even into MACEDON, notwithflanding that he was an old man, and lame of one of his leggs: whom others laughing to fcorn to fee him come, when Pompey faw him, he rofe and went to meet him, judging it a good token of their good wills unto him, when fuch old men as he, chofe rather to be with him in danger, then at home with fafety. Hereupon they fate in Council, and following Caso's opinion, decreed that they should put no Citizen of Rome to death but in battle, and should fack no City that was subject to the Empire of ROME, the which made Pompey's part the better liked. For they that had nothing to do with the wars, either because they dwelt far off, or else for that they were so poor, as otherwife they were not regarded : did yet both in deed and word favour Pompey's part, thinking him an enemy both to the gods and men, that wished not Pompey victory. Cefar also shewed himself very merciful and courteous, where he overcame. For when he had won all Pompey's Army that was in SPAIN, he suffered the Captains that were taken to go at liberty, and onely releaved the Cafar coming fouldiers. Then coming over the Alpes again, he passed through all ITALY, and came to the City out of Spainter- of Brundustum in the Winter quarter: and there passing over the sea, he went unto the City of turned to Brun- ORICUM, and landed there. Now Cefar having Vibia, one of Pompey's familiar friends with him, whom he had taken prisoner: he sent him unto Pompey, to pray again that they might meet, and both of them disperse their Armies within three days, and being reconciled (giving their faith one to another) fo to return into IT ALY like good friends together. Pempey thought again, that these were new devises to intrap him. Thereupon he suddenly went down to the sea, and took all the places of strength by the sea side, safely to lodge his Camp in, and all the ports, creeks, and harbours for ships to lie in rode : so that what wind soever blew on the sky, it served his turn to bring him either men, victuals, or money. Cefar on the other fide was so distressed both by fea and by land, that he was driven to procure battle, and to affail Pompey even in his own Forts, to make him come to fight with him: of whom most times he ever had the better in all skirmithes, faving once, when he was in danger to have loft all his Army. For Pompry had valiantly repulfed his men, and made them fly, and had flain two thousand of them in the field: but he durft nor enter pell mell with them into their Camp, as they fled. Whereupon Cefar faid to his friends, that his enemy had won the victory that day, if he had known how to overcome. This victory put Pompey's men in such courage, that they would needs hazard battle. And Pompey himself also though he wrote letters unto strange Kings, Captains, and Cities of his confederacy, as if he had already won all: was yet afraid to fight another battle, thinking it better by track of time, and diffress of victuals, to overcome him. For Cafars men being old and expert fouldiers, and wont ever to have the victory when they fought together; he knew they would be loth to be brought to fight any other kind of way, to be driven to often removing of their Camp from place to place, and ftill intredes memielves, and therefore that they would rather put it to adventure our of and, and fight it out. But notwithstanding that Pompey had before perswaded his men to be quiet, and not to ftir, perceiving that after this last bickering, Cafur being scanted with victuals railed his Camp, and departed thence to go into Thessaly, through the Countrey of the Athe-NIANS: then he could no more bridle their glory and courage, which cryed, Cofar is fled, let us follow him. And others, let us return home again into ITALY. And others also sent their friends and fervants'before to Rome, to hire them houses near the Market-place : intending when they came this ther to fue for Offices in the Commonwealth. Some there were also that in a jollity would needs take ship, and fail into the sele of Les Bos, unto Cornelia (whom Pompey had sent thither) to carry her that good news, that the war was ended. Thereupon affembling the Council, Africanus thought it best to win ITALY, for that was the chiefest mark to be shot at in this war : for whosoever obtained that, had straight all Sicile, SARDINIA, CORSICA, SPAIN, and GAUL at commandment. Furthermore, that it was a dishonour to Pompey (which in reason should touch him above all things) to fuffer their Countrey to be in fuch cruel bondage and subjection unto slaves and flatterers of Tyrants, offering it felf as it were into their hands. But Pompey neither thought it honourable for him, once again to fly from Casar, and to make him follow him, sith fortune had given him opportunity to have Cafar in chale: nor lawfull also before the gods, to for fake his father in law Scipio, and many other also that had been Consuls, dispersed abroad in GREECE and THES-SALY, which should immediately fall into Cafars hands, with all their riches and Armies they had. Furthermore, he faid, that they had care enough for the City of ROME, which drew the Wars fartheft off from them: fo as, they remaining fate and quiet at home (neither hearing nor feeling the mifery of Wars) might in the end peaceably receive and welcome him home, that remained conquerour. With this determination, he marched forward to follow Cafar, being determined not to our. With this determination, he marcined forward to follow Cefar, being determined not to Pompey followgive him battle, but to befiege him, and onely to compass him in still being near unto him, and so eth Cesar into to cut him off from victuals. There was also another reason that made him to follow that determing the state of the state nation. For it was reported to him, that there was a speech given out among the ROMAN Knights, that fo foon as ever they had overcome Cafar, they must allo bring Pompey to be a private man again. Some say therefore, that Pompey would never afterwards employ Cato in any great matters of weight in all this War: for when he followed Cafar, he left him to keep his carriage by the fea fide, fearing that fo foon as Cafar was once overcome, he would make him straight also resign his authority. Pompey following Celar in this manner fair and foftly, they cryed out upon him, that he made no War with Cefar, but against his Countrey and the Senate, because he might be still in authority: and that he would never leave to have them for his fervants and guard about him, which should rule and command the world. Furthermore, Domitius Anobarbus, calling him continually Pompty mock-Inould rule and command the world. Furthermore, Dominia Common, Laming min community ed of his own Agamemon, and King of Kings: made him much to be envied. Phaonisus also mocked him as much fouldiers. as the other, that spake most boldest: for he went crying up and down, My masters, I give you warning, you are like to eat no Thus CULAN figs this year. And Lucius Afranius alfo, he that had lost the Army which he had in SPAIN , and was also suspected for a traitor, seeing Pompey then refused to come to battle: I marvel, faid he, that they which accuse me, do not luftily go to find him out, whom they call the Marchant and common buyer of Provinces, to fight with him presently? With these and many such other lewd speeches, they compelled Pompey in the end (who could not abide to be ill spoken of, and would not deny his friends any thing) to follow their vain hope and defires, and to forfake his own wife determination: the which thing, no good fhip-mafter, and much less a chief and foveraign Captain over so many Nations and so great Armies, should have fuffered and confented unto. Now, he that did alwaies commend the Phyfitians, that would not follow the fond defire of the fick patients: was himself contented to obey the worst part of his Army, fearing their displeasure, where their life or health stood in hazard. For who would think, or judge them to be wife men, and in their wits, who walking up and down their Camp, did already fue to be Consuls and Prætors? considering that Spinther, Domitius, and Scipio, were at strife together, making friends to be high Bishop (which Office Cofar had) as if they should have fought with Tigranes King of ARMENIA, or with the King of the NABATHEIANS, which had camped by them, and not with Cafar and his Army; who had taken a thousand Towns Cafars conby affault, had subdued above three hundred several Nations, and had won infinite battles quells. of the GERMANS and GAULS, and was never overcome, he had also taken a Million of men priloners, and had likewife flain fo many at divers battles. All this notwithflanding, they of Pompey's fide still being importunate of him, and troubling him in this fort : in fine, when they were come into the fields of PHARSALIA, they compelled Pompey to call a Council. There Labienus, General of the horsemen standing up, sware before them all, that he would Labienus Genot return from the battle, before he had made his enemies to fly. The like oath all the rest did neral of Pomtake. The next night following, Pompey thought in his dream, that he came into the Theatre, peys hortemen. and that the people to honour him, made a marvellous great clapping of their hands: and that he Pompeys dream himself did fet forth the Temple of Venus the Conquerour with many spoils. This vision part-tle of Pharfalla ly put him in good courage, and partly again made him doubt: for that he was afraid, because Cafars family was descended from this goddes Venus, that his dream did signifie, that he should have the honour of the victory, with the spoils he should win of him. Besides all this, Wonderfull there were sudden and fearfull noises heard in his Camp, without any apparent cause, that noises heard in waked all the Camp upon it. At the fourth watch, when the watch is renewed in the morning, Pompeys camp.

POMPEIU there was feen a marvellous great light over Cefars Camp, and they we like a burning torch, and fell into Pompey's Camp. The which Cefar himselt said he saw, when he went to visit the watch. At the break of the day, Cefar being determined to raise his Camp, and to go to the City of Scotusa, as his fouldiers were buffe about overthrowing of their Tents, and fending away their bag and baggage before: there came Scouts unto him, that brought him word they saw a great deal of Armour and weapon carried too and fro in their enemies Camp, and heard a noise and builting besides, as of men that were preparing to fight. After these came in other Scouts, that brought word also that their Vaward was already set in battle ray. Then Cefar faid, that the day was now come they had longed for fo fore, and that they fhould now fight with men, not with hunger, nor with want of victuals: and thereupon gave order prefently that they should put out the red Coat of 'Arms upon his Tent, which was the fign the Re-MANS used to shew that they would fight. The fouldiers seeing that out, lest their carriage and Tents, and with great shouts of joy ran to Arm themselves. The Captains of every band also befrowed every man in such place as he should fight, and so they conveyed themselves into battle ray, without any tumult or diforder, as quietly, as if they should have entered into a dance. Pompey himself led the right Wing of his Army against Aniony. The middle of the battle he gave unto Scipio his Father in law being right against Domitius Calvinus. The lest Wing also was led by Lucius Pampey's Army Domitius Anobarbus, the which was guarded with men of Arms, all the horsemenwere placed on Cer in battle ray in Pharfalia. that fide, to diffrels Cefar if they could, that was directly against them : and to overthrow the tenth Legion that was so much accounted of, being the valiantest souldiers the enemy had in all his Pmpey's ordinance of his Color millisein would fly before they were charged. Thereupon he straightly commanded them in the Vaward, that Battle betwitt and twenty thouland fighting men : and in Pompey's Army, fomewhat above twice as many. Now,

Army, among the which Casar did ever use to fight in person. Casar then seeing the left Wing of his enemies fo ftrong with the guard of the hortemen, and being afraid of the brightness of their Armour: brought forward fix Enligns for fupply, which he placed hard behind the tenth Legion, commanding them that no man should stir, least their enemies should discover them. And furthermore, when the horsemenof the enemies should come to give charge upon them, that then they should run with speed on the one side of the foremost Ranks, and not to throw their darts far from them, as the valiancest fouldiers are wont to do, to come to the sword the sooner: but to throw them upwards in their enemies eyes and faces. For, faid he, these brave sellows and fine dancers, will never abide to have their faces marred. And this was Cafars device at that time. Pompey being on herseback, rode up and down to consider the ordinance of both battles: and perceiving that his enemies flood fill in their Ranks, looking for the fignal of battle, and that his own battle on the other fide waved up and down diforderly, as men unskilfull in Wars: he was afraid they they should steadily keep their Ranks, and standing close together should so defend themselves, receiving the charge of the enemy. But Cefar disliked of that device, for thereby, said he, the force of their blows was leffened, and in with-holding them from giving the charge, he not onely took away that courage which the affailant carrieth with him coming with fury : but made them moreover faint-hearted, in receiving the charge of the enemies. In Cafars Army, there were about two Gafarand Pommental would be all arm:

oring Photolitis when the word of battle was given of either fide, and that the Trumpers did found the all arm: every man began to look to himfelf. But a few of the chiefest of the ROMANS, and certain GRECIANS that were there also out of the set battle, perceiving the imminent danger, began to bethink them: to what pass the ambition and wilfull contention between these two men, had brought the State of ROME. For the weapons of kinfmen, the bands of brethren, the Enfigns all alike, the flower of fo many valiant men of one City, did ferve for a notable example, to shew how mans nature prickt forward with coverousnels, is quite blind and without reason. For if they could have been contented quietly to have governed that which they had conquered : the greatest and best part of the world, both by sea and by land was subject unto them. Or otherwise, if they could not have quenched their unfatiable defire of victory and triumph, they had occasion of war enough offered them against the PARTHIANS and GERMANS. Furthermore they had enough to do befides to conquer SCYTHIA, and the INDIANS: and withall, they had had an honeft colour to have cloaked their ambitious defires, if it had been but to have brought the barbarous people to a civil life. For what horsemen of SCYTHIA, or Arrows of PARTHIA, or riches of INDI-ANS, could have abidden the power of threefcore and ten thouland ROMAN fouldiers, and specially being led by two famous Captains, as Pompey, and Cafar? whose names, these strange and far Nations understood long before the name of the ROMANS: so great were their victories, having conquered fo many wild and barbarous people. They both being then in Arms the one against the other, not regarding their honour which made them fo ambitious: did not spare their own Countrey, who had untill that time remained unvincible, both in fame and prowels. For, the alliance that was made betwen them, the love of Julia, and marrying with her, was suspected from the beginning to be but a deceit, and a pledge as it were of a conspiracy made between them, for a private benefit, more then for any true friendship. Now when the fields of Pharsalla were covered over with men, with horse and armour, and that the fignal of battle was given on either fide : the first man of Cefar: Army that advanced forward to give charge, was Caim Craffinim, Cap-Cairs Craffinis tain of fixfcore and five men, to perform a great promife which he had made unto Cafar. For Cafar, when he came out of his Tent in the morning, feeing him, called him to him by his name, and asked him what he thought of the fucces of this battle? Craffinins holding out his right hand unto him, tried . The elar, thine is the victory, and this day thou shalt commend me either alive or dead. Then remembring these words, he brake out of the ranks, and many following after him. ran amongst the middest of his enemies. Straight they came to the sword, and made great slaughter. But he preffing forward still, one with a thrust ran him through the mouth, that the swords point came through at his neck. Thereupon Graffinius being flain, the battle was equal : Pompey did Graffinius flain not make his left Wing march over fuddenly, but stayed, and cast his eyes abroad to fee what his horsemen would do, the which had already divided their companies, meaning to compass in Casar, and to make the small number of horsemen which he had before him, to give back upon the squadron of his footmen. On the other fide, as foon as Cafar had given the fignal of battle, his horsemen retired back a little, and the fix Enfigns which he had placed fecretly behind them (being three thoufand fighting men) ran fuddenly to affail the Enemy upon the flanck, and when they came near unto the horsemen, they threw the points of their darts upwards according to Casars commandment, and hit the young gentlemen full in their faces. They being utterly unskilfull to fight, and least of all looking for such manner of fight : had not the hearts to defend themselves, nor to abide to be hurt Pompeys horse as they were in their faces, but turning their heads, and clapping their hands on their faces, fhamefully men put to fled. They being overthrown, Cafars men made no account to follow them, but went and gave charge upon the battle of footmen, in that place specially where they had no guard of horsemen, whereby they might easilier be compassed about. Thus, they being charged by them in the flank, and in the Vaward also by the tenth Legion, perceiving themselves (contrary to their expectation) compassed about by their enemies, where they thought to have environed them: they could make no longer refiftance. They also being likewise driven to fly, when Pompey saw the dust in the element, and conjectured the flying of his horsemen: what mind he was of then, it was hard to say. For by his countenance, a man might well think he was like a man amazed, and at his wits end, forgetting that he was Pompey Bying the great: for that he went straight into his Camp, and spake never a word to any man, rightly verify- in the fields of ing Homers verles to this effect :

POMPEIUS.

But mighty Jove who sits aloft in Ivory Chariot high, Strake Ajax with fo great a fear, that Ajax by and by Let fall his Leathern Target, made of tough Ox hide seven fold, And ran away, not looking back, for all he was fo bold.

In this estate Pompey entred into his Tent, and fate down there a great while, and spake never a word: untill fuch time as many of the enemies entred pell mell with his men that fled into his Camp. And then, he faid no more, but, What, even into our Camp? and fo rifing up, he put a Gown on his back even fit for his misfortune, and secretly stole out of the Camp. The other Legions also fled : and great slaughter was made of the Tent-keepers, and their fervants that guarded the Camp. For Asinius Pollio wri- Afinius Pollio teth (who was at that battle on Cafars fide) that there were flain onely but fix thousand fouldiers, reporteth this Howbeit at the taking of their Camp, Cafars fouldiers then found plainly the madness and vanity of Pompey's men. For, all their Tents and pavilions were full of Nofegays and Garlands of Mirtle, and their Couches all covered with Flowers, their tables full of bowls of wine, and men prepared ready to do facrifice for joy, rather then to arm themselves to fight. Thus went they to battle, carried away with this vain and toolish hope. When Pompey was gone a little way from his Camp, he forsook his horse, having a very few with him: and perceiving that no man purfued him, he went on foot fair and foftly, his head full of fuch thoughts and imaginations, as might be supposed a man of his like calling might have, who for four and thirty years space together, was wont continually to carry victory away, and began then even in his last cast, to prove what it was to fly, and to be overcome: and who thought then with himself, how in one hours space he had lost the honour and riches which he had got in so many foughten fields and battles, whereby he was not long before followed and obeyed of fo many thousand men of war, of so many horsemen, and of such a great Fleet of Ships on the sea, and then to go as he did in such poor estate, and with so small a train, that his very enemies who sought him, knew him not. Thus when he was passed the City of LARISSA, and coming to the valley of Tempe: there being a thirst, he fell down on his belly and drank of the River. Then rifing up again, he went his way thence and came to the fea fide, and took a fishers cottage where he lay all night. The next morning by break flate of Pompey of the day, he went into a little boat upon the River, and took the free men with him that were about him: and as for the flaves, he fent them back again, and did counfel them boldly to go to Cafar, and not to be afraid. Thus rowing up and down the shore side, in this little boat, he spied a great ship of burden in the main sea, riding at Anchor, which was ready to weigh Anchor, and to fail away. The master of the ship was a ROMAN, who, though he was not familiarly acquainted with Pompey, yet knew him by fight very well. He was called Peticius, who had dreamed the night be- Peticius dreame fore, that he faw Pompey speak unto him, not like the man he was wont to be, but in poverty and of Pompey. in mifery. So, he had told this dream unto the Mariners which failed with him (as men commonly use to do, specially when they dream of such weighty matters, and being at leisure withall) and at the very inftant, there was one of the Mariners that told him, he faw a little boat on the River rowing towards them, and that there were men in it that shook their cloaks at them, and held our their hands. Thereupon Peticine standing up, knew Pompey straight, even in like case as he had dreamed of him the night before : and clapping his head for anger, commanded his Mariners to let down his boat, and gave his hand, calling him Pompey by his name, mistrusting (feeing him in that estate) what missortune had happened to him. Thereupon, not looking to be intreated, nor that he should tell him of his mishap, he received him into the sin would have with him, and then hoifed fail. With Pompey there were both the Lentuli and Faoring. Shortly after also, they perceived King Desorars coming from the River to them, that beckened and made figns to receive him: which they did. At supper time, the master of the ship, made ready such meat as he had aboard. Faonisus feeing Pompey for lack of men to wait on him, washing of himself: ran unto him, washed him, and anounted him, and afterwards continued still to wait upon him, and to do fuch fervice about him, as fervants do to their mafters, even to washing of his feet, and making ready of his supper. When a simple man faw him, that could no skill of service, he faid:

Good gods! how every thing becometh noble men? Pompey passing then by the City of AMPHIPOLIS, coasted from thence into the Isle of LESBOS, to go fetch his wife Cornelia and his fon being then in the City of MITYLENE. There having cast out his Anchor, and riding at rode, he put a meffenger on the shoar, and fent him unto the City to his wife: not according to her expectation, who was fill in good hope by continual letters and news brought unto her, that the war was ended and determined by the City of DYRRACHIUM. This mellenger now finding her in this hope, had not the heart fo much as to falute her, but letting her understand rather by his tears then words, the great misfortune Pompey had: told her, the must dispatch quickly, if she would fee Pompey with one ship onely, and none of his own but borrowed. The young Lady hearing thefe news, fell down in a found before him, and neither spake nor stirred of long time: but after she Cornetts for Pompey's over- was come to her felf, remembring that it was no time to weep and lament, the went with speed through the City unto the sea side. There Pompey meeting her, took her in his arms, and embraced her. But The meeting of the finking under him, fell down and faid: Out alas, wo worth my hard fortune, not thine (good huf-Pomey and his band) that I fee thee now brought to one poor ship, who before thou marriedst thy unfortunate Cornelia, wert wont to fail thele leas with five hundred ships. "Alas, why art thou come to see me, and "why didft thou not leave me to curfed fate and my wicked deftiny: fith my felf is cause of all this thy "evil? Alas, how happy a woman had I been, if I had been dead before I heard of the death of my first "husband Publiss Craffus, whom the wretched PARTHIANS slew? And how wife a woman had I "been, if (according to my determination) I had killed my felf immediately after him: where now I "live to bring yet this misfortune unto Pompey the Great? It is reported that Cornelia spake these words, and that Pompey also answered her in this manner. " Peradventure Cornelia mine, thou hast "known a better fortune, which hath also deceived thee, because she hath continued longer with me "then her manner is. But fince we are born men, we must patiently bear these troubles, and prove sor-"tune again. For it is no impossible matter for us again to come into prosperity out of this present mi-"fery, as to fall out of late prosperity into present calamity. When Cornelia heard him say so, she fent back into the City for her stuff and iamily. The MITYLENIANS also came openly to falute Pompey, and prayed him to come into the City, and refresh himself: but Pampey would not, and gave them counfel to obey the Conquerour, and not to fear any thing, for Cafar was a just man, and of a courteous nature. Then Pompey turning to Cratippus the Philosopher, who came among the Citizens also to see him: made his complaint unto him, and reasoning a little with him about divine providence. Cratippus courteoully yielded unto him, putting him still in better hope, fearing less he would have eth with Cristippus the Phis grown too hot and troublefome, if he should have holden him hard to it. For Pompey at the length lolopher, about might have asked him, what providence of the gods there had been in his doings? And Crasippus might have answered him, that for the ill government of the Commonwealth at Rome, it was of necessity that it should fall into the hands of a foveraign Prince. Peradventure Gratippus might then have asked him: how and whereby Pompey wouldft thou make us believe, if thou hadft overcome Casar, that thou wouldft have used thy good fortune better then he? But for divine matters refer them to the gods as it pleafeth them. Pompey taking his wife and friends with him, hoifed fail, and landed no where, but compelled to take fresh acates and water. The first City he came unto was ATTALIA in the Country eth at Attalia, of Pamphy Lia. Thither came to him certain Galleys out of CILICIA, and many fouldiers also, in the County informuch he had threefcore Senators of ROME again in his company. Then understanding that his Army by fea was yet whole, and that Caro had gathered together a great number of his fouldiers after the overthrow, whom he had transported with him into AFRICK: he lamented, and complained unto his friends, that they had compelled him to fight by land, and not fuffered him to help himself with his other force wherein he was the stronger; and that he kept not still near unto his Army by sea, that if fortune failed him by land, he might yet presently have repaired to his power ready by sea, to have resisted his enemy. To consess arruth, Pompey committed not so great a fault in all his War, rompey's great neither did Cafar put forth a better device, then to make his enemy fight far from his Army by fea. error, and the Thus Pompey being driven to attempt somewhat according to his small ability, he sent Ambassadors unto the Cities. To others, he went himself in person also to require money, wherewith he manned and armed some ships. This notwithstanding, fearing the sudden approach of his enemy, lest he should prevent him before he could put any reasonable force in readiness for to resist him; he bethought himfelf what place he might best retire unto for his most safety. When he had considered of ie, he thought that there was never a Province of the ROMANS that could fave and defend them. And for other strange Realms, he thought PARTHIA above all other, was the best place to receive them into at that prefent (having fo small a power as they had) and that it was best able to help and aid them. Other of his counfell were of mind to go, into Africk, unto King Juba. But failing from thence, and King Prolomy (being but lately come to mans state, and bound unto Pompey Leiblan cerfor the late friendship and favour his Father found of him) and to go put himself into the hands of the swaded Pomper PARTHIANS, the vileft and unfaithfulleft Nation in the world, and not to prove modefty of a Ro- tofly into E-MAN, that had been his father in law, whose prosperity if he could have endured, he would have been gypt. the chiefest man: and now to put himself to Arfaces good will, who could not away with Crassine when he lived. Further, he thought it an ill part also, for him to go carry his young wife of the noble house of Scipio, amongst the barbarous people, who think it lawfull for them to use what villany and infolency they lift to any. For, admit the have nor the villany offered her by them: yet it is an undecent thing, to think the might have been dishonoured they having her in their power to do it. There was no perswasion (as they say) but this onely that turned Pompey unto Euphrates : for it seemeth that Pompey's counsel, and not his fortune made him take that way. Being determined therefore to fly into EGYPT, he departed out of CYPRUS in a Galley of SELEUCIA with his wife Cornelia. The residue of his train imbarked also, some into Galleys, and others into Merchants ships of great burden, and so fasely passed the sea without danger. When Pompey heard news that King Ptolomy was in Pompey arriva the City of PELUSIUM with his Army, making war against his lifter : he went thither, and sent a mel- eth in Egyps fenger before unto the King, to advertise him of his arrival, and to entreat him to receive him. King Petulium, Prolomy was then but a young man, infomuch as one Pothinus governed all the whole Realm under him. Pothinus an He affembled a Council of the chiefest and wifest men of his Court, who had such credit and authority Eunuch, and as it pleafed him to give them. They being affembled, he commanded every man in the Kings name groom of the to fay his mind touching the receiving of Pompty, whether the King should receive him or not. It was King Pollomy. a miserable thing to see Pothinus an Eunuch of the Kings, and Theodotus of CHIO, and hired school-ruleth all Emafter to teach the young King Rhetorick, and Achillas ÆGYPTIAN to consult among themselves grpt. what they should do with Pompey the Great. These were the chiefest counsellors of all his Eunuches, and of those that had brought him up. Now did Pompey, ride at Anchor upon the shore side, expecting the resolution of his Council: in the which the opinions of other were divers, for some would not on of the Ehave received him: other would that he should be received. But the Rhetorician Theodorus to shew gyptians, for his eloquence, perswaded them, that neither the one nor the other was to be accepted. For, said he, thereceiving of if we receive him, we shall have Cafar our enemy, and Pompey our Lord : and if we do deny him on Pompey. the other fide, Pompey will blame us for refuling of him, and Cefar for not keeping of him. Therefore this should be the resolution, to send to kill him: for thereby we should win the good will of the one, and not fear the displeasure of the other: and some say moreover, that he added this mock with- swaded them all: A dead man bites not. They being determined of this among themselves, gave Achillas commission to kill Pomber.

fion to do it. He taking with him Septimins (who had charge aforetime under Pompey) and Salvins A dead man another Centurion also, with three or four souldiers besides, they made towards Pompey's Galley, bireth not. about whom were at that time the chiefest of his train, to see what would become of this matter. in a fisher boat : they began then to mistrust the small account that was made of them, and counselled Pompey to return back, and to launch again into the sea, being out of the danger of the hurling of a dart. In the mean time, the fisher boat drew near, and Septimins rose and saluted Pompey in the Rogreat deal of mud and fand banks, so that his Galley should have no water to bring him in. At the very fame time, they faw afar off divers of the Kings Galleys, which were arming with all speed possible, and all the shoar besides full of souldiers. Thus, though Pompey and his company would have altered their mind, they could not have told how to have escaped: and surthermore, shewing that they had mistrusted them, then they had given the murtherer occasion to have executed his cruelty. So taking his leave of his wife Cornelia, who lamented his death before his end : he commanded two Centurions to go down before him in the ÆGYPTIANS boat, and Philip one of his flaves infranchifed, with another flave called Scynes. When Achillas reached out his hand to receive him into his boat, he turned him

These were the last words he spake unto his people, when he lest his own Galley and went into the Æ-GYPTIANS boat. The land being a great way off from his Galley, when he faw never a man in the boat speak friendly unto him, beholding Septimius, he faid unto him: Methinks my friend I should know thee, for that thou hast served with me heretofore. The other nodded with his head that it was true, but gave him no answer, nor shewed him any courtesse. Pompey seeing that no man spake to him, took a little book he had in his hand, in the which he had written an oration that he meant to make unto King Ptolomy, and began to read it. When they came near the shoar, Cornelia with her servants Pomper the and friends about her, flood up in her ship in great fear, to see what should become of Pompey. So Great cruelly the hoped well, when the faw many of the Kings people on the shoar, coming towards Pompey at his stain as he landing, as it were to receive and honour him. But even as Pompey took Philip his hand more eafily, landed. Septimism came first behind him and thrust him through with his fword. Next unto him alfo, Salvins The manliness Septimism came first behind him and thrult him through with his tword. Next thin him and, Salving and patience and Achillae drew out their swords in like manner, Pompey then did no more but took up his Gown of Pompey at with his hands and hid his face, and manly abid the wounds they gave him, onely fighing a little. being nine and fifty wears old, he ended his life the next day after the day of his birth. They wine rode oring nine and mercy years out, in conce in the unablated, gave both a fearful cry, that it was heard to the floor: then weighing up their Anchors with fpeed, they holled fail, and departed their way, has the most: then weighing up their remained was they had gotten to the main fee. The ÆGYPTI-A NS which prepared to row after them, when they faw they were pass their reach, and unpossible to be overtaken, they let them go. Then thiving stricken off Pompey's head, they threw his body overboard, for a milerable spectacle to all those that were definous to see him. Philip his infranchised bondman remained ever by it, untill such time as the ÆGYBTBANS had seen it their bellies full. Then having washed his body with falt water, and wrapped it up in an old shirt of his, because he had no other shirt to lay it in : he sought upon the tands, and found at length 2 piece of an old fifter boat, enough to ferve to burn his naked body with, but not all fully out. As he was bufie gathering the broken pieces of this boat together, thither came unto him an old ROMAN, who in his youth had ferved under Pompey, and faid unto him: O friend, what art thou that prepareft the funerals of Pompsy the Great? Philipsy and faid unto him: O friend, what art thou that prepareft the funerals of Pompsy the Great? Philipsy and faid unto him to that he was a bondman of his infranchifed. Well, faid he, thou that not have all this honour alone, I pray thee let me accompany thee in fo devout a deed, that I may not altogether repent me The funerals of to have dwelt fo long in a ftrange Countrey, where I have abidden fuch mifery and trouble: but that to recompence me withall, I may have this good hap, with mine hands to touch Pompey's body, and to help to bury the onely and most famous Captain of the Romans. The next day after, Lucius Lemin-Is not knowing what had passed, coming out of Cyprus, failed by the shoar side, and perceived afire made for funerals, and Philip standing by it, whom he knew not at the first. So he asked him, what is he that is dead and buried there? But straight setching a great sigh, alas, faid he, perhaps it is Pomis the tital in the same title and was fraight taken and slain. This was the end of Pompey pey the Great. Then he landed a little, and was fraight taken and slain. This was the end of Pompey the Great. Not long after, Cafar also came into EGY PT that was in great wars, where Pompey's Cofar arriveth head was presented unto him : but he turned his head aside and would not see it, and abhorred him that Lucius Lentubrought it as a detectable murtherer. Then taking his ring wherewith he fealed his letters, whereupon was graven a Lion holding a fword : he burft out a weeping. Achillas and Positions he put to death. THE COMPARISON OF POMPEY with AGESILAUS.

Furthermore, Pompey did honour Sylla while he lived, and when he was dead, gave his body honourable burial in despite of Legidus: and married his daughter unto Faustus the son of Sylla. Agesilans contrarily did difhonour Lysander upon light occasion: but Pompey had done no less for Sylla, then Sylla had done for him. Lysander on the other side, had made Agesilaus King of LACEDEMON, and Lieutenant Generall of all GREECE. Thirdly, the injuries that Pompey did unto the Commonweal, The faults of were done of necessity to please Casar and Scipio, both of them his fathers in law. Agestiaus allo, to Agestiaus and saissine his sons love, laved Sphodriae life that had deserved death, for the mischief he had done the Pomper. ATHENIANS: and he willingly also took part with Phabidas, not secretly, but openly, because he had broken the peace made with the THEBANS. To conclude, what hurt Pompey did unto the ROMANS, either through ignorance, or to pleasure his friends: the same did Agesilaus unto the LACEDAMONIANS, through anger and felf-will, in renewing War with the BOEOTIANS, upon a full peace concluded. If we shall reckon of the fortune of the one and the other, in the faults they committed: Pompey's fortune unto the ROMANS was unlooked for. But Agefilane would not fuffer the LACEDEMONIANS to avoid the lame Kingdom, though they knew it before. For though Leorychides had been proved a bastard ten thousand times, yet had not the race of the Eurityontides failed, but they could have found another lawfull King among them, that should have gone upright: had not Lysander, favouring Agestlans kept the true meaning of the Oracle from the LACEDEMONIANS. On the other fide again for matters of government, there was never fuch an excellent device found out, as was done by Agefilaus, to help the fear and danger the LACEDA-MONIANS were in, for those that fled at the battle of LEUCTRES, when he counselled them to let the law sleep for that day. Neither can any man match Pompey's with the like: who, to shew his friends what power he was of, did break the laws which himself had made. For Agesslaus being driven of necessity to abolish the law, to save the life of his Citizens, found such a device that the law was not hurtfull to the Commonwealth, neither yet was put down for fear it should do hurt. I must needs commend this for a great vertue and civility in Agesilans, who so soon as he received the Scytala (or scrowl of parchment from the Ephori) returned into his Countrey, and left the war of Asia. He did not as Pompey, who made himself great to the benefit of the Commonwealth, and for the Commonwealths fake, did forfake such honour and so great authority, as never Captain before him, but Alexander the Great, had the like in those parts. But now to other matter. Touching their battles Thingsdone by and exploits in wars, the multitude of victories and triumphs that Pompey obtained, and the great Agefilaus and Armies that he led : Xenophon himself if he were alive, could not compare Agesilans victories unto Pompes in wars his; although for the fingular vertues and qualities he had in him, for recompence thereof he had liberty granted him," to write and speak of Agesilaus what he thought good. Methinks also, there was great difference betwirt Pompey and Agestlans, in their equity and clemency towards their enemies. For, whilft Agefilans went about to conquer THEBES, and utterly to race and destroy the City of MESSINA, the one being an ancient City of his Countrey, and the other the capital City of BoEO-

the feigniory

TIA: he had almost lost his own City of SPARTA, for at the least his he had over the reft of GREECE. The other contrarily gave Cities unto pyrauses dwell willing to change their trade and manner of life : and when it was in his choice to lead Tigrames King willing to change their trans and mainter agreement to make him a confederate of the ROMANS, of ARMENIA, in triumph at ROME, he choic rather to make him a confederate of the ROMANS, faying, that he preferred perpetual honour before one days glory. But fince it is reason we should give the first place and honour of the discipline of wars, unto a Captain of the greatest skill and experience in wars: the LACEDAMONIAN then leaveth the ROMANS far behind. For first of all Agessiam never forfook his City, though it was befreged with threefcore and ten thousand men, and that there were very few within the same to defend it, the which also a little before had been overthrown at the battle of LEUCTRES. And Pompey on the other fide, hearing that Cafar with five thousand footmen onely had taken a Town in ITALY, Hed from ROME in very great fear. And therein he cannot be excused of one of these two: either that he fled cowardly for so few men, or else that he had a false immagination of more. For he conveyed his wife and children away, but he left all the reft without defence and fled:

of a skilfull Captain.

where indeed he flould either have overcome, valiantly fighting for defence of his Countrey, or elle have received the conditions of peace which the conquerors flould have offered him. For he was a Citizen and allied unto him. And he that thought it an untollerable thing, to prolong the term of his government, or to grant him a fecond Conful-ship: did now give him opportunity, suffering him to take the City of ROM 5, to fay unto Metellus the Tribune and the reft, that they were all his prisoners. Aspecial point Sith therefore it is the chiefest point of an excellent Captain, to compell his enemies to fight when he findeth himself the stronger, and also to keep himself from compulsion of fight when he is the weaker: Agefilam excelling in that, did ever keep himfelf invincible. Cafar also had great skill therein, to keep himself from danger being the weaker, and again could tell how to compell Pompey to hazard battle, to his utter destruction by land, where he was the weaker: and by this means he made himself Lord of the treasure, victuals, and also of the sea, which his enemies had in their hands without fighting. That which they alledge in his excule, is that which most doth condemn him, specially for so great and skilfull a Captain. For asit is likely enough, that a young General of an Army may easily be brought from his wife and lafe counfel, with rumour and rumult of a few fearfull men, that should perswade him it were a shame and dishonour for him if he did otherwise: yet were this no strange matter, but a fault to be pardoned. But for Pompey the Great, whose Camp the Romans called their Countrey, and his Tent the Senate, and called all the Prætors and Confuls that governed at Rome, rebels and traitors to the Commonwealth of Rome: who could excuse him (who was never seen commanded by other then himself, but had been alwaies chief Captain and General in any war he made, and ever had the upper hand) but that he was drawn on by the fooffs of Faonius and Domitims, to hazard battle, to endanger the whole Empire and liberty of ROME, onely for fear they should call him King Agamemnon? Who, the whole complete and making the first the found have fought from the beginning for the defence of the City of ROME, and not to have taken example of Themistocles policy by flying, and afterwards to think it a shame as he did, to lie in Thessaly a time without fighting. Neither did God appoint them the fields of Pharfalia for a Theatre, or close Camp of necessity to fight which of them should have the Empire of ROME. Further, there was no Herauld to fummon him to fight, as there are at games of price, where he must answer to his name, and come and fight, or else to lose the honour of the Crown unto another. But there were infinite other fields and Towns (and as a man would fay the whole earth) which the commodity of his Army by fea gave him shoice to conquer, if he would rather have followed the steps of Fabius Maximus, of Marius, of Lucullus, or of Arefilaus himself: who did patiently abide no less tumults within the City self of Sparta, when the Thebans went to summon him to come out to fight for all the rest of his Country. And in £GYPT also, he did abide many fall to cultations against him, wherewith the King himself did burthen him, praying him alwaics to have a little patience. In fine, having followed the best counsel which he had determined with himself from the beginning, he faved the EGYPTIANS against their wills: and furthermore, he did not onely keep the City of Spart a from fo great a danger, but did also fer up tokens of triumph in the same against the THEBANS, whereby he was not compelled at that time to lead them out to the slaughter, and befides that, gave his Citizens occasion to obtain victory afterwards. Hereupon Agesilans was highly praised of them, whose lives he had saved against their wills. And Pompey contrarily was blamed by themfelves through whom he had offended : yet some say, that he was deceived by his father in law Scipio.

For he meaning to keep the most part of the money to himself which he had brought out of Asia, did haften and periwade Pompey to give battle, telling him there was no money left. The which though it had been, a worthy Captain should not so lightly have been brought into error, upon a salse account to hazard himself to lose all. Thus may we see what both of them were, by comparing them together.

Furthermore, for their journeys into ÆGYPT, the one fled thither by force: the other willingly went thither with small honour, for moneys sake to serve the barbarous people, with intent afterwards to make war with the GRECIANS. Laftly, in that which we accuse the ÆGYPTIANS for Pompey's berrayed by them whom he trufted: and Azefilaus for fook them which trufted him, and went to his enemies, having brought aid to fight against them. THE THELIFEOF ALEXANDER The Great.

Ann. Mund.

Ant. Chrift. 334.

Aving determined in this volume to write the Life of King Alexander, and of Julius Cafar, that overcame Pompey, and being to speak of many things, I will use none other Preface, but onely desire the Readers not to blame me though I do not declare all things at large, but briefly touch divers; chiefly in those, their noblest acts and most worthy of memory. For they must remember, that my intent is not to write Histories, but onely Lives. For the noblest deeds do not always shew mens vertues and vices, but oftentimes a light occasion, a word, or some sport, makes mens naturall dispositions and manners appear more plain, then the famous Battels won, wherein are slain ten thousand men, or the great Armies, or Cities won by siege or af-fault. For like as Painters or drawers of Pictures, which make no account of other parts of the body, The face flowdo take the refemblances of the face and favour of the countenance, in the which conflict the judgedo take the refemblances of the tace and tayour of the countenance, in the which condition in the tace and tayour of the countenance, in the which conditions and conditions, and disposition; even to they must give us leave to feek out the figns and to-ditions. kens of the mind onely, and thereby shew the life of either of them, referring you unto others to write the Wars; Battels, and other great things they did. It is certain that Alexander was descended The Parentage from Hercules by Caranus, and that by his Mothers fide, he came of the blood of the Aacides by Ne of Alexander. optolemus. They fay alfo, that King Philip his Father when he was a young man, fell in fancy with his Mother Olympias, which at that time allo was a young Maiden, and an Orphan without Father or Mo-Olympias the ther, in the Isle of SAMOTHRACIA, where they were both received into themystery and fraternity King of Mucof the House of the religious: and that afterwards, he did ask her in marriage of her Brother Arym-don. bas, with whole confent they were married together. The night before they lay in wedded bed, the Olympiss Bride dreamed, that lightning fell into her belly, and that withall, there was a great light fire that dif- Dream perfed it felf all about in divers flames. King Philip her Husband allo, shortly after he was married, King Philips dreamed that he did feal his wives belly, and that the feal wherewith he fealed left behind the print of Dream. dreamed that he did feal his wives belly, and that the feal wherewith he fealed, left behind the print of a Lion. Certain Wifards and Southfayers told Philip, that this Dream gave him warning to look ftraight to his wife. But Aristander TELMESIAN answered again, that it signified his wife was conceived with child; for that they do not feal a veffell that hath nothing in it: and that she was with child with a boy, which should have a Lions heart. It is reported also, that many times as she lay a Olimbia Secfleep in her bed, there was feen a Serpent lying by her, the which was the chiefest cause (as some presuppose) that withdrew Philips love and kindness from her, and caused him that he lay not so oft with her, as before he was wont to do : either for that he feared some charmor enchantment , or else for that he thought himself unmeet for her company, supposing her to be beloved of some god. Some do also report this after another sort: as in this manner. That the women in those parts of long time, have been commonly polleft with the spirit of Orpheus, and the divine fury of Bacchus, whereupon they are called Cleodones, and Mimallones (as much, as war-like and fierce) and do many things like unto the women of Edonia and Thracia, dwelling about the Mountain Æmus. thereby they made menthe more afraid of them. Whereupon Philip after this Dream, fent Charo MEGALIPOLITAN unto the Oracle of Apollo at DELPHES, to enquire what it fignified. Answer was given him, that he should do Sacrifice unto Jupiter Hammon, and honour him above all gods: and that he had loft one of his eyes, with the which he peeping in at a cranny of his chamber door, saw the god in form of a Snake lie by his wife. Furthermore, Olympias (as Eratofthunes writeth) bidding her Son farewell when he went to conquer As 1A, after the had fecretly told him alone, by whom he was begotten, the prayed him to be valiant, and to flew himself worthy his Son that begat him. Others tell alfo, that the was angry with this report, faying : Will Alexander never leave to make me suspected alfo, that the was angry with this report, cted of Juno? So it is, that Alexander was born on the fixth day of the Moneth of Hecatombecon, (in English, June) which the MACEDONIANS call Lous. On the very fame day, the Temple of Diana in the City of Ernesus was burnt, as Hegefias MAGNETIAN doth witnels, whole cry and exclamation was to terrible and cold, that it was enough to have quenched that fire. It is not to be wondred at, that Diana suffered her temple to be burnt, being like a Midwife, busie about Alexanders birth, But this is true that all the Priefts, Magitians and Soothsayers, which were at that time in E-PHESUS, judging that this did prognofticate iome marvellous great misfortune to come like men beftraught of their wits, they ran up and down the City finiting of their faces, and crying, that some great plague and mischief was born that day unto Asia. Shortly after that King Philip had won the City of POTIDEA, three Messengers came to him the same day, that brought him great news. The first, that Parmenio had won a notable Battell of the ILLYRIANS: the second, that his Horse onely wan the bell and prize at the Olympian Games: and the third, that his Wife had brought him a Son called Alexander. Philip being marvellous glad to hear these news, the Soothfayers did make his joy yet greater: assuring him, that his Son which was born with three Victories all together, (hould be invincible. Now for his flature and personage, the Statues and Images made of him by Lyppu do best declare it, for that he would be drawn of no man but him onely. Divers of his Successions and friends did afterwards counterfeit his Image, but that excellent workman Lifippus onely, of all other the chiefest, hath perfectly drawn and resembled Alexanders manner of holding his neck, somewhat hanging down towards the left side, and also the sweet look and cast of his eyes. But when Apelles painted Alexander, holding Lightning in his hand, he did not shew his fresh colour, but made him somewhat black, and swartier then his face indeed was: for naturally he had a very fair white colour, mingled also with red, which chiefly appeared in his face and in his brest. I remember I read also in the Commentaries of Aristozinus, that his skinhad a marvellous good favour, and that his breath was very fweet : infomuch that his body had so sweet a smell, of it felf, that all the Apparell he wore next unto his body, took thereof a passing delightfull favour, as if it had been perfumed. And the cause hereof peradventure might be the very temperature and constitution of his body, which was hot and burning like fire. For Theophrass is of opinion, that the fweet favour cometh by means of the heat that drieth up the moifture of the body. By which reason also it appeareth, that the dry and hot Countries parched with heat of the Sun, are those that deliver unto us the best Spices: because that the Sun drieth up the moiflure of the outward parts, as a matter of corruption. This naturall heat that Alexander had, made him (as it appeareth) to be given to drink, and to be hafty. Even from his childhood they faw that he was given to be chafte. For though otherwise he was very hot and hasty, yet was he hardly moved with lust or pleasure of the body, and would moderately use it. But on the other side, the ambition and desire he had of honour, shewed a certain greatness of mind and noble courage, patting his years. For he was not (as his Father Philip) defirous of all kind of glory: who like a Rhetoritian had a delight to utter his cloquence, and stamped in his Coyns, the Victories he had won at the Olympian Games, by the fwift running of his Horle and Coaches. For when he was asked one day (because he was swift of foot) whether he would assay to run for victory at the Olympian Games: I could be content (faid he) fo I might run with Kings. And yet to speak generally, he milliked all fuch contention for Games. For it feemed that he utterly milliked all wreftling and other exercise for prize, where men did use all their strength : but otherwise he himself made certain Festivall days and Games of prize for common Stage-players, Musicians and Singers, and for the very Poets also. He delighted also in hunting of divers kind of Beasts, and playing at the Staff. Ambaifadours being fent on a time from the King of PERSIA, whileft his Father was in fome Journey out of his Realm : Alexander familiarly enterraining of them, fo wan them with his courteous entertainment (for that he used no childish questions unto them, nor asked them trifling matters, but what diflance it was from one place to another, and which way they went into the high Countries of As1A, and of the King of Persia himfelf, how he was towards his Enemies, and what power he had) that he did ravish them with delight to hear him, infomuch that they made no more account of Philips eloquence and sharp wit, inrespect of his Sons courage and noble mind, to attempt great Enterprizes. For when they brought him news that his Father had taken some famous City, or had won fome great Battell, he was nothing glad to hear it, but would fay to his play-fellows : Sirs, my Father will have all , I shall have nothing left to conquer with you , that shall be ought worth. For he delighting neither in pleasure nor riches, but onely in valiantness and honour, thought that the greater Conquefts and Realms his Father should leave him, the less he should have to do for himfelf. And therefore, feeing that his Fathers Dominions and Empire increased daily more and more, perceiving all occasion taken from bim to do any great attempt, he desired no riches nor pleasure, but Wars and Battels, and aspired to a Seigniory where he might with honour. He had divers men appointed him (as it is to be supposed) to bring him up : as School-masters, Governours, and Grooms of his chamber to attend upon him: and among those, Leonidas was the chiefest man that had the government and charge of him, a man of severe disposition, and a Kinsiman also unto the Queen O-Impias. He missised to be called a Master or Tutor, though it be an Office of good charge; where- Leonidas the upon others called him Alexanders Governour, because he was a Nobleman, and allied to the Prince. At what time Philonicus THESSALIAN had brought Bucephall the Horfe to fell unto King Philop, Bucephall, A. asking thirteen Talents, they went into the Field to ride him. The Horse was found so rough, and lexande Horse. churlish, that the riders said he would never do service; for he would let no man get upon his back, nor abide any of the Gentlemens voices about King Philip, but would yerk out at them. Thereupon Philip being afraid, commanded them to carry him away as a wild Beaft, and altogether unprofitable: the which they had done, had not Alexander that flood by , faid : O gods, what a Horse do they turn away, for lack of skill and heart to handle him? Philip heard what he faid, but held his peace. Alexander of rrepeating his words, feeming to be forry that they should fend the Horse back again : Why, faid Philip, dost thou controll them that have more experience then thou, and that know better then thou how to handle a Horse? Alexander answered, and yet methinks I should handle him better then all they have done. But if thou canst not, no more then they, replied Philip, what wilt thou forfeit for thy folly? I am content (quoth Alexander) to jeopard the price of the Horse. Every man laughed to hear his answer, and the wager was laid between them. Then ran Alexander to the Horse, and took him by the bridle: and turned him towards the Sun. It feemed that he had marked (as I Suppose) how mad the Horse was to see his own shadow, which was ever before him in his eye, as he firred too and fro. Then Alexander speaking gently to the Horse, and clapping him on the back The agility of with his hand, till he had left his fury and fnorting, fottly let fall his Cloak from him, and lightly leap-Alexander in with his hand, till he had left his fury and morting, 101111 let iall his Look from him, and ingitive leap-ing on his back, got up without any danger, and holding the reins of the bridle hard, without striking wildness of or stirring the Horle, made him to be gentle enough. Philip at the first with fear beholding his Sons agility, left he should take some hurt, faid never a word : but when he faw him readily turn the Horse at the end of his carier , in a bravery for that he had done, all the lookers on gave a great shout for joy. The father on the other side (as they say) fell a weeping for joy. And when Alexander was lighted from the Horse, he said unto him killing his head : Philip prophe-O Son, thou must needs have a Realm that is meet for thee, for MACEDON will not hold thee, fieth of his San Furthermore, confidering that of nature he was not to be won by extremity, and that by gentle Alexander, means and perswasion he could make him do what he would, heever fought rather to perswade then command him in any thing he had to do. In that place are yet seen seats of stone stagirs. which Arifforle caused to be made, and close walks to walk in the shadow. It is thought also, that Alexander did not onely learn of Aristotle Morall Philosophy and Humanity , but also he heard of him, othermore fecret, hard, and grave Doctrine, which Aristotles Scholars do properly call Acroamata, or Epoptica, meaning things speculative, which requireth the Masters teaching to understand them, or elle are kept from common knowledge: which Sciences they did not commonly teach. Alexander being paffed into Asia, and hearing that Arifforle had put out certain Books of that matter, for the honours sake of Philosophy: he wrote a Letter unto him, somewhat too plain, and of this effect. Alexander the medies, and rules to live by: as appeareth by his Letters he wrote, that of his own nature he was much Great practifed given to his Book, and defired to read much. He learned also the Iliads of Homer, of Aristeles correction, which they call, 7th is 78 144 draces, the corrected, as having passed under the rule; and laid it every night under his bedshead with his Dagger, calling it (as Onefferates writeth) the Institution of Martiall Discipline. And when he was in the high Countreys of Asia, where he could not readily mean of the come by other Books, he wrote unto Harpalus to fend them to him. Harpalus fent him the Histories of Philifiu, with divers Tragedies of Empides , Sophocles, and Efebilm: and certain Hymnes of the was found Teleftu and Philoxenu. Alexander did reverence Ariftotle at the first, as his Father, and so he termed him: because from his naturall Father he had life, but from him, the knowledge to live. But afterwards he suspected him somewhat; yet he did him no hurt, neither was he so friendly to him as he had been: whereby men perceived that he did not bear him the good will he was wont to do. This notwithflanding, he left not that real and defire he had to the fludy of Philosophy, which he had learned Homers Works from his youth, and ftill continued with him. Furthermore, there was an old Oke feen in my time, which the Countreymen commonly call Alexanders Oke, because his Tent or Pavilion was fastned to it: and not far from thence is the Charnell house, where those MACEDONIANS were buried that were flain at the Battell. For these causes, his Father Philip loved him very dearly, and was glad to hear the MACEDONIANS call Alexander King, and himself their Captain. Howbeit the troubles that fell out in his Court afterwards, by reason of Philips new marriages and loves, bred great quarrell and strife amongst the women : for the mischief of diffention and jealousse of women, doth separate the hearts of Kings one from another, whereof was chiefeft cause, the sharpness of Olympias, who being a jealous woman, fretting and of a revenging mind, did incense Alexander against his Father. But the chief cause that provoked Alexander, was Attalm, at the Marriage of Cleopatra, whom Philip married a Maiden, falling in fancy with her when himself was past marriage. This was the matter; Attalas being Uncle unto this Cleopatra, fell drunk at the Marriage, and being in his cups, he perswaded the MACEDONI-ANS that were at the Feaft, to pray to the gods, that they might have a lawfull Heir of Philip and Cleopatra, to succeed him in the Kingdom of MACEDON. Alexander being in a rage therewith, threw a Cup at his head, and faid unto him: Why, Traytor, what am 1? doft thou take me for a Baftard? Philip feeing that , rofe from the boord, and drew out his Sword , but by good fortune for them both, being troubled with choler and Wine, he fell down on the ground. Then Alexander mocking him, Lo, faid he to the MACEDONIANS, here is the man that prepared to go out of Eu-ROPE INto Asia, and stepping onely from one bed to another, ye fee him laid along on the ground. After this great infolency, he took his Mother Olympias away with him, and carrying her into his Countrey of EPIRUS, he left her there, and himfelf afterwards went into ILLYRIA. In the mean time, Demaratus Corinthian, a friend of King Philips, and very familiar with him, came to fee him. Philip when he had courteoully welcomed him, asked him how the GRECIA NS did agree together. Truly, O King, quoth he, it imports you much to inquire of the agreement of the GRECI-ANS, when your own Court is fo full of quarrell and contention. These words nipped Philip in fuch fort, and caused him to know his fault, that through Demarativ means, whom he sent to per-Arident King swade Alexander to return, Alexander was made to come back again. Now when Pexodorm, a Philiphalard, Prince of Carla (desiring for necessities sake, to enter in League and Friendship with Philip) of begotten of a fered his eldeft Daughter in marriage unto Aridem King Philips Son, and had fent Arifforritus common Armbastadour into Macedon for that purpose: the friends of Alexander and his Mother, began again to inveigle him with new reports and fulpitions, how Philip by this great Marriage would advance Aridem, to his utter undoing, and leave him his Heir in the Kingdom. Alexander being netled therewith, fent one Theffalm a Player of Tragedies into CARIA to Pexodorm, to perswade him to leave Aridam, that was a Baftard and a fool, and rather to make alliance with Alexander. This offer pleafed Pexodorm far better, to have Alexander his Son-in-law, then Aridam. Philip understanding this, went himself into Alexanders chamber, taking Pailotas with him (the Son of Parmenio) one of his familiars, and bitterly took up Alexander, telling him that he had a base mind, and was unworthy to be left his Heir after his death, if he would caft himself away, marrying the Daughter of a Carian, that was a Slave and Subject of a barbarous King. Thereupon he wrote Letters unto Corinth, that they should send The flatus bound unto him. And surthermore he banished out of MACEDON, Harpalus, Nearchen , Phrygim , and Ptelomy, his Sons companions : whom Alexander afterwards called home again , and placed them in great authority about him. Shortly after , Pan-Philip King of fanias furtaining villany by the countell and commandment of Attalm and Cleopatra, craving juffice Muchan flam of Philip, and finding no amends, he converted all his anger against him, and for spight slew him himself, by Parlinia. by Paulania. Of this murther most men accused Queen Olympias, who (as it is reported) alluring this young man, aft cause of anger, to kill him. And Alexander also went not clear from suspition of this murther. For some fay that Paulanias after this villany was done him, complained unto Alexander, and told him how he had been abuted: who recited these Verses of Europides to him, in the Tragedie of Medea, where the faid in anger, that the would be revenged:

Both of the Bridegroom, and the Bride,

And of the Father-in-law. Notwithstanding, afterwards he caused diligent search to be made, and all them to be severely punished that were of the conspiracy: and was angry also that his Mother Olympias had cruelly slain The beginning Citepatra. 30 me came to the Range of Alexa greatly envied and hard of dangerous Enemies, and every way full of danger. For the barbarous Reign. Nations that were near Neighbours unto Macedon, could not abide the bondage of strangers, but defired to have their naturall Kings. Neither had Philip time enough to bridle and pacific GREECE, which he had conquered by force of Arms: but having a little altered the Governments, had through his infolency left them all in great trouble, and ready to rebell, for that they had not long been acquainted to obey. Thereupon Alexanders Councell of MacEdon, being afraid of the troublesome time, were of opinion, that Alexander should utterly for sake the affairs of GREECE, and not to follow them with extremity, but that he should feek to win the barbarous People by gentle means, that had rebelled against him, and wisely to remedy these new stirs. But he far otherwife determined to stablish his fafety by courage and magnanimity: perswading himself, that if they faw him ftoop and yeeld at the beginning, how little foever it were, every one would be upon him: Thereupon, he straight quenched all the rebellion of the barbarous People, invading them suddenly Alexander oin the Army, by the River of Da Nusy, where in a great Battell he overthrew Syrmu King of vertame Syrwith his Army, by the River of Da Nusy, where in a great Battell he overthrew Syrmu King of vertame Syrwith his Army, by the River of Da Nusy, where in a great Battell he overthrew Syrmu King of vertame Syrven has a supplied to the system of the syste the TREBALLIANS. Furthermore, having intelligence that the THEBANS were revolted, and mu King of that the ATHENIANS allo were confederate with them : to make them know that he was a man, the Triballians, he marched with his Army towards the Straight of Thermopilis, faying; that he would make Demo-Street the Oratour fee (who in his Orations, whilest he was in ILLYRIA, and in the Countrey of the TRIBALLIANS, called him child) that he was grown a stripling passing through THESSALY, and should find him a man before the Walls of ATHENS. When he came with his Army unto the Gates of THERES, he was willing to give them of the City occasion to repent them: and therefore onely demanded Phanix and Prothytes, authors of the rebellion. Furthermore, he proclaimed by Trumpet, pardon and fafety unto all them that would yeeld unto him. The THEBANS on the oa ther fide, demanded of him Philoras and Antipater, two of his chiefest servants, and made the Crier proclaim in the City, that all fuch as would defend the liberty of GREECE, should joyn with them. Then did Alexander leave the MACEDONIANS at liberty to make War with all cruelty. The THEBANS also fought with greater courage and defire then they were able, confidering that their Enemies were many against one. And on the other fide also, when the Garifon of the MACE-DONIANS which were within the Castle of CADMEA, made a Salley upon them, and gave them Charge in the Reer-ward : then they being environed of all fides , were flain in manner every one Thehes won of them, their City taken, destroyed and razed even to the hard ground. This he did, specially to and razed by make all the rest of the People of GREECE astraid by example of this great calamity and misery of Alexander. the THEBANS, to the end none of them should dare from thenceforth once to rife against him. He would cloak this cruelty of his under the complaints of his Confederates, the PHOCIANS and PLA-TEIANS: who complaining to him of the injuries the THEBANS had offered, could not deny them justice. Notwithstanding, excepting the Priests, and the religious, and all such as were friends unto any of the Lords of MACEDON, all the friends and kindred of the Poet Pinday w, and all those that had diffiwaded them which were the Rebels, he fold all the reft of the City of THEBES for Slaves, which amounted to the number of thirty thousand persons, besides them that were slain at the Battell, which were fix thousand more. Now amongst the other miseries and calamities of the poor City of THERES, there were certain THRACIAN Souldiers, who having spoiled and defaced the houle of Timoclea, a vertuous Lady, and of a noble parentage, they divided her Goods among them : and their Captain having ravished her by force, asked her, whether she had any where hidden any Gold or Silver. The Lady told him she had. Then leading him into her Garden, the brought him unto a Well: where the faid the had caft all her Jewels and precious things, when the heard the City was taken. The A noble act of barbarous Thracian stooped to look into the Well: The standing behind him, thrust him in, Timestes 2 noand then threw stones enough on him, and so killed him. The Souldiers when they knew it, took and blewoman of bound her, and so carried her unto Alexander. When Alexander saw her countenance, and marked Theber. her gate, he supposed her at the first to be some great Lady, she sollowed the Souldiers with such a majefty and boldness. Alexander then asking her what the was: the answered that the was the Sifter of Theagenes, who fought a Battell with King Philip before the City of CHERONEA, where being Generall, he was flain valiantly fighting for the defence of the liberty of GREECE. Alexander wondering at her noble answer and couragious deed, commanded no man should touch her nor her children, and so freely let her go whither she would. He made I cague also with the ATHENIANS, though they were very forry for their milerable fortune. For the day of the folemn Feaths of their Mysteries being come, they lest it off, mourning for the THEBANS: courteously entertaining all those that flying from THEBES came to them for fuccour. But whether it was for that his anger was past him, following therein the nature of Lions: or because that after so great an example of cruelty, he would Thew a singular elemency again: he did not onely pardon the ATHENIANS of all faults committed, but did also counsell them to look wisely to their doings, for their City one day included GREECE, if he chanced to die. Men report, that certainly he oftentimes repented him that he had dealt fo cruelly with the THEBANS, and the grief he took upon it, was cause that he afterwards shewed himself more mercifull unto divers others. Afterwards also he did blame the fury of Bacclin, who to be revenged of him, made him kill Clina at the Table being drunk, and the MACE-DONIANS also to refule him to go any further to conquer the lndians, which was an imperfe-Ction of his Enterprize, and a diminishing also of his Honour. Besides, there was never THEBAN afterwards, that had escaped the fury of his Victory, and did make any Petition to him, but he had his fuit. Thus was the eftate of THEBES as you have heard. Then the GRECIANS having affembled a generall Councell of all the States of GREECE within the Straights of PELOPONNEsus, there it was determined that they would make War with the PERSIANS. Whereupon Alexander cho- they chose Alexander Generall of all GREECE. Then divers men coming to visit Alexander, as well Philosophers, as Governours of States, to congratulate with him for his election, he looked that Diogenes Sinopian (who dwelt at CORINTH) would likewise come again ere the rest had done: but fen Generall when he saw he made no reckoning of him, and that he kept still in the Suburbs of CORINTH, at a of all Grecce, place called CRANIUM, he went himself unto him, and found him laid all along in the Sun. When Disgenes faw fo many coming toward him , he fare up a little, and looked full upon Alexander. Alexander courteoutly spake unto him, and asked him, if he lacked any thing. Yea said he, that I do: talk with Dirthar thou stand out of my Sun a little. Alexander was so well pleased with this answer, and marvelled so much at that great boldness of this man, to see how small account he made of him : that when he went his way from him , Alexanders familiars laughing at Diogenes, and mocking him, he told them: Masters lay what you lift, truly if I were not Alexander, I would be Diogenes. Alexander being defirous to hear what the Oracle of Apillo DELPHIAN would fay unto him touching the fuccels of his Journey into ASIA, he went unto the City of DELPHOS. It chanced to, that he came thither in the days which they call unfortunate, on which days no man used to ask Apollo any thing. This notwithstanding, he sent first unto the Nun which pronounced the Oracles, to pray her to come unto him. But the refused to come, alleadging the custom which forbade her to Thereupon Alexander went thither himself in person, and brought her out by sorce into the Temple. She seeing then that he would not be denied, but would needs have his will, told him: My Son, for that I fee, thou art invincible. Alexander hearing that, faid, he defired no other Oracle, and that he had as much as he looked for. Afterwards when he was even ready to go on with his Voyage, he had divers figns and tokens from the gods: and amongst other, an Image of the Poet Orphemade of Cyprus, in the City of LEBETHRES, in those days did sweat marvellously. Many men fearing that fign , Arifiander the Soothfayer bade Alexander be of good chear , and hope well ; for he should obtain noble Victories that should never be forgotten, the which should make the Poers and Musicians sweat to write and sing them. Then, for his Army which he led with him, they that do fet down the least number, say, that they were thirty thousand Footmen, and five thousand Horsemen: and they that say more, do write, four and thirty thousand Footmen, and four thousand Horsemen. Arisebulus writeth that Alexander had no more but threescore and ten Talents to pay his Souldiers with: and Darie writeth, that he had no more Provision of Victuals, then for thirty fome Haven. Thus by his bounty, having in manner spent almost the revenues of the Crown of MACEDON, Perdiceas asked him: My Lord, what will you keep for you felf? Hope, faid he. Then, quoth Perdicess again, we will also have some part, since we go with you: and so resused the Revenue which the King had given him for his Pension. Many others did also the like. But such as were contented to take his liberality, or would ask him anything, he gave them very frankly, and in fuch liberality spent all the Revenue he had. With this defire and determination, he went on to the Straight of Hellespont, and going to the City of Ilium he did Sacrifice unto Diana, and made funerall effusions unto the demy-gods (to wir, unto the Princes which died in the War of TROIA, whose bodies were buried there) and specially unto Achilles, whose grave he anointed with oil, and ran naked round about it with his familiars, according to the ancient cuftom of Funerals. Then he covered it with Nofegayes and Flowers, faying, that Achilles was happy, who while he lived had a faithfull friend, and after his death an excellent Herauld to fing his praife. When he had done, and went up and down the City to fee all the Monuments and notable things there, one asked him, if he would fee Paris Harp. He answered again, he would very tain see Achilles Harp, who plaid and fung upon it all the famous acts done by valiant men in former times. In the mean time, Darim King of PERSIA, having leavied a great Army, fent his Captains and Lieutenants to tarry Alexander at the River of GRANICUS. There was Alexander to fight of necessity, being the onely bar to ftop his entry into Asia. Moreover, the Captains of the Councell about him, were afraid of the depth of this River, and of the height of the bank on the otherfide, which was very high and freep, and could not be won without fighting. And fome faid also that he should have speciall care of the ancient regard of the Moneth; because the Kings of MACEDON did never use to put the Army into the Field in the Moneth of Dason, which is June. For that, faid Alexander, we will remedy foon: let them call it the fecond Moneth, Artemisium, which is May. Fur-

Alexander made answer again , that HELLESPONT would blush for shame , if he were now afraid to pass over the River, fince he had already come over an arm of the Sea. Thereupon he himself first entred the River with thirteen Guidons of Horsemen, and marched forwards against an infinite number of Arrows which the Enemies shot at him, as he was coming up the other bank, which was very high and fteep, and worft of all, full of armed men and Horfe-men of the Enemies: which staved to receive him in Battell-ray, thrusting his men down into the River, which was very deep, and ran fo fw ft, that it almost carried them down the stream; infomuch that men thought him more rain to twin, that it among the most fact danger. This notwithstanding, he was so wilfully bent, rash then vise, to lead his men with such danger. This notwithstanding, he was so wilfully bent, Battell betwire that he would need so ver, and in the end with great ado recovered the other side, specially because that he would needs over, and in incension and account in outer ince specially occasing Alexander and the Earth flid away, by reason of mud. So when he was over, he was driven to fight pell mell Darius at the man to man, becaule his Enemies did fet upon the first that were passed over, before they could put River of Grathemselves into Battell-ray, with great cries, keeping their Horses very close together, and fought nicus. first with their Darts, and afterwards came to the Sword when their Darts were broken. Then many of them fet upon him alone, for he was eafily to be known above the reft by his shield, and the hinder part of his Helmet, about the which there hung from the one fide to the other, a marvellous fair white Plume. Alexander had a blow with a Dart on his thigh, but it hurt him not. Thereupon Rosfaces and Spithridates, both two chief Captains of the Persians, fetting upon Alexander at once, he left the one, and riding straight to Rosfaces, who was excellently armed, he gave him fuch a blow with his Launce, that he brake it in his hand, and straight drew out his Sword. But so foon as they two had closed together, Spibridates coming at the one fide of him, raised himself upon his firrops, and gave Alexander with all his might fuch a blow on his head with a Battell-ax, that he cut the creft of his Helmer, and one of the fides of his Plume, and made fuch a gash, that the edge of his Battell-ax touched the very hair of his head. And as he was lifting up his hand to ftrike Clitas faved Alexander again, great Cliens preventing him, thrust him through with a Partisan; and at the very Alexander. fame instant, Roefaces fell dead from his Horse with a wound which Alexander gave him with his Sword. Now whileft the Horfemen fought with fuch fury, the Squadron of the Battell of the Ma-CEDONIANS Footmen had paffed the River, and both the Battels began to march one against the other. The PERSIANS fluck not manfully to it any long time, but ftraight turned their backs Alexanders and fled , faving the GRECIANS which took pay of King Darim : they drew together upon a Victory of the and fied, laying the Gracians which the discrete But Alexander setting upon them, more of will then discrete Granicus, and craved mercy of Alexander. But Alexander setting upon them, more of will then discrete Granicus, tion, had his Horse killed under him, being thrust through the slank with a Sword. This was not Bneephall, but another Horse he had. All his men that were slain or hurt at this Battell, were hurt amongst them valiantly fighting against desperate men. It is reported that there were slain at this first Battell, twenty thousand Footmen of these barbarous People, and two thousand five hundred Horsemen. On Alexanders side, Aristobulus writeth, that there were flain four and thirty men in all, of the which, twelve of them were Footmen. Alexander to honour their valiantness, caused every, one of their Images to be made in brass by Lysippus. And because he would make the GRE-CIANS partakers of this Victory, he fent unto the ATHENIANS three hundred of their Targets, which he had won at the Battell; and generally upon all the other Spoils he put this honourable Inscription, Alexander the Son of Philip, and the Grecians, excepting the Lacedamonians, have won this spoyl upon the barbarous Asians. As for Plate of Gold or Silver, also Purple Silks, or other fuch precious things which he got among the Persians , he fent them all unto his Mother. a few except. This first Victory of Alexander, brought such a sudden change amongst the barbarous People in Alexanders behalf, that the City felf of SARDIS, the chief City of the Empire of the barbarous People, or at the leaft through all the Low-countries and Coasts upon the Sea , veelded ftraight unto him, and the reft also, faving HALICAR NASSUS and MILETUM, which did ftill refift him: howbeit at length he took them by force. When he had so conquered all thereabout he flood in doubt afterwards what he were best to determine. Sometimes he had a marvellous defire, horly to follow Darius wherefoever he were, and to venture all at a Battell. Another time again, he thought it better first to occupie himself in conquering these Low-Countries, and to make himself strong with the Money and Riches he should find among them, that he might afterwards be the better able to follow him. This did farther so encourage Alexander, that he made haste to clear all the Sea-coast, even as far as CILICIA and PHOENICIA. But the wonderfull good fuccess he had, running along all the Coast of PAMPHILIA, gave divers Historiographers occasion to set forth his doings with admiration, faying: that it was one of the wonders of the World, that the fury of the Sea, which unto all other was extream rough, and many times would fwell over the tops of the high rocks upon the cliffs, fell calm unto him. And it appeareth, that Menander himself in a Comedy of his, doth

And if through the surges my journey do ly, The waves give me way, and the Sea becomes dry. Yet Alexander himself simply writeth in his Epistles (without any great wonder) that by Sea he pasfed a place called the Ladder, and that to pass there, he took Ship in the City of PHASELIDES. There he remained many days: and when he faw the Image of Theodelies PHA SELITAN, standing in the Market place, he went in a Dance thither one evening after Supper, and cast Flowers and Garlands upon his Image, honouring the memory of the dead, though it feemed but in fport; for that he was his companion when he lived, by means of Arifitale and his Philosophy. After that he overcame also the Pisidians, who thought to have resisted him; and conquered all PhryGIA besides. There in the City of GORDIUS; which is said to be the ancient seat of King Midas, he faw the Chariot that is so much spoken off, which is bound with the bark of a Cornell-tree, and it Physics, where was told him for a troth, of the barbarous People, that they believed it was a Prophecy : That who foever could undo the band of that bark, was certainly ordained to be King of all the World. It is commonly reported, that Alexander proving to undo the band, and finding no ends to undo it by, they were to many-fold wreathed one within the other, he drew out his Sword, and cut the knot in the middeft : fo that then many ends appeared. But Aristobulus writeth, that he had quickly undone the knot, by taking the bolt out of the Ax-tree, which holdeth the beam and body of the Chariot, and so severed them afunder. Departing thence, he conquered the PAPHLAGONIANS and CAPPADOCIANS, and understood of the death of Memnon, that was Darius Generall of his Army by Sea, and in whom was all their hope to trouble and withftand Alexander: whereupon he was the bolder to go on with his determination, to lead his Army into the high Countreys of ASIA. Thendid King Darim himself come against Alexander, having leavied a great Power at Susa, of fix hundred thouland fighting men, trufting to that multitude, and also to a dream, the which his Wifards had expounded rather to flatter him, then to tell him truly. Darius dreamed that he faw all the Army of the MACEDONIANS on a fire, and Alexander ferving of him in the felf-fame attire that he himself wore when he was one of the Chamber unto the late King his Predecessor: and that when he came into the Temple of Belm, he suddenly vanished from him. By this Dream it plainly appeared, that the gods did fignifie unto him, that the MACEDONIANS should have noble fuccels in their doings, and that Alexander should conquer all As 1 A, even as King Darius had done, when he was but Algandes unto the King; and that fhortly after, he should end his life with great honour. This furthermore made him bold also, when he saw that Alexander remained a good while in CILICIA, supposing it had been for that he was afraid of him. Howbeit it was by reason of a AIEXARAGES in Ci- fickness he had, the which fome say he got by extream pains and travell, and others also, because he washed himself in the River Cydnus, which was cold as ice. How loever it came, there was none of the other Phylicians that durft undertake to cure him, thinking his difease uncurable, and no Medicines to prevail that they could give him, and fearing also that the MACEDONIAN'S would apply to their charge, if Alexander miscarried. But Philip ACARNANIAN, confidering his Master was very ill, and bearing himfelf of his love and good will towards him, thought he should not do that became him, if he did not prove (feeing him in extremity and danger of life) the utmost remedies of Physick, what danger foever he put himself into: and therefore took upon him to minister unto Alexander, and periwaded him to drink it boldly if he would quickly be whole, and go to the Wars. In the meantime, Parminio wrote him a Letter from the Camp, advertifing him, that he should beware of Philip his Phylician, for he was bribed and corrupted by Darius, with large promifes of great riches that he would give him with his Daughter in marriage, to kill his Master. Alexander when he had read this Letter, laid it under his beds head, and made none of his nearest familiars acquainted therewith. When the hour came that he should take his Medicine, Philip came into his Chamber with other of the Kings familiars, and brought a cup in his hand with the Potion he should drink, Alexander then gave him the Letter, and withall, chearfully took the cup of him, shewing no manner of fear or miltrust of any thing. It was a wonderfull thing, and worth the fight, how one reading the Letter, and the other drinking the Medicine both at one instant, they looked one upon another, howbeit not both with like chearfull countenance. For Alexander looked merrily upon him, plainly shewing the trust he had in his Physician Philip, and how much he loved him: and the Physician also beheld Alexander like a man perplexed and amazed, to be so failly accused; and straight lift up his hands to heaven, calling the gods to witness that he was innocent; and then came to Alexanders beds fide, and prayed him to be of good chear, and boldly to do as he would advise him. The Medicine beginning towork, overcame the Difease, and drave for the time, all his naturall strength and powers to the lowest parts of his body: insomuch as his speech failed him, and he fell into such a weaknels, and almost swouning, that his pulse did scant beat, and his senses were well near taken from him. But that being past, Philip in few days recovered him again. Now when Alexander had gotten some strength, he shewed himself openly unto the MACEDONIANS: for they would not be pacified, nor periwaded of his health, untill they had feen him. In King Daviss Camp, there was one Amystas a Macedonian, and banisht out of his Countrey, who knew Alexanders disposition very well. He finding that Dariss meant to meet with Alexander within the Straights and Valleys of the Mountains, belought him to tarry rather where he was, being a plain open Countrey round about him, considering that he had a great Hoast of men to fight with a few Enemies, and that it was most for his advantage to meet with him in the open field. Daring answered him again, that he was afraid of nothing but that he would flie, before he could come to him. Amynas replied : For that O King , I pray you fear not : for I warrant you upon my life he will come to you. yea and is now onwards on his way coming towards you. All these perswasions of Amyntas could not Darias contemturn Darius from making his Camp to march towards CILICIA. At the felf-same time also, A. nech Amparas lexander went towards Syria to meet with him. But it chanced one night that the one of them Profitable miffed the other, and when day was come, they both returned back again: Alexander being glad of this hap, and making hafte to meet with his Enemy within the Straights. Dariu also feeking to win Alexanders lodging from whence he came, and to bring his Army out of the Straights, began to find the fault and errour committed: for that he had thut himfelf up in the Straights (holden in on the one fide with the Mountain, and on the other with the Sea, and the River of Pindarus that ran between both) and that he was driven to disperse his Army into divers Companies, in a stony and ill-savoured Countrey, ill for Horsemen to travell; being on the contrary side a great advantage for his Enemies, which were excellent good Footmen, and but few in number. But now, as Fortune gave Alexander the Field as he would wish it, to fight for his advantage, so could he tell excellently well how to set his men in Battell-ray to win the Victory. For albeit that Alexander had the less number by many then his Enemy, yet he had fuch policy and cast withhim, that he foresaw all, and would not be environed. his Enemy, yet he had fuch policy and care warman, that he foretaw any and would not be environced. But ell betwixe For he did put out the right Wing of his Battell a great deal farther then he did his leit Wing, and Darint and A. fighting himself in the left Wing in the foremost ranks, he made all the barbarous People flie that Lexinder in Cifrood before him: howbeit, he was hurt on his thigh with a blow of a Sword. Chares writeth that licia. Darins felf did hurt him, and that they fought together man to man. Notwithstanding, Alexander felf writing of this Battell unto Antipater, faith, that indeed he washurt on the thigh with a Sword: howben it put him to no danger: but he writeth not that Darius hurt him. Thus having won a Alexanders vifamous Victory, and slain above a hundred and ten thousand of his Enemies, he could not yet take ctory of Darius Darins, because he fled, having still four or five furlongs vantage before him: howbeit he took his Chariot of Battell wherein he tought, and his Bow also. Then he returned from the chase, and found the MACEDONIANS facking and spoiling all the rest of the Camp of the barbarous People. where there was infinite Riches (although they had left the most part of their Carriage behind them in the City of DAMAS, to come lighter to the Battell) but yet referved for himself all King Darius Tent, which was full of great number of Officers, of rich Moveables, and of Gold and Silver. So, when he was come to the Camp, putting off his Armour, he entred into the Bath and faid : Come on, let us go and wash off the sweat of the Battell in Darius own Bath. Nay, replied one of his familiars again, in Alexanders Bath: for the Goods of the vanquished are rightly the Vanquishers. When he came into the Bath, and faw the Batons and Eures, the Boxes, and Viols for Perfumes all of clear Gold, excellently wrought, all the Chambers pertuned passing sweetly, that it was like a Paradife: then going out of his Bath, and coming into his Tent, feeing it so stately and large, his Bed, the Table, and Supper, and all ready in fuch sumptuous fort, that it was wonderfull, he turned him unto his familiars, and faid: This was a King indeed, was he not think ye? As he was ready to Darius Mogo to his supper, word was brought him, that they were bringing unto him amongst other Ladies ther. Wife and taken Prisoners, King Darius Mother and his Wife, and two of his Daughters unmarried: who ha-two Daughters, ying feen his Chariot and Bow, burst out into lamentable cries, and violent beating of themselves, taken by Alexthinking Darim had been flain. Then he prefently fent one Leng-tum unto them, to let them understand, that Darius was alive, and that they should not need to be afraid of Alexander, for he did not fight with Darius, but for his Kingdom onely : and as for them, that they should have at his hands all that they had of Darius before, when he had his The elemency whole Kingdom in his hands. Alexander thinking it more Princely for a King, as I suppose to conquer himfelt, then to overcome his Enemies, did neither touch them, nor any other Maid or Wife, before he married them , Barfine onely excepted ; who being left Memnons Widow (Generall of King Darius by Sea) was taken by the City of DAMAS. She being excellently well learned in the Greek Tongue, and of good entertainment (being the Daughter of Artabazus, who came of a Kings Daughter) Alexander was bold with her by Parmenio's procurement (as Aristobulus Writeth) who inticed him to imbrace the company of so excellent a Woman, and patting fair befides. that the Enemies were not far from them, he came behind to encourage his Tutor, and in manner to benighted belides: moreover, it was very cold, and the way was very ill. At the length, percei-ving divers fires which the Enemies had made, fome in one place, and fome in another, trufting to his valiantness, having always provided remedy in extremity, when the MACEDONIANS were diffrei-fed, himself ever putting to his own hand, he ran unto them that had made the fires next him, and killing two of the barbarous People that lay by the fire fide, he featched away a fire brand, and ran with it to his own men, who made a great fire. At this the barbarous People where fo afraid, that they ran their way as faft as they could. Other also thinking to come and set upon him, he slew them and fent a few of his men onely to give affault unto the City, to keep the Tyrians occupied, that they should take no rest. One day the Soothsayer Aristander sacrificing unto the gods, having confidered of the figns of the intrails of the Beafts, did affure them that were prefent, that the City should betaken by the latter end of the Moneth. Every body laughed to hear him : for that day was the very last day of the Moneth. Alexander feeing him amazed, as one that could not tell what to fay to it, feeking ever to bring those tokens to effect, which the Soothfayers did prognofficate, commanded them that they should not reckon that day the thirtieth day, but the seven and twentieth: and immediately upon it made the Trumpet found the Alarum, and gave a hotter affault to the wall, then he had thought to have done before. They fought valiantly on both fides, infomuch as they

When his Governour Leonidas faw him, he faid thus unto him : When thou haft conquered the Countrey where these sweet things grow, then be liberall of thy Persume: but now, spare that little thou hast at this present. Alexander calling to mind at that time his admonition, wrote unto him in this fort : We do fend thee plenty of Frankincense and Myrrhe, because thou shouldest no more be a niggard unto the gods. There was brought unto him a little Coffer also, which was thought to be the preciousest thing, and the richest that was gotten of all Spoyls and Riches, raken at the overthrow of Darim. When he saw it, he asked his familiars that were about him, what they thought fittest, and the best thing to be put into it. Some faid one thing, some faid another thing : but he faid, he would put the Iliads of Honer into it, as the worthiest thing.

Then when he came to his Lodging, he would enter into his He would ever fup late, and was very curious to fee, that every man at his boord were alike ferved, and would fit long at the Table, because he ever loved to talk, as we have told you before. Otherwise he was as noble a Prince and gracious to wait upon , and as pleasant , as any King that ever was. For he lacked no grace nor comeliness to adorn a Prince, faving that he would be some ever was. For the lacked no grace not contented to anoth a reflect, faving that he would be infleted in glorying of his own deeds, much like unto a bragging Souldier; neither was he contented himfelf to pleafe his own humour that way, but would also fuffer his familiars to sooth him even to his teeth. And this was many times the destruction of honest men about him, the which would never praife him in his prefence, hating the flatterers, nor yet durft fay lefs of the praifes which they gave him. For of the first they were ashamed, and by the second they fell in danger. After Supper, he would wash himself again, and sleep until noon the next day following, and oftentimes all day long. For himself, he was nothing curious of dainty Diffnes: for when any did fend him rare Fruits, or Fish, from the Countreys near the Sea side, he would fend them abroad unto his friends, and feldom keep any thing for himfelf. His Table notwithflanding was always very honourably served, and did still increase his fare, as he did enlarge his Conquests, till it came to the fum of ten thouland Drachma's a day. But there he stayed, and would not exceed that sum: and moreover, commanded all men that would feaft him, that they should not spend above that sum. After this Battell of Issus , he fent unto the City of DAMAS , to take all the Gold and Silver, the Carriage, and all the women and children of the Persians which were left there, where the men of Arms of the Thessalians feed them full well : for therefore did he fend them thither, becaufe he faw that they had fought valiantly at the day of the Battell . and fo were the rest of his Army alfowell flored with Money. Alexaniers Journey unto the Oracle of Hammon.

Crows guided

Alexander in his Journey.

Against the Shore of Egypt, which of Ancient Phare I hight. As foon as he arose the next morning, he went to see this 1se of PHAROS, the which at that time mark withall, wherefore they were driven to take meal, and with that did mark out upon the earth being black the compals of the Town that was round and circular, and being divided into two equall parts, either of them refembled the skirts and fashion of the MACEDONIAN cloak. Alexander liked this draught passingly well. But there arose upon the sudden out of the River or Lake, such an infinite multitude of great Fowl of all forts, that they covered the element as it had been a cloud, and lightning within this circuit, did eat up all the nieal, and left not a crum. Alexander liked not these figns. Notwithstanding, his Soothsayer bade him not be discouraged, for they told him it was a fign that he should build a City there, so plentiful of all things, that he should maintain all forts of People. Then he commanded them, unto whom he had given the charge of the building, that they should go forward with their work, and he himself in the mean time, took his journey to go visit the Temple of Jupiter Hammon. The journey was long, and there were many troubles by the way, but two dangers above all the reft most speciall: the first, lack of water, because they had to travell many days journey through a great Defart: the second was, the danger of the rising of the South wind by the way, to blow the fand abroad, which was of a wonderfull length. And it is reported, that on a time there rose such a tempest in that Desart, that blew up whole hills of sand, which slew fifty thousand CambiferArmy men of Cambyles Army. Every man in Alexanders Train did know these dangers very well: howbeit it was hard to diffwade Alexander from any thing which he had a defire unto. For, fortune favouring him in all his attempts, made him conftant and refolute in his determinations: and his noble courage befides, made him invincible in all things he took in hand; infomuch as he did not onely compell his Enemies, but he had power also of time and place. In that Voyage, in stead of these former dangers spoken of, he had many helps, the which are supposed were sent him from the gods, by the Oracles that followed afterwards. For in a certain fort they have believed the Oracles that were written of him. First of all, the wonderfull water and great showers that sell from the Element, did keep him from fear of the first danger, and did quench their thirst, and moistned the dryness of the fand in such fort, that there came a sweet fresh air from it. Furthermore, when the marks were hidden from the Guides to shew them the way: and that they wandred up and down they could not tell were: there came Crows unto them that did guide them flying before them: flying fast when they saw them follow them, and stayed for them when they were behind. But Calightenes writeth a greater wonder then this, that in the night time, with the very noise of the Crows, they brought them again into the right way, which had loft their way. Thus Alexander in the end, having passed through this Wilderness, he came unto the Temple he sought for : where the Prophet or chief Priest saluted him from the god Hammon, as from his father. Then Alexander asked him, if any of the murtherers that had killed his Father, were left alive. The Priest answered him, and bade him take heed he did not blafpheme, for his Father was no mortall man. Then Alexander again rehearfing that he had spoken, asked him, if the murtherers that had conspired the death of Philip his Father were all punished. After that, he asked him touching his Kingdom, if he would grant him to be King over all the World. The god answered him by the mouth of his Propher, he should: and that the death of Philip was fully revenged. Then did Alexander offer great Presents unto the god, and gave Money large to the Priests, and Ministers of the Temple. This is that the most part of Writers do declare touching Alexanders, demand, and the Oracles given him: Yet did Alexander himself write unto his Mother, that he had secret Oracles from the god, which he would onely impart unto her, at his return into Macedon. Others fay also, that the Prophet meaning to falute him in the Greek Tongue to welcome him the better, would have faid unto him, O Paidien, as much as dear Son: but that he tripped a little in his tongue, because the Greek was not his naturall tongue, and placed an s, for an n, in the latter end, faying, O Paidies, to wit, O Son of Appier: and that Alexander was glad of that miftaking. Whereupon there an a rumour flraight among his men, that Jupiter had called him his Son. It is faid alto the the his men, that Fupiter had called him his Son. It is faid alto that he had Pfanmon the Philosopher in EGYPT, and that he liked his words very well, the first had also the first had also the first him for the philosopher in EGYPT, and that he liked his words very well, the first had also the first had also the first him for the philosopher in EGYPT, and that he liked his words very well, the first had also the first him for the philosopher in EGYPT. The faying of when he faid that god was King of all mortall men. For (quoth he) he that commandeth all Plannon the things, must needs be god. But Alexander felf spake better, and like a Philosopher, when he faith Philospher, of that god generally was Father to all mortall men, but that particularly he did elect the best fort for the providence himself. To conclude, he shewed himself more arrogant unto the barbarous People, and made as though he certainly believed that he had been begotten of fome god : but unto the GRECIANS he spake more modefly of divine generation. For in a Letter he wrote unto the ATHENIANS touching the City of Sa Mos, be faid: I gave ye not that noble free City, but it was given you at that time feribeth god ing the City of SAMOS, he faid: I gave ye not that noble tree City, out it was given by the state of the stat an Arrow, and feeling great pain of it: My friends, faid he, this bloud which is spilt is mans bloud, and not as Homer faid,

No such as from th'immortal gods doth flow.

And one day also in a marvellous great thunder, when every man was afraid, Anaxarchus the Rhetorician being present, said unto him: O thou Son of Jupiter, wilt thou do as much? No, said he, laughing on him, I will not be so fearfull to my friends, as thou wouldst have me : disdaining the ferrice of Fish to my Board, because thou feelt not Princes heads served in. And the report goeth also that Alexander upon a time sending a little Fish unto Hephastion, Anaxarchus should say as it were in mockery, that they which above others feek for fame with great trouble and hazard of life, have either small pleasure in the world, or else as little as others have. By these proofs and reasons alledged, we may think that Alexander had no vain nor prefumptious opinion of himfelf, to think that he was otherwise begotten of a god, but that he did it in policy to keep other men under obedience, by the opinion conceived of his godhead. Returning out of PHOENICIA into ÆGYPT, Alexander be made many Sacrifices, Feafts, and Procellions in honour of the gods, fundry Dances, Tragedies, made Feafts and fuch like paftimes goodly to behold: not onely for the fumptuous fetting out of them, but also and Plays. for the good will and diligence of the Setters forth of them, which strived every one to exceed the other. For the Kings of the CYPRIANS were the Setters of them forth, as at ATHENS they drew by Lot a Citizen of every Tribe of the People, to defray the charges of these pastimes. These Kings were very earnest who should do best, but specially Nicocreon, King of SALAMINA, in CYPRUS; and Paficrates, Lord of the City of SOLES. For it fell out to their Lot to furnish two of the excellenteft Players, Passcrates furnished Athenodorus, and Nicocreon Thessatus: whom Alexander loved fingularly well though he made no shew of it, untill that Athenodorus was declared Victor, by the Judges deputed to give fentence. For when he went from the Plays, he told them he did like the Judges opinion well, notwithstanding, he would have been contented to have given the one half of his Realm, not to have feen Theffalus overcome. Athenodorus being condemned upon a time by the ATHENIANS, because he was not in ATHENS at the Feasts of Bacchin, when the Comedies and Tragedies were played, and a fine fet on his head for his absence : he befought Alexander to write unto them in his behalf, that they would release his Penalty. Alexander would not do so, but sent thither his Money whereof he was condemned, and payed it for him of his own Purse. Also when Lycon SCARPHIAN, an excellent Stage-player had pleased Alexander well, and did foist in a Verse in his Comedy, containing a Petition of ten Talents: Alexander laughing at it, gave it him. Darius at Darius fend that time wrote unto Alexander, and unto certain of his friends also, to pray him to take ten thou- Ambassadors fand Talents for the ranfom of all those Prisoners he had in his hands, and for all the Countries, Lands unto Alexanand Signiories on this fide the River of Euphrates, and one of his Daughters also in marriage, that der. from thenceforth he might be his Kinfman and friend. Alexander imparted this to his Council. Amongst them Parmenio faid unto him : if I were Alexander, quoth he, furely I would accept this offer. So would I indeed, quoth Alexander again, if I were Parmenio. In fine, he wrote again unto Darim; that if he would submit himself, he would use him courteously: if not, that then he would presently march towards him. But he repented him afterwards, when King Darius Wifewas dead with child: for without diffimulation it grieved him much, that he had loft fo noble an occasion to shew his courtefie and clemency. This notwithftanding, he gave her body honourable burial, sparing for no cost. A- died in travel mongst the Eunuchs of the Queens Chamber, there was one Tireus taken prisoner, among the Wo- of child. men: who stealing out of Alexanders Camp, taking his horse-back, rode unto Darius to bring him news of the death of his Wife. Then Darius beating of his head, and weeping bitterly, cryed out aloud: Tirens report O gods, what wretched hap have the Persians! that have not onely had the Wife and Sifter of to Datius of their King taken prisoners even in his life time, but now that she is dead in travel of Child, she hath Statistaciburial been deprived of princely burial. Then spake the Eunuch to him, and said : For her burial, most gracious King, and for all due honour that might be wished her, PERSIA hath no cause to complain of her hard fortune. For, neither did Queen Stativa your Wife whilft she lived prisoner, nor your Mother, nor Daughters, want any part or jot of their honour they were wont to have before, faving only to fee the light of your honour, the which, god Oromafder grant to reftore again (if it be his will) unto your Majefty: neither was there any honour wanting at her death (to fet forth her stately Funerals) that might be gotten, but more, was lamented also with the tears of your Enemies. For Alexander is as mercifull in Victory, as he is valiant in Battle. Darius hearing the Eunuchs words, being vexed in mind for very grief: took the Eunuch aside into the secretest place of his Tent, and said unto him: If thou be not, with the misfortune of the Persians, become a Macedonian, but doeft in thy heart acknowledge Darius for thy foveraign Lord and Mafter: I pray thee, and do also conjure thee, by the reverence thou bearest unto this bright light of the Sun, and to the right hand of the King, that Darius talk thou do tell me truly. Are these the least evils which I lament in Statira, her imprisonment and death? And did the nor in her life make us more miserable by her dishonour, then it me had dishonour. death? And did she not in her life make us more miserable by her dishonour, then if we had dishonourably fallen into the hands of a cruell Enemy ? For, what honeft communication 1 pray thee, can a young Victorious Prince have with his Enemies Wife a prifoner: having done her fo much honour as he hathdone? Darius going on with these speeches, Tireus the Eunuch sell down on his knees, and belought him not to fay to, neither to blemish the Vertue of Alexander in that fort, nor yet so to dishonour his Sifter and Wife deceased, and thereby also to deprive himself of the greatest comfort he could wish to have in his calamity, which was, to be overcome of an Enemy that had greater Vertues then a man could possible have: but rather that he should wonder at Alexanders Vertue, who had shewed himself chaster to the Ladies, then valiant against the PER'SIANS. Generals fight hand to hand one with the other; and Alexander felf did arm him that was called Alexander, and Philotas the other which was called Darius. All the Army thereupon was gathered together to see this combat between them, as a thing that did betoken good or ill luck to come. The fight was sharp between them, but in the end, he that was called Alexander overcame the other: and Alexander to reward him, gave him twelve Villages, with priviledge to go after the PERSIAN manner. Thus it is written by Eratosthenes. The great Battle that Alexander fought with Darius was not (as many Writers report) at Arbeles, but at Gausameles, which signifieth in the Persian Tongue, the House of the Cammell. For some one of the ancient Kings of Persia that had escaped from the hands of his Enemies, flying upon a Dromedary-Cammel, lodged him in that place, and therefore appointed the revenues of certain Villages to keep the Cammel there. There fell out at that time an Eclipse of the Moon, in the Moneth called Backromion (now August) about the time that the Feasts of the Mysteries was celebrated at ATHENS. The eleventh night after that, both the Armies being in fight each of other, Darius kept his men in Battle-ray, and went himself by Torch-light viewing his Bands and Companies. Alexander on the other fide whilest his MACEDONIAN Souldiers slept, was before his Tent with Aristander the Soothsayer, and made certain fecret Ceremonies and Sacrifices unto Apollo. The ancient Captains of the MACEDONIANS, specially Parmenio, seeing all the Valley betwirt the River of Niphates, and the Mountains of the GORDIEIANS, all on a bright light with the fires of the barbarous People, and hearing a dreadfull noise as of a confused multitude of People that filled their Camp with the found thereof: they were amazed, and confulted, that in one day it was in manner unpossible to fight a Battle with such an incredible multitude of People. Thereuponthey went unto Alexander after he had ended his Ceremonies, and did counsel him to give Battle by night, because the darkness thereof should help to keep all sear from his men, which the fight of their Enemies would bring The magnani- them into. But then he gave them this notable answer: I will not steal Victory, quoth he. This mity of Alex answer seemed very fond and arrogant to some, that he was so pleasant, being near so great danger. Howbeit others think that it was a present noble courage, and a deep consideration of him, to think what should happen: thereby to give Darius no manner of occasion (if he were overcome) to take heart again, and to prove another Battle, accusing the darkness of the night as caule of his Overthrow: as he had done at the first Conflict, imputing his overthrow to the Mountains, the Straights, and the Sea. For, faid he, Darius will never leave to make Wars with us for lack of men, nor Munition, having to large a Realm as he hath, and such a world of People besides: but then he will no more hazard Battle, when his heart is done, and all hope taken from him, and that he feeth his Army at noon daies overthrown by plain Battle. After his Captains were gone from him, he went into his Tent, and laied him down to sleep, and slept all that night more foundly then he was wont to do before: infomuch as the Lords and Princes of his Camp coming to wait upon him at his uprifing, marvelled when they found him fo fast asleep, and therefore of themselves they commanded the Souldiers to eat. Afterwards, perceiving that time came fast upon them, Parmenso went into Alexanders Chamber, and coming to his beds-fide called him twice or thrice by Name, till at the last he awaked him, and asked him how it chanced that he slept so long, like one that had already overcome, and that did not think he should fight as great and dangerous a Battle as ever he did in his life. Why, faid Alexander, laughing on him : doeft thou not think we have already overcome, being troubled no more with running after Daviss up and down a Countrey utterly destroyed, as we should otherwise have been compelled to have done, if he would not have come to Battle, and destroyed the Countrey beforeus? Now Alexander did not onely shew himfelt before the Battle, but even at the very instant of the Battle, a noble man of courage, and of great judgement. For Parmenio leading the left Wing of his Battle, the men of Armsof the Ba-CTRIANS gave such a sierce onset upon the MACEDONIANS, that they made them give back: and Mazem allo, King Darim Lieutenant, fent certain Troops of Horfemen out of their Battle, to with Darius. give charge upon them that were left in the Camp to guard the Carriage. When these News came to Alexander from Parmenio, he had already given the Signal of Battle unto his mentor to give Charge. Whereupon he answered the Meffenger that brought him these News, that he should tell Farmenso he was a mad man and out of his wits, not remembring that if they wan the Battle, they should not onely fave their own Carriage, but also win the Carriage of their Enemies : and if it were their chance to lofe it, then that they should not need to care for their Carriage, nor for their Staves, but onely to think to die honourably, valiantly fighting for his life. Having fent this Mel- The Armour of fage unto Parmenio, he put on his Helmet. His Head-piece was as bright as silver, made by Theophilus the Armourer: his Coller fuit-like to the fame, all fet full of precious Stones, and he had a Sword by his fide marvellous light, and of excellent temper, which the King of the CITIEIANS had given him, using commonly to fight with his Sword at any fet Battle. His Coat-armour was marvenous rich, and of sumptuous workmanship far above all the rest he wore. It was of the workmanship of Helicon, the which the RHODIAN'S gave him for a Prefent, and this he commonly wore when he went to Battle. Now when he did fet his men in Battle-ray, or made any Oration unto them, or did ride alongst the Bands to take view of them; he alwaies used to ride upon another Horse to spare Bucephal, because he was then somewhat old: notwithstanding, when he meant indeed to fight, then Bucephal was brought unto him, and as foon as he was gotten up on his back, the Trumpet founded, and he gave Charge. Then after he had made long Exhortations to encourage the men of Arms of the THESSALIANS and the other GRECIANS also, and when they had all promised him they would stick to him like men, and prayed him to lead them, and gave charge upon the Enemies: he took his Launce in his left hand. and holding up his right hand unto Heaven, belought the gods (as Callisthenes writeth) that if it were true he was begotten of Jupiter, that it would please them that day to help him, and to encourage the GRECIANS. The Soothfayer Ariffander was then on horfe-back hard by Alexander. apparelled all in white, and a Crown of Gold on his Head, who shewed Alexander when he made apparelled all in white, and a Crown of Gold on his fread, who mewed Attexander when he made his prayer, an Eagle flying over his head, and pointing directly towards his Enemies. This marvellously encouraged all the Army that saw it, and with this joy, the men of Arms of Alexanders ders head when fide, encouraging one another, did fet spurs to their Horse to charge upon the Enemies. The he went to Battle of the Footmen of the PERSIANS, began a little to give way, and before the foremost could fight with Dacome to give them charge, the barbarous People turned their backs, and fled. The chase was great: rias. Alexander driving them that fled upon the middest of their own Battle, where Darius self was in person, he spied him afar off over the foremost Ranks in the middest of his Battle, being a goodly tall Prince, standing in a Chariot of War, compassed in round with great Troops of Horsemen, all set in goodly ordinance to receive the Enemy. But when they saw Alexander at hand with fo grim a look, chasing them that fled, through those that yet kept their Ranks: there fell such a fear among them, that the most part dispersed themselves. Notwithstanding, the best and most valiantest men fought it out to the death before their King, and falling dead one upon another, they did let them, that the Enemies could not fo well follow Darius. For they lying one by another on the ground, drawing on to the last gasp, did yet take both men and Horses by the legs to hinder them. Darius then feeing nothing but terrour and destruction before his eyes, and that the Bands which he had fet before him for fafeguard, came back upon him, fo as he could not devise how to turn his Chariot forward nor backward, the Wheels were so hindred and staved with the heaps of dead Bodies, and that the Horse also being set upon and hid in manner in this Conflict, fell to leaping and plunging for fear, so that the Charriottiers could no longer guide nor drive them : he got up upon a Marethat lately had a Foal, and fo faved himself flying upon The flying of her. And yet had he not thus escaped, had not Parmenio once again sent unto Alexander to pray Darius. him to come and aid him: because there was yet a great Squadron whole together that made no countenance to fly. Somewhat there was in it, that they accused Parmenio that day to have dealt but flackly and cowardly, either because his age had taken his courage from him, or else for that he envyed Alexanders greatness and prosperity, who against his will became over great, as Callifthenes faid. In fine, Alexander was angry with the second Message, and yet told not his men truly the cause why, but faining that he would have them leave killing, and because also night came on: he caused the Trumpet found retreat, and so went towards his Army, whom he thought to be in diffres. Notwithstanding, News came to him by the way, that in that Alexanders place also, they had given the Enemies the Overthrow, and that they fled every way for life, third Victory The Battle having this fuccels, every man thought that the Kingdome of the Persians was of Darius, and unterly overthrown, and that Alexander likewife was become onely King of all Asia. where-upon he made fumpuous Sacrifices unto the gods, and gave great riches, Houses, Lands and Possessions unto his Friends and Familiars. Furthermore, to shew his liberality also unto the GRECIANS, he wrote unto them, that he would have all Tyrannies suppressed throughout all GREECE, and that all the GRECIANS should live at liberty under their own Laws. Particularly also he wrote unto the PLAT EIANS, that he would re-edifie their City again, because their Predecessours in time past, had given their Countrey unto the GRECIANS, to fight against the

The barbarous People of that Countrey, being desirous to shew Alexander the nature of that Naptha, featured the Street that led to his lodging, with some of it. Then the day being shut in, they fired it at one of the ends, and the first drops taking fire, in the twinckling of an eye, all the rest from one end of the Street to the other was of a flame, and though it was dark and within night, lightned all the place thereabout. Alexander being in Bath at that time, and waited upon by a Page called Steven: (a hard favoured Boy, but yet that had an excellent fweet Voice to Sing) one Athenophanes an ATHENIAN, that alwaies nointed and bathed the King, and much delighted him with his pleafant conceits, asked him if he would feethe trial of this Naptha upon Steven: for if the fire took and went not out, then he would fay it had a wonderfull force, and was unquenchable. The Page was contented to have it proved upon him. But foon as they had laid it on him, and did but touch it onely, it took straight of such a slame, and so fired his body, that Alexander himself was in a marvellous perplexity withall. And fure had it not been by good hap, that there were many by, ready with Veffels full of Water to put into the Bath, it had been unpossible to have faved the Boy from being burnt to nothing; and yet so he scaped narrowly, and besides was sick long after. There was then great slaughter made in Persia of the Prisoners that were taken. For Alexander himself writeth, that he commanded the men should be put to the Sword, thinking that the best way to serve his turn. It is said also, that there he found a marvelvenous results lous Treature of Gold and Silver in ready Money, as he had done before in the City of Susa: the fure in Perfix lous Treature of Gold and Silver in ready Money, as he had done before in the City of Susa: the which he carried away with all the rest of the Kings rich Ward-robe, and with it loaded ten thoufand Mules, and five thousand Camels. Alexander entring into the Castle of the chief City of PERSIA, faw by chance a great image of Xerxes lie on the ground, the which unawares was thrown down by the multitude of the Souldiers that came in thronging one upon another. Thereupon he stayed, and spake unto it as if it had been alive; saying: I cannot tell whether I should pass by thee, and let thee lie, for the War thou madest sometime against the GRE-CIANS: or whether I should lift thee up, respecting the noble mind and Vertues thou haddeft. In the end, when he had stood mute a long time, confidering of it, he went his way: and meaning to refresh his weary Army, because it was the winter quarter, he remained there four Moneths together. The report goeth that the first time that Alexander fate under the Cloath of State of King Darius, all of rich Gold : Demarathus Corinthian (who first beganto love him, even in his Father Philips time) burst out in tears for joy (good old man) faying, that the GRECIANS long time dead before, were deprived of this bleffed hap, to fee Alexander fit in King Xerxes princely Chair. After that, preparing again to go against Darius, he would needs make merry one day, and refresh himself with some banquer. It chanced so, that he with his Companions was bidden to a private Feast privately, where was affembled some fine Curtizans of his Familiars, who with their Friends tarried at the Banquet. Amongst them was that famous Thais, born in the Countrey of ATTICA, and then The infolent Concubine to Ptolomy, King of EGYPT after Alexanders death. She finely praised Alexander, and boldness of partly in forting wife, began to utter matter in affection of her Countrey, but yet of greater impor- Thair the Hattance the became her mouth: faying, that that day she found her felf fully recompenced to her lor. great good liking, for all the pains she had taken, travelling through all the Countreys of ASIA, following of his Army, now that the had this favour and good hap to be merry and pleasant, in the proud and Stately Pallace of the great Kings of PERSIA. But yet it would do her more good for a recreation to burn Xerzes Houle with the fire of joy, who had burnt the City of ATHENS: and her felf to give the fire to it, before so noble a Prince as Alexander. Because ever after it might be said, that the Woman following his Camp had taken more noble revenge of the Persians, for the wrongs and injuries they had done unto GREECE: then all the Captains of GREECE that ever were had done, either by Land or Sea. When the had faid, Alexanders familiars about him, clapped their hands and made great noise for joy, faying: that it were as good a deed as could be possible, and perswaded Alexander unto it. Alexander yielding to their perswasions, rose up, and putting a Garland of Flowers upon his head, went foremost himself: and all his Familiars followed after him, crying and dancing all about the Castle. The other MACEDONIANS hearing of it also, came thither immedi- Perspotis set a ately with Torches light and great joy, hoping that it was a good fign that Alexander meant to re-fire buttern again into MACEDON, and not to dwell in the Congrey of the barbarous People, fith he did ander. burn and destroy the Kings Castle. Thus, and in this fort it was thought to be burnt. Some Writers think otherwise: that it was not burnt with such sport, but by determination of the Council. But howfoever it was, they all grant, that Alexander did prefently repent him, and commanded the fire to be quenched straight. For his liberality, that good will and readiness to give, increased with his Conquests: and when he did bestow Gifts of any, he would besides his Gift, ever give them good countenance, on whom he bestowed his grace and favour. And here I will recite a few examples thereof. Arifto being Colonel of the PEONIANS, having flain one of his Enemies, he brought him his Head, and faid : fuch a Prefent, O King, by us, is ever rewarded with a Cup of Gold. Yea, quoth Alexander, fmiling upon him with an empty Cup. But I drink to thee this Cup full of good Wine. and do give thee Cup and all. Another time, he met with a poor MACEDONIAN that led a Mule loaden with Gold of the Kings: and when the poor Mule was fo weary that the could no longer carry her burden, the Muletter put it upon his own back, and loaded himself withall carrying it so a good pretty way : howbeit in the end being over-loaden, was about to throw it down on the ground. Alexander perceiving it, asked him what burden he carried. When it was told him : well, quoth he to the Muletter, be not weary yet but carry it into the Tent, for I give it thee. To be short, he was angrier with them that would take nothing of him, then he was with those that would ask him somewhat. He wrote also unto Phocion, that he would take him no more for his Friend, if he would refuse his Gifts. It feemed that he had given nothing unto a young Boy called Serapion (who ever did ferve them the Ball that plaid at Tennis) because he asked him nothing. Where ore the King playing on a time, this young Boy, threw the Ball to others that played with him, and not to himself. The King marvelling at it, at the length faid unto him: Why, my Boy, doft thou not give me the Ball ? Because your Majefty doth not ask it me, quoth he. Alexander then understanding his meaning, laughed at the Boy, and did much for him afterwards. There was attending on him also one Protest, a pleafant conceited man, and that could jest finely. It chanced upon some occasion that Alexander fell our with him : whereupon fome of his friends were interceffors unto the King for him, and befought him to pardon him : and Protess himself also being present, craved pardon with tears in his eyes. Alexander thereupon forgave him. Then prefently replied Proteas, I defire it may please your Grace, that I may receive some Testimony to assure me I am in your favour. Thereupon the King straight commanded one to give him five Talents. The goods and riches he gave unto his Familiars and Guard about him, were very great, as it appeared plainly by a Letter which his Mother Olympiae wrote unto him, to this effect : I know thou sparest not to give thy Friends large Gifts, and that thou makest much of them: but thereby thou makest them Kings fellows, they get many Friends, and leave three post alone without any. His motherdid many times write such like matters unto him the which Alexander kept very fecret, faving one day when he opened one of them, Hephaltion being present drew near, and read the Letter with him, as he was wont to do. Alexander did let protigative re-him alone, but when he had read it, he pluckt the Seal of Arms from his finger, wherewith hedid proved by mis Mother Olym- use to Seal his Letters, and put it to Hephaftions mouth. He gave also unto the Son. of Mazeus (that was the chiefest man about Darisss) a second Government, besides that which he had before, and greater then the first. This young Noble-man refused it, saying: why, and it please your Grate, before there was but one Darine, but you now make many Alexanders. He gave unto Parmento alfo, Bagon House, where (as it is reported) he found a thousand Talents worth of the Spoils and goods of the Susians. He wrote allo unto Antipater, that he should keep a Guard about his person, for he had many Enemies that lay in wait for him. He did fend also many goodly Presents unto his Mother, but withall he wrote unto ber, that she would meddle no more with his Matters or Gifts, raking upon her the Office of a Captain. She storming at it, he patiently did brook her anger. Antipater another time, writing a long Letter unto him against his Mother Olympias: when he had read it over, Lo, faid he, Antipater knoweth not, that one tear of the Mothers eye will wipe out ten thousand such Letters. Furthermore Alexander perceiving on a time, that his friends became very dissolute and licentious in Diet and Life, and that Agnon TEIAN had his corked Shooes nailed with Silver Nails, that Leonaus also caused divers Camels to be loaden amongst his carriage with Powder of EGVPT, to put upon him when he wrestled or used any other exercise of body, and that also they carried after Philorus, Toiles for chale and hunting, of an hundred furlong long, and that there were also that used precious Perfumes and sweet Savours when they bathed themselves, more then there were that rubbed themselves with plain Oyl, and that they had fine Chamberlains to rub them in the Bath, and to make their Beds foft and delicate: he wifely and courteoufly rebuked them and faid: I marvel, faid he, that you which have fought in so often and great Battles, do not remember that they which travel, do ilcep more sweet and foundly, then they that take their ease and do nothing: and that you do not mark, that comparing your Life, with the manner of the Life of the Persi-Alexander reanchers and curiofity of his ANS, to live at pleafure is a vilething and to travel is princely. And how I pray you, can a man take pains to drefs his own Horfe, or to make clean his Launce or Helmet, that for flothfull curiostities sake, distaineth to rub his own Body with his singers? Are you ignorant that the tipe of Honour in all our Victory confifteth, in scorning to do that which we see them do, whom we have vanquished and overcome? To bring them therefore by his example, to acquaint themselves with hardnels: he took more pains in Wars and in hunting, and did hazard himself more dangerously, then ever he had done before. Whereupon an Ambassador of LACEDEMON being present to see him fight with a Lion, and to kill him, faid unto him: truly your Grace hath fought well with this Alexander an Lion, and tried which of you two should be King. Craterus after that, caused this hunting to be set Enemy unto up in the Temple of Apollo in DELPHOS: where are the Images of the Lion, of the Dogs, and of the King fighting with the Lion, and of himself also that came to help him, all those Images being of Copper, some made by Lypppus, the rest by Leochares. Thus Alexander did put himfelf unto all jeopardies, as well to exercise his strength and courage, as also to allure his men to do the like. This notwithstanding his friends and familiars having Wealth at will, as men exceeding rich, they would needs live delicately at eafe, and would take no more pains, mishking utterly to go up and down the Countries to make War here and there, and thereupon began a little to find fault with Alexander and to speakevil of him. Which at the first Alexander took quietly, saying, that it was Honour for a King to fuffer himself to be slandered and ill spoken of, for doing of good. And yet the least good turns he did unto his friends, did shew his hearty love and honour he bare them, as shall appear unto you by some examples that follow. Pencessas being bitten by a Beare, did let his friends understand by Letters, but he wrote nothing thereof unto Alexander. Alexander was offended therewith, and wrote unto him thus: Send me word at the least yet how thou doest, and whether any of thy fellows did for take thee at the hunting, to the end they may be punished. Hephastian being absent about certain businels he had, Alexander wrote unto him, that as they were hunting a Beaft called Ichnewmon, Craterus, unfortunately crofting Perdice as Dart, was stricken through both his thighs. Peacestas being cured of a great disease, Alexander wrote uno Alexippus his Phistian that had cured him, and gave him thanks. Craterus also being Friends, and fick, he dreamed of him one night, and therefore made certain Sacrifices for the recovery of wonderfull his health, and fent unto him, willing him to do the like. And when the Phistian Pausanias courtelic tomeant to give him a drink of Eleborus, he wrote Letters unto him, telling him what danger he wards them. was in, and prayed him to be carefull how he received that Medicine. He did also put Ephialtes and Ciffus in prilon, who brought him the first news of Harpalus flying, because they did wrongfully accuse and slander him. When he communanded there should be a Bill made of all the Old mens Names, and difeafed persons that were in his Camp, to send them home again into their Country: there was one Eurylochus EGELAN, that made his Name be billed among the fick persons, and it was found afterwards that he was not fick; and confessed that he did it onely to follow a young Woman called Telestopa, with whom he was in love, who was returning home towards the Sea fide, Alexander asked him, whether this Woman were free or bond : he auswered him, that the was a Curtizan free born. Then faid Alexander unto Eurylochus, I would be glad to further thy love, yet I cannot force her to tarry : but feek to win her by Gifts and fair words to be contented to tarry, fithence she is a free Woman. It is a wonderfull thing to fee what pains he would take, to write for his Friends, even in such trifles as bedid. As when he

As Alexander went through the Countrey, certain barbarous People suddenly set upon them that led Bacephat his Horse, and took him: but, with that he was in such a rage, that he fent a Heraeld into their Countries to proclaim open Wars upon them, and that he would put Man, Woften, and Child to the Sword, if they brought him not his Horfe again. Whereupon, when his Horse was returned home, and that they yielded up their Cities and Ports into his hands, he did use them all very courrecully, and moreover did give them Money for the ranfom of his Horfe, which they reftored. Departing thence, he entred into the Countrey of PARTHTA. There having leafure enough, he began to apparel himself after the fashion of the batbarous People, because he thought thereby the better to win the hearts of the Countreymen, framing hillifell unto their own fathions: eth after the or else to try the hearts of the MACEDS NIAMS, to see how they would like the manner of the manner of the PRESTANS (which he means to bring them unto) in reverenting of him as they did their King, Persant.

For, writing all things particularly unto Antiques as they happened unto him, he wrote unto him that the King of SCYTHIA offered him his Danghier in marriage: but there he maketh no mention at all of any AMAZON It is also faid, that Quefferium long time after that did read unto King Lyfimachus, the fourth Book of his History, where he did forak of the AMAZON. Lyfimachus, fmiling, faid unto him: Why, and where was then? But for that matter, to credit it, or not to credit it, Alexanders estimation thereby is neither impaired for advanced. Furthermore, Alexander fearing that the Macedonians, being weary with this long War, would go no further, he left all the reft of his Army behind, and took onely sweny thoufand Footmen, and three thousand Horsemen of the cholsest men of his Army, and with them invaded the Countrey of Hyrcania, There he made an Oration unto them, and rold them, that the barbarous People of Asia had busteen them as it were in a Dream; and if they flowed now return back into Macedon, having but onely flurred them, and not altogether flubdund Asia, the People oftended with them, would fet upon them as they went home, as if they were no better then Women. Neverthelels, he gave any man leave to return that would, protesting, therewith against them that would go, how they did for fake him, his friends, and those who had so good hearts towards him, as to follow him in so noble a Journey, to conquer the whole earth unto the Alexander with MACEDONIANS. This felf matter is reported thus in a Letter which Alexander wrote unto Anone word of his ripater: and there he writeth furthermore, that having made this Oration unto them, they all cryed mouth brought out, and bade him lead them into what part of the World he would. When they had granted the Macdonia their good wills, it was no hard matter afterwards, to win the reft of the common fort, who followed the example of the chiefest. Thereupon he did frame himself the more to live after the fashion of the Countrey there, and enterchangeably also to bring the men, of that Countrey unto the manner of the MACEDONIANS: being periwaded that by this mixture and enterchange of manners one with another, he should by friendship more then force, make them agree lovingly together, when that he should be so far from the Country, of Persia. For this purpose therefore, gether, when that he should be so far from the Country, of Persia. For this purpose therefore, be chose thirty shouland of their Children of that Country, and set them to learn the Greek Tongue, and to be brought up in the Discipline of Wars after the Macadon NIAN's manner: and gave them School-mafters and Captains to train them in each faculty. And for the marrying of Rexane, he fancied her, fering her at a Feaft where he was : which fell out as well for his turn, as if he had with better advice and counsel loved her. For the barbarous People were very proud of this match, when as they faw him make alliance with them in this fort, infomuch as they loved him better then they did before, because they saw in those things he was alwaies so chaste and continent, that notwithftanding he was marvellously in love with her, yet he would not dishonourably touch this young Lady, before he was married unto her. Furthermore, Alexander confidering that of the two men which he loved beft, Hephaftion liked well of this match, and went apparelled as himfelf did, and that Craterin contrality did fill ule the MA CEDO NIANS manner, he dealt in all Affairs with the barbarous People, by Hephaftion; and with the GRECIANS and MACEDÓNIANS, by Craterus, To be frort he loved the one, and honoured the other: faying that Hepheltion, loved Alexander, and Craterus loved the King. Hereupon these two persons did bear one another grudge in their hearts, and twirt Hepheli- oftentimes brake out in open quarrel: infomuch as on a time being in INDIA, they drew their Swords, on and Grass- and fought together, and divers of their friends ran to take part with either fide. Thither, came Alexanders felf also, who openly before them all, bitterly took up Hephastion, and called him fool and bedlam, faying, doeft thou not know, that who over he be that should take Alexander from me, the should never live? Privately also, he sharply rebuked Craterus, and calling them both before him, he made them friends together, (wearing by Jupiter Hammon, and by all the other gods, that he loved them two of all men living; nevertheless if ever he found that they fell out together again, they should both die for it, or he at the least that first began to quarrell. So ever after that, they say, there was never foul word nor deed between them, not so much as in sport onely. There was also one Philoral, the Son of Permenia, a man of great Authority among the MACEDONIANS, who next unto Alexander was the most valiant man, the patientest to abide pain, the liberallest, and one that loved hismen and friends better then any Noble-man in the Camp whatfoever. Of him it is reported, that a friend of his came to him on a time to borrow Money : and he commanded straight one of his men to let him have it; His Purse-bearer answered him, that he had none. Why, iad his Master, doest thou tell me for Hast thou not Plate, and Apparel to sell or gage or help him to some? Howbeit otherwise, he had such pride and glory to shew his riches, to Apparel himfelf to fumptuoully, and to be more fine and princked then became a private man, that this made Why Philotas him to be hated: because he took upon him to be a great man, and to look big on the matter, was suspected which became him so ill favouredly, and therefore every man through his own folly, sell in milliking and envied of with him. Infomuch as his own Father faid one day unto him: Son, I pray thee be more humble. and lowly. This Philotas had long before been complained upon unto Alexander because that when the Carriage of King Darius Army (which was in the City of DAMAS) was taken after the Battle of Cilicia, among many Priloners that were taken and brought unto Alexanders Camp, there was one Antigona, a passing fair young Curtizan, born in the City of PIDNA. Philotas found means to get her, and like a young man that was in love with her, making merry with her at the Table, fondly let fall brave words and boafts of a Souldier, faying, that what notable things were done, they weredone by himfelf and his Father : and called Alexander at every word, young man, and faid, that by their means he held his Name and Kingdom. This Curtizan told one of her friends what he faid, and that friend told another friend, and so it went from man to man (as commonly it doth) till at the length it came to Crater we cars. He took the Curtizan, and brought her unto Alexander, unto whom the told as much as the had faid before. Alexander bad her still make much of Philoras, and to tell him every word what he faid of him. Philoras knowing nothing that he was thus circumvented, did ever frequent her company, and would be bold commonly to fpeak many foolish and undiscreet words against the King, sometime in anger, and sometime again in a bravery. Alexander this notwithstanding, though he had manifest proof and cause to accuse Philotai, yethe diffembledit for that time, and would not be known of it: either for that he knew Permenio loved him, or elle for that he was afraid of their great Power and Authority. About that time menu to the chere was one Limnus (halastrian a MACEDO NIAN, that laid great and secret wait to kill Alex- Limnus traiteander: and being in love with a young man called Nicomachus, inticed him to help him to do this routly feeketh deed. The young man wifely denied it, and told the fame to his Brother called Balinus. He went to kill Alexandered. unto Philotas, and prayed him to bring them both before Alexander, for they had a matter of great der. importance to impart unto him. Philotas would not let him speak with the King (but why no man could tell) telling them, that the King had greater matters in hand, and was not at leafure. Then they went unto another, and he brought them unto Alexander, unto whom they first opened the Treason of Limnus conspired against him: and by the way they told also, how they had been twice before with Philotas, who would not let them come in, nor speak with him. That angred Alexander greatly, and he was the more offended also when Limnus was slain by him, whom he sent to apprehend him, refilting him for that he would not be taken: and thought that by his death, he had loft a great means to come to the light of this Treason and conspiracy. Then Alexander frowning upon Philotas, brought all his Enemies upon his back, that of long time had hated him. For they began to fpeak boldly, that it was time for the King to look about him, for it was not to be supposed that this Linnus Chalastrian of himself durst have entred into that Treason, but rather that he was a Minister, and a chief Instrument, set on by a greater Personage then he : and therefore that it stood Alexander upon to examine them straightly which had cause to keep this Treason secret. After Alexander once gave ear unto such words and vehement presumptions, there was straight brought a thousand Accusations against Philotas. Thereupon he was apprehended, and in the presence of divers Lords and Familiars of the King put to the torture, Alexanders felt hanging behind, to hear what he would fay. It is reported, that when he heard how faintly and pitifully he befought Hephestion to take pity upon him, he said unto himself: Alas, poor Philosas, thou that had so faint a heart, how durft thou take upon thee so great matters? In fine Philos as was put Philos and nau to tame a meat, now after he was executed, Alexander fent also with speed unto the Realm his kather to death, and immediately after he was executed, Alexander fent also with speed to the had formed View Parmento put of Media to kill Permeno, who was his Lieutenant there, and one that had ferved King to death. Philip his Father, in his greatest Affairs; and he onely of all other the old Servants of his Father had procured Alexander to take in hand the conquest of Asia: and who also of three Sons which he brought out with him, had feen two of them before him, and afterwards was flain himself with the third. This cruelty of Alexander made his friends afraid of him, and specially Antipater : who fecretly fent Ambassadours unto the A TOLIANS to make League with them, Antipater was because they themselves also were affraid of Alexander, for that they had put the Oeniades as sided Alexander to death. Alexander hearing that faid, that he himself, and not the Sons of the Oeniades, would be revenged on the ETOLIANS. Not long after that, followed the murther of Clius, the which to hear it simply told, would feen much more cruel then the death of Philatas. But reporting the cause and the time together in which it chanced, it will be found that it was not of fet purpose, but by chance and unfortunately, that Alexander being overcome with Wine, did unluckily wreak his anger upon Clius. The manner of his misfortune was this. There came certain men of the low Countries from the Sea fide, that brought Apples of Why Alexan-GREECE unto Alexander. Alexander wondering to fee them fo green and fair, fent for Clinas to der flew Clinas thew him them, and to give him fome of them. Clitus by chance did Sacrifice at that time unto the gods, and left his Sacrifice to go unto Alexander: howbeit, there were three Weathers that followed him, on whom the accustomed sprinklings had been done already to have sacrificed them. Alexander understanding that, told it to his Soothlayers, Aristander, and Cleomanu La-CONIAN, both did answer him, that it was an ill fign. Alexander thereupon gave order straight, that they should do facrifice for the health of Clisus, and specially for that three days before he dreamed one night that he saw Clism in a mourning Gown, fitting amongst the Sons of Pargreamed one night that it was a left. This notwithflanding, Clius did not make an end of menio, the which were all dead before. This notwithflanding, Clius did not make an end of his Sacrifice, but came straight to Supper to the King, who had that day sacrificed unto Castor and Pollux. At this Feaft there was old drinking, and all the Supper time there were certain Verses fung and made by a Poet, called Pranichus (or as others fay, of one Pierion) against certain Captains of the Macedonians, which had not long before been overcome by the barbarous People; and onely to shame them, and to make the company laugh. With these Verses, ancient men that were at this Feast, became much offended, and grew angry with the Poet that made them, and the Minstrell that sung them. Alexander on the other side, and his familiars, liked them very well and commanded the Minftrell to fing ftill. (litts therewithall being overtaken with Wine, and besides of a churlish nature, proud and arrogant, sell into greater choler, and said: that it was neither well nor honeftly done in that fort to speak ill of those poor MACEDONIAN Captains (and specially amongst the barbarous People their Enemies) which were far better men then they that laughed them to fcorn, although their fortune were worfe then theirs. Alexander then replied, and faid, that faying fo, he pleaded for himself, calling cowardlines, misfortune. Then Clius standing up, said again: But yet this my cowardliness saved thy life, that callest thy self the Son of the gods, when thou turnedft thy back from Spirbridates Sword: and the blood which thele poor MACEDONIANS did fled for thee, and the wounds which they received on their bodies fighting for thee, have made thee fo great, that thou difdainest now to have King Philip for thy Father, and wilt needs make thy self the Son of Jupiter Hammon. Alexander being moved with these words, straight replied : O, Villain, thinkest thou to scape unpunished for these proud words of thine, which thou useft continually against me, making the MACEDONIANS to rebel against me? Clittu answered again, Too much are we punished, Alexander, for our pains and fervice to receive fuch reward : nay, most happy think we them that long fince are dead and gone, not now to fee the MACEDONIANS fcourged with Rodsof the MEDES, and compelled to curry favour with the PERSIANS, to have access unto their King. Thus Cliem boldly speaking against Alexander, and Alexander again answering and reviling him, the gravest men sought to pacifie this fir and tunult. Alexander then turning himfelfunto Xenodochus Cardin, and Artemius Colo-PHONIAN: Do you not think (faid he) that the GRECIANS are amongst the MACEDONI-ANS, as demy-gods that walk among bruit Beafts? Clitte for all this would not give over his impudency and malapertness, but cryed out, and bad Alexander speak openly what he had to say, or else not to bid Free-men to come to sup with him that were wont to speak franckly: if not, to keep with the barbarous Slaves that honoured his PERSIAN Girdle, and long white Garment. Then could Alexander no longer hold his choler, but took an Apple that was upon his Table, and threw it at Clius, and looked for his Sword, the which Ariftophanes, one of his Guard that waited on him, had of purpose taken from him. And when every man came straight about him to stay him, and to pray him to be contented, he immediately role from the Board, and called his Guard unto him in the Ma-CEDONIAN Tongue (which was a fign of great trouble to follow after it) and commanded a Trumpeter to found the Allarm. But he drawing back, would not found: whereupon Alexander ftrake him with his fift. Notwithstanding, the Trumpeter was greatly commended afterwards, for that he onely kept the Camp that they role not. All this could not quiet Clieus, whereupon his friends with much a doe thrust him out of the Hall: but he came in again at another door, and arrogantly and unreverently rehearfed this Verfe of the Poet Euripides, Out of Andromaches Tragedy:

Alas for forrow evil ways Are into Greece crept now adays.

Clitus, and grievoully repented him.

Then Alexander taking a Partifan from one of his Guard, as Clitus was coming towards him, and had lift up the hanging before the door, he ran him through the body, so that Citus fell to the ground, and fetching one groan, died prefently. Alexanders choler had left him straight, and he became narvellous forrowfull: and when he faw his friends round about him fay nevera word, he pluckt the Partifan out of his body, and would have thrust it into his own throat. Howbeit his Guard about him caught him by the hands, and carried him perforce into his Chamber : and there he did nothing all that night but weep bitterly, and the next day following, untill fuch time as he was able to cry no more, but lying on the ground, only lay fighing. His friends hearing his Voice no more, were afraid, and came into his Chamber by force to comfort him. But Alexander would hear none of them, faving Ariftander the Soothfayer, who remembred him of his Dream he had of Clisus before, which was a Prognostication of that which had happened: whereby it appeared that it was his defliny, before he was born. This feemed to comfort Alexander: Afterwards they brought in Callistbener the Philosopher, a Kinsman of Aristotles, and Anaxarchus born in ABDERA. Of these two Callifthenes fought by gentle talk, not moving any matter offenfive, to comfort Alexanders forcour docom-fort Alexander. row. But Anaxarchus that from the beginning had taken a way by himself in the study of Philosophy, being accounted a brain-fick man, and one that despised his Companions, he coming into Alexanders Chamber also with him, cryed out at the door as he came in : See, yonder is Alexander the Great whom all the World looks upon, and is afraid of: fee where he lies, weeping like a Slave on the ground, that is afraid of the Law, and of the reproach of men : as if he himfelf should not give them Law, and stablish the bounds of justice or injustice, sithence he hath overcome to be Lord and Master, and not to be subject and slave to a vain opinion. Knowest thou not that the Poets say, that Jupiter hath Themis, to wit, right and justice placed on either hand of him? what fignifieth that, but all that the Prince doth, is holy, right and just? These words of Anaxarchus did comfort the forrowfull heart of King Alexander at that time, but therewithall, they made Alexanders manners afterwards more fierce and dissolute. For, as he thereby did marvellously grow in favour with the King, even so did he make the company of Callifthenes (who of himself was not very pleasant, because of his gravity and fowernels) much more hatefull and milliked then before. It is written also that there was certain talk one night at King Alexanders Board touching the leafons of the year, and temperateness of the Ayr, and that Callisthenes was of their opinion which maintained, that the Countrey they were in at that time was much colder, and the Winter also sharper then in GREECE. Anaxarchus held the contrary opinion, and stifly maintained it, infomuch as Callishenes said unto him: And yet must thou grant, that it is colder here then there. For there all the Winter time thou couldst go with a fingle Cloak on thy back onely, and here thou must have three or four Garments upon thee when thou art at thy Board, This galled Anaxarchus to the quick, and made him more angry then before : and for the other Rhetoricians and Flatterers, they did also hate him, because they saw him followed of young men for his Eloquence, and beloved also of old men for his honest life, the which was very grave, modest, and contented with his own, desiring no mans else. Whereby men found, that the reason he alledged for following of Alexander in his Voyage, was true: for he faid, that he came to be an humble fuiter to the King to restore his banished Citizens into their Countrey again, and to replenish their City with Inhabitants. Now, though his estimation made him chiesly to be envied, yet did he himself give The cause why his Enemies occasion to accuse him. For often times being invited by the King to Supper, either he Calliplones would not come, or if he came, he would be mute, and fay nothing, shewing by his gravity and si- was envied. lence, that nothing pleafed him that was either faid or done. Whereupon Alexander felf faid on a

Callifthenes

I cannot think that person wife. That in his own cause hath no eyes.

It is reported of him also, that being at Supper on a time with the King, divers requesting him to make an Oration on the fudden in commendation of the MACEDONIANS, he made fuch an Eloquent Oration upon that matter, that all they that heard him, rose from the Board, and clapping their hands for joy, cast Nosegayes and Flowers upon him. But yet Alexander at that time said unto him that which the Poet Euripides faid :

> It is no mastery to be Eloquent, In handling of a plenteous argument.

Nay, but utter then thy Eloquence in reproving of the MACEDONIANS, that hearing their faults, they may learn to amend. Then Callistenes changing Copy, spake boldly many things against the MACEDONIANS, declaring, that the diffention amongst the GRECIANS did increase King Philips power, alledging these Verses.

> Where discord reigns in Realm or Town, Even wicked folk do win renown.

But by this occasion, he purchased himself great ill will of the MACEDONIANS: insomuch, as Alexanders felf faid at that time, that he had not fo much shewed his Eloquence, as the malice he bare unto the MACEDONIANS. Hermippu the Historiographer writeth, that one Strabus 2 Cleark of Callisthenes, did afterwards tell it unto Aristotle in this fort : and that Callisthenes feeing King Alexander offended with him, did recite these Verses of Homer three or four times as he > Patroclus who far passed thee, Was flain, as thou art like to be.

And therefore very wisely said Aristotle, that Callistones was Eloquent, but not wise. For like a Aristotle Philosopher, he fourly flood against kneeling to the King, and faid that openly, which the No. thought Callifblest and the ancientest men among the MACEDONIANS durft but whisper one in anothers ear, thenes Elothough they did all urrerly millike it : whereby he did yet deliver GREECE from a great shame, and quent, but not wife.

Cliens therewithall being overraken with Wine, and besides of a churlish nature, proud and arrogant, fell into greater choler, and faid: that it was neither well nor honeftly done in that fort to fpeak ill of those poor MACEDONIAN Captains (and specially amongst the barbarous People their Enemies) which were far better men then they that laughed them to fcorn, although their fortune were worfethen theirs. Alexander then replied, and faid, that faying so, he pleaded for himself, calling cowardlines, misfortune. Then Clins standing up, said again: But yet this my cowardliness saved thy life, that callest thy self the Son of the gods, when thou turnedit thy back from Spirbridates Sword: and the blood which thefe poor MACEDONIANS did shed for thee, and the wounds which they received on their bodies fighting for thee, have made thee fo great, that thou disdainest now to have King Philip for thy Father, and wilt needs make thy felf the Son of Jupiter Hammon. Alexander being moved with these words, straight replied : O, Villain, thinkest thou to scape unpunished for these proud words of thine, which thou useft continually against me, making the MACEDONIANS to rebel against me? Clitus answered again, Too much are we punished, Alexander, for our pains and fervice to receive such reward : nay, most happy think we them that long since are dead and gone, not now to fee the MACEDONIANS foourged with Rods of the MEDES, and compelled to curry fawour with the Persians, to have access unto their King. Thus Client boldly speaking against Alexander, and Alexander again answering and reviling him, the gravest men sought to pacifie this fir and runnult. Alexander then turning himfelfunto Xenodochus Cardin, and Artemius Colo-PHONIAN: Do you not think (faid he) that the GRECIANS are amongst the MACEDONI-ANS, as demy-gods that walk among bruit Beafts? Clittu for all this would not give over his impudency and malapertness, but cryed out, and bad Alexander speak openly what he had to say, or else not to bid Free-men to come to sup with him that were wont to speak franckly: if not, to keep with the barbarous Slaves that honoured his PERSIAN Girdle, and long white Garment. Then could Alexander no longer hold his choler, but took an Apple that was upon his Table, and threw it at Clins, and looked for his Sword, the which Ariftophanes, one of his Guard that waited on him, had of purpose taken from him. And when every man came straight about him to stay him, and to pray him to be contented, he immediately role from the Board, and called his Guard unto him in the Ma-CEDONIAN Tongue (which was a fign of great trouble to follow after it) and commanded a Trumpeter to found the Allarm. But he drawing back, would not found : whereupon Alexander strake him with his fift. Notwithstanding, the Trumpeter was greatly commended afterwards, for that he onely kept the Camp that they role not. All this could not quiet Client, whereupon his friends with much a doe thrust him out of the Hall: but he came in again at another door, and arrogantly and unreverently rehearled this Verse of the Poet Euripides, out of Andromaches Tragedy:

Alas for forrow evil ways Are into Greece crept now adays.

Alexander flew Clisus, and grievoully repented him.

Then Alexander taking a Partifian from one of his Guard, as Clisus was coming towards him, and had lift up the hanging before the door, he ran him through the body, fo that Clisus fell to the ground, and fetching one groan, died prefently. Alexanders choler had left him ftraight, and he became narvellous forrowfull: and when he faw his friends round about him fay never a word, he pluckt the Partifian out of his body, and would have thrust it into his own throat. Howbeit his Guard about him caught him by the hands, and carried him perforce into his Chamber: and there he did nothing all that night but weep bitterly, and the next day following, untill fuch time as he was able to cry no more, but lying on the ground, only lay fighing. His friends hearing his Voice no more, were afraid, and came into his Chamber by force to comfort him. But Alexander would hear none of them, saving Arishander the Soothiayer, who remembred him of his Dream he had of Clisus before, which was a Prognofication of that which had happened: whereby it appeared that it was before, which was a Prognofication of that which had happened: hereby it appeared that it was before, which was a Prognofication of that which had happened: hereby it appeared that it was before, which was a Risingan of Arisolets, and Anaxarchus born in Abdera. whom all the World looks upon, and is afraid of: fee where he lies, weeping like a Slave on the ground, that is afraid of the Law, and of the reproach of men : as if he himfelf should not give them Law, and stablish the bounds of justice or injustice, sithence he hath overcome to be Lord and Master, and not to be subject and slave to a vain opinion. Knowest thou not that the Poets say, that Jupiter hath Themis, to wit, right and justice placed on either hand of him? what fignifieth that, but all that the Prince doth, is holy, right and just? These words of Anaxarchus did comfort the forrowfull heart of King Alexander at that time, but therewithall, they made Alexanders manners afterwards more fierce and diffolute. For, as he thereby did marvelloufly grow in favour with the King, even fo did he make the company of Callisthenes (who of himself was not very pleasant, because of his gravity and sowernels) much more hatefull and misliked then before. It is written also that there was certain talk one night at King Alexanders Board touching the feafons of the year, and temperateness of the Ayr, and that Callisthenes was of their opinion which maintained, that the Countrey they were in at that time was much colder, and the Winter also sharper then in GREECE. Anawarchus held the contrary opinion, and ftifly maintained it, infomuch as Callifbenes faid unto him: And yet must thou grant, that it is colder here then there. For there all the Winter time thou couldst go with a fingle Cloak on thy back onely, and here thou must have three or four Garments upon thee when thou art at thy Board, This galled Anaxarchus to the quick, and made him more angry then before: and for the other Rhetoricians and Flatterers, they did also hate him, because they saw him sollowed of young men for his Eloquence, and beloved also of old men for his honest life, the which was very grave, modest, and contented with his own, defiring no mans elfe. Whereby men found, that the reason he alledged for following of Alexander in his Voyage, was true: for he faid, that he came to be an humble fuiter to the King to restorehisbanished Citizens into their Countrey again, and to replenish their City with Inhabitants. Now, though his estimation made him chiefly to be envied, yet did he himself give The cause why his Enemies occasion to accuse him. For often times being invited by the King to Supper, either he Calliflbenes would not come, or if he came, he would be mute, and fay nothing, shewing by his gravity and si- was envied. lence, that nothing pleafed him that was either faid or done. It is reported of him alfo, that being at Supper on a time with the King, divers requesting him to make an Oration on the fudden in commendation of the MACEDONIANS, he made such an Eloquent Oration upon that matter, that all they that heard him, rose from the Board, and clapping their hands for joy, cast Nosegayes and Flowers upon him. But yet Alexander at that time said unto him that which the Poet Euripides said:

It is no mastery to be Eloquent, In handling of a plenteous argument.

Nay, but utter then thy Eloquence in reproving of the Macedonians, that hearing their faults, they may learn to amend. Then Callifbenes changing Copy, spake boldly many things against the Macedonians, declaring, that the diffention amongst the Grecians did increase King Philips power, alledging these Verses.

Where discord reigns in Realm or Town, Even wicked folk do win renown.

But by this occasion, he purchased himself great ill will of the Macedonians: insomuch, as Alexanders self said at that time, that he had not so much shewed his Eloquence, as the malice he bare unto the Macedonians. Hermippus the Historiographer written, that one Strabus a Cleark of Callisthenes, did afterwards tell it unto Aristosie in this sort: and that Callisthenes seeing King Alexander offended with him, did recite these Verses of Homer three or sour times as he went:

Patroclus who far passed thee, Was slain, as thou art like to be.

And therefore very wifely faid Ariffetle, that Callifibenes was Eloquent, but not wife. For like a Ariffotle Philosopher, he floutly stood against kneeling to the King, and said that openly, which the No. thought Callifbest and the ancientest men among the MACEDONIANS durst but whisper one in anothers ear, there Elothough they did all utterly missible it: whereby he did yet deliver GREECE from a great shane, and wife.

Alexander from a greater, bringing him from that manner of adoration of his person. This not-withstanding, he undid himself, because he would seem rather by presumption to bring him to it, then by reason to perswade him. Chares MITYLENIAN hath written, that Alexander having drunk at a certain Feaft where he hapned to be, reaching his Cup unto one of his Friends, who after he had taken it of him, rose up first on his seet and drank also, turning him towards the gods; and first making folemn reverence, he went and kissed Alexander, and then face him down again. All the rest that were at the Feast, did the like one after another, and Callissibenes also who took the Cup when it came to his turn (the King not looking on him but talking with Hephestion) after he had drunk, came unto the King to kils him, 25 others had done. Howbeit, one Demetrine called Phidon, faid unto the King: kifs him not, I pray your Grace, for he of all men hath done you no reverence. Alexander turned his head alide, and would not kils him. Then cryed Callifthenes out aloud: Well, quoth he, then I will go my way, with lefs then others, by a kifs. And thus began Alexanders grudge first against Callishenes, by means whereof Hephession was credited the better, when he said that Callisshenes had promised him to reverence Alter him also Lysimachus, Agnon, and divers others began to play their parts against him, saying, that this Sophister went bragging up and down, as if he had deftroyed a whole Tyranny, and that all the young men followed him to honour him, as if among to many thousand Souldiers, never a man of them had to noble a heart as he. And therefore, when the Treason of Hermolaus against Alexanders person was discovered, they found the accusation probable, the which some salse detractors had informed against Callisthenes: who had answered Hermolam that asked him, how he could come to be so famous above all men, thus: In killing the famousest person. And to animate him to go forward with this Treason, he had told him surther, that he should not be asraid of a Golden Bed; but rememsuspected of ber he had to do with a man, which was sometimes fick and hurt as other men were. This notwithflanding, there was never a one of Hermolam Confederates, that would once name Callifine-Alexander. nes, what torments soever they abide, to bewray who were their Companions. And Alexander felf also writing of this Treason immediately after, unto Craterus, Attalus, and Alcetas, said, that their Servants which had been racked and put to the torture, did conffantly affirm, that they onely had conspired his death, and no man else was privy unto it. But afterwards, he sent another Letter unto Antipater, wherein he directly accused Callisthenes, and faid, that his Servants had already been stoned to death by the MACEDONIANS: howbeit that he himself would afterwards also punish the mafter, and those that had fent unto him; and that had received the murtherers into their Cities, who came of purpose to kill him. And therein he plainly strewed the ill will he bare unto Aristotle, for that Callisthenes had been brought up with him, being his Alexander of-Kinsman, and the Son of Hero, Aristotles Neece. Some say that Alexander trussed Callisthenes fended with The death of Calliflones the up. Others again report, that he died of sickness in prison. Nevertheless Chares writeth, that Rhetotician. Callisthenes was kept Prisoner seven Moneths together, because he should have had his judgement in open Council even in the presence of Aristotle himself: howbeit, being very fat, he was eaten in the end by Lice, and so died, about the time that Alexander was hurt, fighting against the MALLIANS OXYDRACIANS, in the Conquest of INDIA; but these things chanced a good while after. Demaratus CORINTHIAN being very old, had a great defire to fee Alexander: and when he had feen him, he faid, that the GRECIANS which were dead long before, were deprived Demaratus Co- of that blifs and happiness, that they could not see Alexander sit in the Royal Seat of King Da-Alexander, and riss. Howbeit, he did not long enjoy the Kings good will unto him, for he died of a fickness foon after he came unto his Camp, and Alexander did honour his Funerals: for all the Army in their Armour did caft up a Mount of Earth fashioned like a Tomb, which was a great compass his death. about, and fourfcore Cubits high. His after afterwards were brought with honourable convoy, unto the Sea fide, in a Chariot with four Horfes richly fet out. Alexander being ready to take his Journey to go conquer INDIA, perceiving that his Army was very heavy and unweildome to remove, for the wonderfull Carriage and Spoils they had with them : the Carts one morning being Alexanders journey into loaden, he first burnt his own Carriage and next his friends, and then commanded that they should India. also set the Carriage of the MACEDONIANS on fire; which countell seemed more dangerous to be relolved of, then the proof of the execution fell out difficult. For there were very few of them Alexander that were angry therewith, and the most part of them (as if they had been secretly moved by some burnt his Car god) with loud cries of joy, one of them gave unto another fuch necessary things as they had giages. need of, and afterwards of themselves did burn and spoil all the rest. This made Alexander much more rigorous then he was before, who besides that he was already become cruel enough, and without mercy or pardon, did sharply punish every man that offended. For having commanded Menander one of his friends, to keep him a strong hold, he put him to death because he would nor The cruelty of remain there. Furthermore, he himself slew Orsodates (a Captain of the barbarous People) with Alexander to- a Dart, for that he rebelled against him. About that time, there was an Ewe that had eaned a Lamb wards his men. which had upon her head, the form and Purple colour of the Kings Har, after the Persian manner called Tiara, having two stones hanging on each fide of it. Alexander abhorred this monstrous figu, infomuch as he purged himself by certain BABYLONIAN Priests, which he alwaies carried about with him for that purpose, and said unto his Friends: that this Monster did not so much move him for respect of himself, as it did for them, searing that the gods after his death had pre-defined the force and power of his Kingdom to fall into the hands of fome base cowardly person. This notwithstanding, another fign and token which chanced in the neck of that, did take away his fear and discouragement he had. For a MACEDONIAN called Proxenus, that had charge of the Kings carriage, as hedigged in a certain place by the River of Oxus, to fet up the Kings Tent and his lodging, he found a certain fat and oiley vein, which after they had drawn out the first, there A spring of came our also another clearer, which differed nothing, neither in smell, tast, nor favour from na-oil found by tural oil, having the gloss and fatness so like, as there could be discerned no difference between them: $\frac{1}{O_{XYO}}$ the which was so much more to be wondred at, because that in all that Countrey there was no Olives. They fay also, That the water of the River self of Owns is very fost and maketh their skins fat, which wash or bath themselves therein. And yet it appeareth by that which Alexander feli wrote unto Antipater, that he was very glad of it, putting that amongst the greatest figns which the gods had fent unto him. The Soothfayers did interpret this wonder, that it was a fign, that he should have a noble, but yet a painfull voyage: for the gods, faid they, have given oil unto men to refresh Oil refresheth their weariness. And truly so did he sustain many dangers in those Wars, and was oftentimes weariness. hurt in fight. But the greatest loss he had of his men, was for lack of victuals, and by the infection of the air. For he firiving to overcome fortune by valiantness, and her force by vertue, thought nothing impossible for a valiant man, neither any thing able to withftand a noble heart. It is reported, that when he went to befrege a strong hold which Sistmethres kept, being thought unaffaultable, and that his fouldiers were in despair of it, he asked one Oxyathres, what heart Sissinethres had. Oxyathres answered him, that he was the verieft coward in the world. O, that is well quoth Alexander: then it is to be won, if that be true thou fayeft, fithence the Captain of the piece is but a coward, So he took it on a fudden, by putting Sifimethres in a great fear. After that also he did befiege another piece of as great strength and difficulty to affault as the other, and making the young fouldiers of the MACEDONIANS to go to the affault, he called one of them unto him, whose name also was Alexander, unto whom he faid thus: Alexander, this day thou must fight like a man, and it be but for thy names fake. The young man did not forget his words, for he fought valiantly, that he was flain, for whom Alexander was very forry. Another time when his men were afraid, and durft not come near unto the City NISA to affault it, because there ran a very deep River hard by the Walls, he The City of came to the Rivers fide, and faid: O what a coward am I, that never learned to fwim? and so prepared Nifa. himself to swim over upon his shield. After he had caused them to retire from the assault, there came Ambaffadors unto him, from the Cities befieged, to crave pardon of him. They wondred at him at the first, when they saw him armed without any Pomp or other Ceremony about him : but much more when a Chair was brought him to fit down on, that he commanded the oldest man amongst them called Acuphis, to take it to him, and fit down. Acuphis marvelling at Alexanders great courtefie. asked him what they should do for him, thenceforth to be his good friends. I will, faid Alexander: that they from whom thou comest as Ambassador unto us, do make thee their King; and withall, that they do fend me a hundred of their best men for Hostages. Acuphis smiling answered him again: Acuphis wife but I will rule them better, O King, if I fend you the worft and not the best. There was a King called answerunto Taxiles a very wife man, who had a great Countrey in India, no lefs in bigness and circuit, than Alexander. all ÆGYPT, and as full of good pasture and fruits as any Countrey in the world could be; who came on a time to falute Alexander, and faid unto him: What should we need, Alexander, to fight, and King Taxiles make Wars one with another, if thou comest not to take away our water, and our necessary commo- talk with Alexdities to live by: for which things, men of judgement must needs fight? As for our goods, if I be ander. richer then thou. I am readier to give thee of mine; and if I have less, I will not think from to thank thee, if thou wilt give me fome of thine. Alexander being pleased to hear him speak thus Alexanders wifely, imbraced him, and faid unto him: Thinkest thou this meeting of ours can be without fight, for answer to Taxiall these goodly fair words? No, no, thou hast won nothing by that: for I will fight and contend less with thee in honesty and courtesie because thou shalt not exceed me in bounty and liberality. So Alexander taking divers gifts of him, but giving more unto Taxiles, he drank to him one night at supper, and faid: I drink to thee a thousand talents in gold. This gut milliked Alexanders friends: but in recompence thereof, he wan the hearts of many of these barbarous Lords and Princes of that Countrey. There was a certain number of fouldiers of the Indians, the warlikest men of all that Countrey, who being mercenary fouldiers, were ever entertained in fervice of the great free Cities, which they valiantly defended, and did great hurt unto Alexander in divers places. Alexander ha- Alexander difving made peace with them in a City where they were kept in, when they came abroad upon furety honourably of this peace which they had made, he met with them as they went their way, and put them all to the brake the peace fword. There was but this onely fault, to blemish the Honour of his Noble deeds in all his Wars: for in all things else he shewed mercy and equity. Furthermore the grave Philosophers and wife men of India did greatly trouble him also. For they reproved the Kings and Princes of the In-DIANS, for that they yielded unto Alexander, and procured the free Cities to take Arms against him. But by their occasion, he took divers of their Cities. For King Porus, Alexanders self Alexandersages writeth in his Epiftles, all his Acts at large which he did against him. For he faith, that both their against King. Furthermore, that in a dark night when there was no Moon light, he took part of his footmen, and the choice of his horsemen, and went far from his enemies

ALEXANDER W to get over into a little Island. When he was come into the Island, there fell a wonderfull hower of rain, great winds, lightnings and thunders upon his Camp, infomuch as he faw many of his men burnt by lightning in this little Illand. This notwithstanding, he did not leave to get over to the other fide of the River. The River being (wollen with the great Hood of rain that fell the night before, overflowing the banks, it did eat into the ground where the water ran: fo that Alexander when he had palled over the river, and was come to the other fide, found himself in very ill case, for that he could hardly keep his feet, because the earth was slippery under him, and the rage of the water had eatenimo it, and broke it down on every side. It is written of him, that then he said unto the ATHENIANS: O ATHENIANS, could you think that I could take fuch pains, and put my felf into fo many dangers, onely to be praifed of you? Thus Oneficritus reporteth it. But Alexander felf writeth, that they left their Rafters or great pieces of timber pinned together, whereupon they had passed over the stream of the main River: and that they waded through the other Arm or Gut of the water which had broken the earth, up to their breafts, with their harnels on their backs. Furthermore when he had passed over both waters, he rode with his horsemen twenty surlongs before the battle of his footmen, thinking that if his enemies came to give him charge with their men at Arms, that he was the stronger: and if they would also advance their footmen forward, that his footmen also should come time enough. One of these twain fell out as he had guessed: for a thoufand horsemen and threefcore Chariots armed with his enemies, gave him charge before their great company, whom he overthrew, and took all their Chariots, and flew four hundred of the men at Arms in the field. King Porss then knowing by those fignes that Alexander was there in perfon, and had passed over the River, he marched toward him with all his Army in battle ray, saving a few which he left behind to refift the MACEDONIANS, if they should force to pass over the River. Alexander being afraid of the great multitude of his enemies, and of the terror of the Elephants, did not give charge upon the middeft of the battle, but being himfelf in the left Wing, gave charge upon the corner of the enemies left Wing, and also commanding them that were in the right Wing to do the like. So both the ends of the enemies Army were broken and put to flight: and they that fled, ran unto the Elephants, and gathered themselves together about them. Thus the battle being begun, the conflict continued long, infomuch as the enemies were frantly all overthrown by three of the clock in the afternoon. Most writers agree, that Porm was four cubits and a shaft-King Portus. length high, and that being upon an Elephants back, he wanted nothing in height and bigness The quick wit to be proportionable for his mounture, albeit it were a very great Elephant; and befides, that and care of the Flenhant to the Elephant did shew great wit and care to fave the King his master. For whils the perceived his Elephant to fave the King master was strong enough, he lustily repulsed those which came to assail him: but when he found that he began to faint, having many wounds upon his body, and Arrows flicking in it, then being afraid left his mafter should fall down from his back, he foftly fell on his knees, and gently taking his Darts and Arrows with his Trunk, which he had in his body, he pluckt them all from him one after another. Porus being taken, Alexander asked him, how he should handle him. Princely, answered Porus. Alexander asked him again, if he would fay any thing elfe. I comprehend all, faid he, in this word Princely. Thereupon Alexander did not onely leave him his Provinces and Realms, whereof before he was King, by the name of his Lieutenant, but gave him many other Countries also. When he had subdued all the free people, of the which there were fifteen several Nations, five thoufand of no small Cities, besides an infinite number of villages and thrice as many other Countries, he made Philip one of his friends, his Lieutenant of all those Countries. Pertise, Alex: DONIANS hearts, and made them that they had no defire to go any further to conquer INDIA. For finding that they had such ado to overcome them, though they were but twenty thousand footmen, and two thouland horfe, they spake ill of Alexander when he went about to compell them to pass over the River of Ganges, understanding by the Countrymen that it was two and thirty furlongs over, and a hundred fadom deep: and how that the bank of the River was full of fouldiers, hortemen and Elephants. For it was reported that the Kings of the GANGARIDES, and the people of In-PRESIANS were on the other fide with fourfcore thousand horsemen, two hundred thousand sootmen, eight thousand Charrets or Carts of War well armed, and six thousand Elephants of War. This was no fable nor frivolous tale : for a King called Androcottus (who reigned not long after) gave unto Seleuciu, five hundred Elephants at one time, and conquered all INDIA with fix hundred thouland fighting men. Alexander then offended with his mens rejulal, kept close in his Tent for certain days, and lay upon the ground, faying, that he did not thank them for all that they had done thitherto, unless they pals over the River of Ganges also; and that to return back again, it was as much as to confess, that he had been overcome. At the length, when he saw and confluenced that there was great reason in his friends perswasions which laboured to comfort him, and that his fouldiers came to the door of his Tent, crying and lementing, humbly befeeching him to lead them back again; in the end he took pitty of them, and was contented to

Androcottus at that time was a very young man, and faw that Alex-King Androander himself, and faid afterwards, that Alexander had well-near taken and won all the Countrey, cottons. the King which then reigned, was fo hated of all his subjects for his wicked life, and base parentage he came of. Departing thence, he went to fee the great fea Oceanum, and made divers boats with Oars, in the which he eafily went down the Rivers at his pleasure. Howbeit, this his pleasure going by water, was not without War; for he would land oftentimes, and did affail Cities, and conquered all as he went. Yet in affailing the City of the Mallians (which they fay are the warlikest Alexander in men of all the INDIANS) he was almost slain there. For having with Darts repulsed the enemies danger at the from the wall, he himself was the first man that set foot on a ladder to get up, the which brake affoon Mallians. as ever he was gotten upon the Rampier. Then the barbarous people coming together against the wall, did throw at him from beneath, and many times lighted upon him. Alexander having few of his men about him, made no more ado, but leaped down from the Wall in the middest of his enemies, and by good hap lighted on his feet. His Harness making a great noise with the fall, the barbarous people were afraid, thinking they had feen some light or spirit go before them: so that at the first they all betook them to their legs, and ran scattering here and there. But after that, when they came again to themselves, and faw that he had but two Gentlemen onely about him, they came and fet upon him of all hands, and fought with him at the fword or push of the Pike, and so hurt him very fore through his Armour : but one amongst the rest, being somewhat farther off, gave him fuch a terrible blow with an Arrow, that he struck him through his Curaces, and shot him in at the fide under his breast. The blow entred so into his body, that he fell down on one of his knees. Whereupon, he that had stricken him with his Arrow, ran suddenly to him with a Cimiter drawn in his hand : howbeit as Pencestas and Limnaus stepped before him, and were both hurt, Limnaus was flain presently, and Peucestas fought it out, till at the length Alexander his felf slew the barbarous man with his own hand, after he had many grievous wounds upon his body. At the length he had a blow with a Dart on his neck, that fo aftonied him, that he leaned against the Wall looking upon his enemies. In the mean time the MACEDONIANS compassing him round about, took him, and carried him into his tent half in a fwound, and was past knowledge: whereupon there ran a rumour straight in the Camp, that Alexander was dead. They had much ado to cut the Arrow afunder that was of wood : so his Curaces being plucked off with great pain, yet were they to pluck the Arrow head our of his body, which stuck in one of his bones: the which (as it is reported) was four fingers long, and three fingers broad. So that when they plucked it out, he swounded so oft, that he was almost dead. This notwithstanding, he overcame the danger, and escaped. Being very weak, he kept diet a long time to recover himself, and never came out of his Tent : untill he heard the MACEDONIANS cry, and make great noise about his Tent, desirous to see him. Then he put on a night-gown, and came out amongst them all : and after he had done facrifice unto the gods for recovery of his health, he went on his journey again, and in the fame did conquer many great Countries, and took divers goodly Cities. He did also take ten of the wise men of the Countrey, The wise men which men do all go naked, and therefore are called GYMNOSPHISTE (to wit, Philosophers of of India. INDIA) who had procured Sabbas to rebell against him, and had done great hurt unto the MACE-DONIANS. And because they were taken to be the sharpest and readiest of answer, he did put them (as he thought) many hard questions, and told them he would put the first man to death, that answered worst, and so the rest in order : and made the eldest among them Judge of their answers. When Alexander had heard these answers, he turned unto the Judge, and bad him give his judgement upon them. The Judge laid, they had all answered one worse then another. Then shalt thou die first, faid Alexander, because thou hast given such sentence : Not so O King, quoth he, if thou wilt not be a lyer: because thou saidst, that thou wouldest kill him first, that had answered worst. In fine, Alexander did let them go with rewards. He fent Oneficritus also unto the other wife men of the IN-DIANS, which were of greatest fame among them, and that led a folitary and quiet life, to pray them to come unto him. This Oneficritus the Philosopher, was Diogenes the Cynicks scholar. It is reported, that Calanus one of these wise men, very sharply and proudly bade him put off his clothes to hear his words naked : or otherwise that he would not speak to him, though he came from Tupiter himself. Yet Dandamis answered him more gently. For he having learned what manner of men Socrates. Pythagoras, and Diogenes were, faid: that they feemed to have been wife men, and well born, notwithstanding that they had reverenced the law too much in their life time. Others write notwithstanding, that Dandamis said nothing, but asked why Alexander had taken so painfull a journey in hand, as to come into INDIA. For Calanus (whose right name otherwise was Sphines) King Taxiles perswaded him to go unto Alexander : who because he saluted those he met in the INDIAN The findlitude tongue, faying, Cale, as much as to fay, God fave ye, the GRECIANS named him Calanus. It is reported, that this Calanus did shew Alexander a figure and similitude of his Kingdom, which was this. He threw down before him a dry fear piece of leather, and then put his foot upon one of piece of leather the ends of it. The leather being troden down on that fide, rose up in all parts else, and going up and down withall, still treading upon the sides of the leather, he made Alexander see, that the leather being troden down, on the one side did rise up of all sides else, untill such time as he put his soot in the midst of the leather, and then all the whole leather was plain alike, his meaning thereby, was to let Alexander understand, that the most part of his time he should keep in the middest of his Countrey, and not to go far from it. Alexander continued feven moneths travelling upon the Rivers, to go fee the great fea Oceanum. Then he took ship and failed into a little Island called Scyl-LUSTIS, howbeit others call it PSITULCIS. There he landed, made facrifices unto the gods, and viewed the greatness and nature of the Oceanum, and all the situation of the coasts upon that sea, as far as he could go. Then he made his prayers unto the gods, that no conqueror living after him thould go beyond the bounds of his journey and conquest, and so returned homeward. He commanded his Thips should setch a compals about, and leave INDIA on the right hand : and made Wearchin Admiral of all his Fleet, and Oneswritus chief Pilot. He himself in the mean time went by land through the Countrey of the ORITES, and there he found great scarcity of victuals, and loft many of his men: fo that he carried not out of India the fourth part of his men of war which he brought thither, which were in all fix score thousand footmen, and fifteen thousand horsemen. Some of them died of grievous diseases: others by ill diet: others by extream heat and drought, and the most part of them by hunger, travelling through this barren Countrey, where the poor men lived Sheep fed with hardly, and had onely a few sheep which they fed with sea fish, that made their flesh savour ill savour-At the length, when in threefcore days journey he had painfully travelled through his Countrey, he then entred into the Countrey called GEDROSIA, where he found great plenty of all kind of victuals, which the Governors, Kings and Princes, neighbours unto the same, did send unto him. The Country After that he had refreshed his Army there a little, he went through the Countrey of CARMANIA, where he continued seven days together banquetting, going ftill through the Country. For night and day he was feafting continually with his friends upon a scaffold, longer then broad, rising up of height and drawn with eight goodly horses. After that scaffold followed divers other Charets covered over with fome goodly rich Arras, and purple filk; others with trim fresh boughs; which they renewed at every fields end: and in those were Alexanders other friends and Captains with Garlands of flowers upon their heads, which drank and made merry together. In all his Army, there was neither Helmet, Pike, Dart, nor Target feen : but gold and filver bowls, cups, and flagons in the fouldiers hands, all the way as they went, drawing Wine out of great pipes and veffels, which they carried with them, one drinking to another, some marching in the fields going forward, and others also set at the table. About them were the minftrels playing and piping on their Flutes and Shalms, and women finging and dancing, and fooling by the way asthey went. In all this diffolute marching through the Countrey, and in the midft of their drunkennels, they mingled with it sport, that every man did strive to counterfeit all the infolencies of Bacchus, as if god Bacchus himself had been there in person, and had led the mummery. When he came unto the Kings Caftle of GEDROSIA, he staid there also certain days to refresh his Army with feafting and banquetting. It is faid, that one day when he drank hard, he went to fee the games for dancing, and amongst them, the games which a young man called Bagoss had let forth (with whom Alexander fell in liking) and bare the bell. This Bagoss being in his dancing garments, came through the Theatre, and fate him down by Alexander. The MACE-DONIANS were fo glad of it, that they shouted and clapped their hands for joy, crying out aloud to kifs him: fo that in fine he took him in his arms and kiffed him before them all. Thither came Wearchus his Admiral unto him, who made report what he had feen and done in his navigation. Alexander was so glad of that, as he was desirous to fail by sea himself: and so entring into the Oceanum by the mouth of Euphrates, with a great Fleet of flips, to compais in all the coafts of ARABIA and Africk, and thence into Mare Mediterraneum, by the straights of the pillars of Hercules. To this intent he built a great number of ships in the City of THAPSACUS, and fent for Mariners, shipmafters and Pilots of all parts. But now the difficulty of the journey which he took upon him for the conquest of India, the danger he was in when he fought with the Mallians and the number of his men which he loft befides, which was very great: all these things confidered together making men believe that he should never return with safety, they made all the people (which he had conquered) bold to rife against him, and gave his Governours and Lieutenants of Provinces occasion to The Provinces commit great infolencies, robberies and exactions of people. To be short, it put all his Kingdom into conquered by broil and fedition. Infomuch as Olympias and Cleopatra rifing against Antipater, they divided his Alexander, re-Government between them: Olympias chusing for her the Kingdom of Epirus: and Cleopatra the billed against Kingdom of MACEDON. Which when Alexander had heard, he faid, his mother was the wifeft : for the Realm of MACEDON would never have fuffered a woman to reign over them. Thereupon he fent Nearchus back again to the fea, determining to fill all the fea coafts with War. As he travelled through the Countries far from the fea, he put his Captains and Governours to death which had re-

ALEXANDER the Great. when Alexander would have fent the fick and impotent perfons, which had been maimed in the Wars, into the low Countrey to the sea side, they answered him, that so doing he should do them great wrong, to fend thefe poor men from him in that fort (after they had done him all the service they could) home to their Countrey and friends, in worse case then he took them from thence. And therefore they faid, if he would fend away fome, ler him fend them all away as men unferviceable, fpecially fithence he had now fuch goodly young dancers about him, with whom he might go conquer the world. Alexander was marvellously offended with their proud words, infomuch that in his anger he reviled them all, put away his ordinary guard, and took other Persians in their place, making fome the guard about his own perion; others, his Ushers, Heraulds, and Ministers to execute his will and commandment. The poor MACEDONIANS feeing Alexander thus waited on, and themselves to shamefully rejected, they let fall their stoutness, and after they had communed of the matter together, they were ready to tear themselves for spite and malice. In fine, when they had laid their heads together, they confented to go unto his Tent, and without weapons, naked in their shirts, to yield themselves unto him weeping and howling, befeething him to do with them what pleased him, and to use them like wretched unthankfull creatures. But Alexander, though his anger was now somewhat pacified, did not receive them the first time, neither did they also go their ways, but remained there two days and nights together in this grievous and pittifull state, before the doos of his Tent, lamenting unto him, and calling him their Soveraigne, and King; untill that he came himself out of his Tent the third day, and seeing the poor wretches in this pitifull state, he himself fell a weeping a long time. So, after he had a little rebuked them, he called them courteoufly, and gave the impotent and fick perions leave to depart home, rewarding them very honourably. Furthermore he wrote unto Antipater his Lieutenant, that he should give them always the highest place in all common sports and assemblies, and that they should be crowned with Garlands of Flowers. Moreover, he commanded that the Orphans whole parents were flain in the wars, should receive the pay of their fathers. After Alexander was come unto the City of ECBATAN, in the Kingdom of MEDIA, and that he had dispatched his weightiest causes, he gave himself again unto publick sports, feasts and pastimes; for that there were newly come unto him out of GREECE, three thousand excellent masters and devisers of such sports. About that time it chanced, that Hephastion fell fick of an Ague. But he being a young man of War, did not regard his mouth as he should have done, but having spied opportunity that his Physitian Glauens was gone unto the Theatre, to fee the sports and pastimes, he went to dinner, and eat a roasted Capon whole, and drank a great pot full of Wine, which he had caused to be set in water: whereupon his Feaver took him so forely, that he lived not long after. Alexander unwifely took the chance of his death, and commanded all the hairs of his Horse and Mules to be presently shorn, in token of mourning; and that all the battlements of the Walls of Cities also should be overthrown, and hung up poor Glaucus his Physitian upon a cross, and commanded that no minstrell should be heard play of any kind of instrument within his Camp: untill that there was brought him an Oracle from Jupiter Hammon, commanding that Hephastion should be worshipped and sacrificed unto, as a demy-god. In the end, to pass over this mourning and forrow, he went unto the Wars, as unto an hunting of men, and there subdued the people of the Cossaians, whom he pluckt up by the roots, and slewman, woman, and child. And this was called the facrifice of Hephestions Funerals. Alexander furthermore being defirous to bestow ten thousand talents cost upon his obsequies and Funerals, and also to exceed the charge by the rareness and excellency of workmanship, amongst all other excellent Work-masters, he defired one Staffcrates: for he had ever passing invention, and his work was always stately and fumptuous in any new thing he took in hand. For he talking one day with Alexander, told him, that of all mountains he knew in the world, he thought there was none more excellent to refemble the Statue or Image of a man, then was mount Atho in THRACIA: and that if it were his pleasure, he would make the nobleft and most durable Image, that should be in the world, which in the left hand should hold a City to contain ten thousand persons, and out of the right hand, there should run a great River into the Sea. Yet Alexander would not hearken to him, but then was talking with other Workmen of more strange inventions, and far greater cost. Now as he was ready to take his journey to go unto BABYLON, Nearchus his Admiral came again unto him from the great fea Oceanum, by the River of Euphrates: and told him, how certain CHALDEAN Sooth-Tayers came unto him, who did warn him that he should not go into BABYLON. Howbeit Alexander made no reckoning of it, but went on. But when he came hard to the Walls of BARYLON, he faw a great number of Crows fighting and killing one of another, and fome of them fell down dead hard by him. Afterwards being told him that Apollodor in the Governour of the City of BABYLON, having facrificed unto the gods, to know what should happen to him, he fent for the Soothsayer Pythagoras, to know of him if it were true. The Soothsayer denied it not. Then Alexander asked him, what figns he had in the Sacrifice. He answered that the liver of the beast had no head. O gods, faid Alexander then, this is an ill fign: notwithstanding he did Pythagoras no hurt, but yet before Alexan he repented him that he did not believe Wearchus words. For this respect therefore Alexander lay much abroad in the Countrey from BABYLON, and did take his pleafure rowing up and down the River of Euphrates. Yet had he many other ill figns and tokens one upon another, that made him afraid. For there was a tame Ass that killed one of the greatest and goodliest Lions in all BABY-

to play at Tenis, when he should put on his Apparell again, the young Gentlemen that played with him, found a man fet in his Chair of estate, having the Kings Diademe on his head, and his Gown on his back, and faid never a word. Then they asked him what he was? It was long before he made them answer, but at the length coming to himself, he said, his name was Dionysius, born in MESSINA: and being accused for certain crimes committed, he was sent from the sea thither, where he had been a long time prisoner: and also that the god Seraps had appeared unto him, and undone his Irons, and that he commanded him to take the Kings Gown, and his Diademe, and to fit him down in his Chair of estate, and say never a word. When Alexander heard it, he put him to death according to the counfell of his Soothfayers: but then his mind was troubled, and feared that the gods had forfaken him, and also grew to suspect his friends. But first of all, Alexander feared Antipater and his sons above all other. For one of them called Iolas, was Alexander his first Cup-bearer: and his brother called Caffander, was newly come out of GREECE unto feared Antihim. The first time that Cassander saw some of the barbarous people reverencing Alexander, he paier. having been brought up with the liberty of GREECE, and had never feen the like before, tell into a loud laughing very unreverently. Therewith King Alexander was so offended, that he took him by the hair of his head with both his hands, and knocked his head and the wall together. Another time also when Caffander did answer some that accused his father Antipater, King Alexander took him up sharply, and said unto him: What sayest thou, said he? Doest thou think that these men would have gone fo long a journey as this, fallly to accuse thy father, if he had not done them wrong? Callander again replied unto Alexander, and faid, that that was a manifest proof of their false accusation, for that they did now accuse him being so far off, because they thought they could not fuddenly be disproved. Alexander thereat fell a laughing a good, and said, lo, these are Aristotles quiddities to argue pro & contra : but this will not save you from punishment, if I find that you have done these men wrong. In fine, they report that Cassander took such an inward fear and conceit upon it, that long time after when he was King of MACEDON and had all GREECE at his commandment, going up and down in the City of DELPHOS, and beholding the monuments and images that are there, he found one of Alexander; which put him into fuch a fudden fear, that the hairs of his head stood upright, and his body quaked in such fort, that it was a great time before he could come to himself again. Now after that Alexander had left his trust and confidence in the gods, his mind was so troubled and afraid, that no strange thing happened unto him (how little foever it was) but he took it ftraight for a fign and prediction from the gods: So that his Tent was always full of Priests and Soothsayers, that did nothing but sacrifice and purifie, and tend upon divinements. So horrible a thing is the miftrust and contempt of the gods, when it is begotten in the hearts of men; and superstition also so dreadfull, that it filled the guilty consciences and searfull hearts, like water distilling from above: as at that time it filled Alexander with all folly, after that fear had once possessed him. This notwithstanding, after he had received form a flwers touching Hephassition from the Oracle of Supiter Hammon, he left his forrow, and returned again to his banquets and feastings. For he did sumptuously feast Nearchus, and one day when he came out of his Bath according to his manner, being ready to go to bed, Medius one of his Captains belought him to come to a banquet to him to his lodging. Alexander went thither, and drank there all that night and the next day, so that he got an Ague by it. But that came not fick of an (as some write) by drinking up Hercules cup all at a draught; neither for the sudden pain he Ague. felt between his shoulders, as if he had been thrust into the back with a spear: for all these were thought to be written by some for lies and fables, because they would have made the end of this great Tragedy lamentable and pittiful. But Aristobulus writeth, that he had such an extream Aristobulus re-Feaver and thirst withall, that he drank Wine, and after that sell a raving, and at the length port of the died the thirtieth day of the moneth of June. In his houshold book of things passed daily, it is sickness and written, that his Feaver being upon him, he slept at his hot-house on the eighteenth day of June, death of Alex-The next morning after he was come out of his hot-house, he went into his Chamber, and passed ander. away all that day with Medius, playing at Dice: and at night very late, after he had bathed himself and facrificed unto the gods, he fell to meat, and had his Feaver that night. And the twentieth day alio, bathing himself again, and making his ordinary facrifice to the gods, he did fit down to cat within his stove, hearkning unto Nearchus that told him strange things he had seen in the great Sea Oceanum. The one and twentieth day also having done the like as before, he was much more inflamed then he had been, and felt himself very ill all night, and the next day following in a great Feaver: and on that day he made his bed to be removed, and to be fet up by the Fish-ponds, where he commanded his Captains touching certain rooms that were void in his Army, and commanded them not to place any man that were not of good experience. The three and twentieth day having an extream Feaver upon him, he was carried unto the facrifices, and commanded that his chiefest Captains onely should remain in his lodging, and that the other meaner fort, as Centurions and Lieutenants of Bands, that they should watch and ward without. The four and twentieth day, he was carried unto the other pallace of the Kings, which is on the other fide of the Lake, where he flept a little, but the Feaver never left him, and when his Captains and Noblemen came to do him humble reverence, and to fee him, he lay speechless. So did he the five and twentieth day also: infomuch as the MACEDONIANS thought be was dead. Then they came and knocked at the pallace gate, and cried out unto his friends and familiars, and threatned them, so that they were compelled to open them the gate. Thereupon the gates were opened, and they coming in their Gowns, went unto his bed-fide to fee him. That felf day Python and Seleucus were appointed by the Kings friends to go to the Temple of the god Serapu, to know if they should bring King Alexander thinher. The god answered them, that they should not remove him from thence. The eight and twentieth day at night Alexander died. Thus it is written word for word in manner, in the houshold book of remembrance. At that prefent time, there was no suspinion that he was poiloned. Yet they say, that six years after, there appeared some proof that he was poisoned. Whereupon his mother Olympias put many men to death, and cast the ashes of Jo-Las into the wind, that was dead before, for it was faid he gave him poison in his drink. They think it was Aristotle that counselled Antipater to do it, by whose mean the poison was brought, they say that Agnothemis reported it, having heard it of King Antigonus own mouth. The poison (as some say) was cold as ice, and talleth from a rock in the territory of the City of Nonacris, and it is gathered as they would gather a dew into the horn of the foot of an Afs, for there is no other kind of thing that will keep it, it is lo extream cold and piercing. Others maintain, and fay, that the report of his poisoning is untrue: and for proof thereof they alledge this reason, which is of no small importance, that is: That the chiefest Captains fell at great variance after his death, so that the corps of Alexander remained many days naked without burial, in a hot dry Country, and yet there never appeared any fign or token upon his body, that he was poisoned, but was still a clean and fair corps as could be. Alexander left Roxane great with child, for the which the MACEDONIANS did her great honour, but she did malice Statira extreamly, and did finely deceive her by a counterfeit letter she sent, as if it had come from Alexander, willing her to come unto him. But when she was come, Roxane killed her and her sister, and then threw their bodies into 2 well, and filled it up with earth, by Perdiecas help and confent. Perdiccus came to be King immediately after Alexanders death by means of Aridaus, whom he kept above him for his guard and faiety: This Aridens, being born of a strumper and common woman, called Philinna, was half lunatick, not by nature nor by chance, but as it is reported, put out of his wits when he was a young towardly boy, by drinks which Olympias caufed to be given him, and thereby continued frantick.

T what time Sylla was made Lord of all, he would have had Casar put away his wife Cornelia, the daughter of Cinna Dictator: but when he saw he could neither with any promife nor threat bring him to it, he took her joynter away from him. The cause of Casars ill will unto Sylla, was by means of marriage: for Marins the elder, married his fathers own fifter, by whom he had Marins the younger, whereby Cafar and he were Coufin-germans. Howbeit he was repulfed by Sylla's means, that fecretly was against him. Who, when he was determined to have killed him, some of his friends told him, that it was to no purpose to put so young a boy as he to death. But Syllatold them again, that they did not consider that there were many Marians in that young boy. Cafar understanding that, stole out of ROME, and hid himfelf a long time in the Country of the SABINES, wandring still from place to place. But one day being carried from house to house, he fell into the hands of Sylla's souldiers, who searched all those places, and took them whom they found hidden. Cafar bribed the Captain, whose name was Cornelius, with two talents which he gave him. After he had elcaped them thus, he went unto the fea fide and took Cafar took fea thip, and failed into BITHY NIA to go unto King Nicomedes. When he had been with him a while, he and went unto took fea again, and was taken by Pirats about the Isle of PHARMACUSA: for those Pirats kept all up- Nicomedes. on the sea coast, with a great Fleet of ships and boats. They asking him at the first twenty talents for his King of Bithiransom, Casar laughed them to scorn, as though they knew not what a man they had taken, and of him castar taken of felf promifed them fifty talents. Then he fent his menup and down to get him this money, fo that he was pirais. left in a manner alone among these thieves of the CILICIANS (which are the cruellest butchers in the world) with one of his friends and two of his flaves onely : and yet he made fo little reckoning of them, that when he was defirous to fleep, he fent unto them to command them to make no noise. Thus was he thirty eight days among them, not kept prifoner, but rather waited upon them as a Prince. All this time he would boldly exercise himself in any sport or pastime they would go to. And otherwhile also he would write verses, and make orations, and call them together to say them be ore them: and if any of them feemed as though they had not understood him, or passed not for them, he called them block heads and bruit beafts, and laughing, threatned them that he would hang them up. But they were as merry with the matter as could be, and took all in good part, thinking that this his bold speech came through the simplicity of his youth. So when his ransom was come from the City of MILETUM, they being paid their money, and he again fet at liberty; he then prefently armed and manned certain Ships out of the Haven of MILETUM, to follow those thieves, whom he found yet riding at Anchor in the fame Illand. So he took the most of them, and had the spoil of their goods; but for their bodies, he brought them into the City of Pergamus and there committed them to prison, whilest he Funius Prizer himself went to speak with Junius, who had the government of Asia, as unto whom the execution of Asia. tion of these Pirats did belong, for that he was Prator of that Countrey. But this Prator having a great fancy to be fingering of the money, because there was good store of it, answered that he would confider of these priloners at better leisure. Cefar leaving Junius there, returned again unto PERGAMUS, and there hung up all those thieves openly upon a cross, as he had oftentimes promifed them in the 1ste he would do, when they thought he did but jeft. Afterwards when Sylla's power began to decay, Cafars friends wrote unto him, to pray him to come home again. But he failed first unto Rhodes, to study there a time under Appollonism the Son of Meton, whose Scholar also Cierro was, for he was a very honest man, and an excellent good Rhetoritian. It is reported, that Cafar had an excellent natural gift to speak well before the people, and besides that rare gift, he was excellently well studied, so that doubtless he was counted the second man for eloquence in his time, and gave place to the first, because he would be the first and chiefest man of war and authority, being not yet come to the degree of perfection to speak well, which his nature could have performed in him, because he was given rather to follow wars, and to manage great matters, which in the end brought him to be Lord of all ROMB. And therefore in a book he wrote against that which Cicero made in the praise of Cato, he prayeth the Readers not to compare the stile of a Souldier, with the Eloquence of an excellent Orator, that had followed it the most part of his life. When he was returned again unto Rome, he accufed Dolabella for his ill behaviour in the Government of the Provinces, and he had divers Cities of GREECE that gave in evidence against him. Notwithstanding, Dolabella at the length was difmilled. Cafar to require the good will of the GRECIANS which they had shewed him in his acculation of Dolabella took their cause in hand, when they did accuse Publius Antonius before Marcus Lucalus, Prator of Macedon: and followed it to hard against him in their behalf, that Antonisus was driven to appeal before the Tribunes at ROME, alledging, to colour his appeal withall, that he could have no justice in GREECE against the GRECIANS. Now Cefar immediately wan many mens good wills at ROME, through his Eloquence, in pleading of their causes, and the people loved him marvellously also, because of the courteous manner he had to speak to every man, and to use them gently, being more ceremonious therein then was looked for in one of his years. Furthermore, he ever kept a good board, and fared well at his Table, and was very liberal besides: the which indeed did advance him forward, and brought him in estimation with the Cafar loved people. His enemies judging that this favour of the common people would foon quail, when he hospitality. Calaratollow could no longer hold out that charge and expence, suffered him to run on, till by little and little he was grown to be of great strength and power. But in fine, when they had thus given him the bridle to grow to this greatness, and that they could not then pull him back, though indeed in fight it would turn one day to the destruction of the whole state and Commonwealth of ROME: too late they found, that there is not so little a beginning of any thing, but continuance of time will soon make it strong, when through contempt there is no impediment to hinder the greatness. Thereupon Gicero like a wife Shipmafter that feareth the calmness of the Sea, was the first man that mistrusting his manner of dealing in the Commonwealth found out his craft and malice, which he cunningly cloked under the habit of outward courtesse and familiarity. And yet, faid he, when I consider how finely he combeth his fair bush of hair, and how smooth it lyeth, and that I see him scratch his head ment of Cafar. with one finger onely, my mind gives me then, that fuch a kind of man should not have so wicked a thought in his head, as to overthrow the state of the Commonwealth. But this was long time after that. The first shew and proof of the love and good will which the people did bear unto Casar, was when he fued to be Tribune of the fouldiers (to wit, Colonel of a thousand footmen) standing against Caises Pompilises, at that time he was preferred and chosen before him. But the second and more manisest proof then the first, was at the death of his Aunt Julia, the wife of Marius the elder. For Cafar made the being her Nephew, he made a folema Oration in the Market-place in commendation of her, and at her burial did boldly venture to thew forth the images of Marius: the which was the first time that they were feen after Sylla's victory, because that Marins and all his confederates had been proclaimed Traitors and enemies of the commonwealth. For when there were fome that cryed out upon Cafar for doing of it, the people on the other fide kept slir, and rejoyced at it, clapping of their hands; and thanked him, for that he had brought as it were out of hell, the remembrance of Marius honour again into ROME, which had so long time been obscured and buried. And where it had been an ancient cultome of long time, that the ROMANS used to make Funeral Orations in praise of old Ladies and Matrons when they died, but not of young women: Cafar was the first that praised his own Wife with Funeral Oration when the was dead, the which also did encrease the peoples good wills the more, feeing him of fo kind and gentle nature. After the burial of his Wife he was made Treafurer under Antifius Vetus Prettor, whom he honoured ever after: fo that when himself came to be Prætor, he made his Son to be chosen Treasurer. Afterwards, when he was come out of that Office, he married his third Wife Pompeia, having a daughter by his first Wife, Cornelia, which was married unto Pompey the Great. Now for that he was very liberal in expences, buying (as some thought) but a vain and thort glory of the favour of the people (where indeed he bought good cheap the greatest things that could be) some say, that before he bare any Office in the Commonwealth, he was grown in debt, to the fum of thirteen hundred talents. Furthermore, because he was made over-feer of the work for the high way called Appius way, he disburfed a great fum of his own money towards the charges of the fame. And on the other fide, when he was made Ædilis, for that he did shew the people the pastime of three hundred and twenty couple of Sword players, and did befides exceed all other in lumptuoulness in the sports and common feasts, which he made to delight them withall (and did as it were drown all the stately shews of others in the like, that had gone before him) he fo pleased the people, and wan their love therewith, that they devised daily to give him new Offices for to requite him. At that time there were two factions in ROME, to wit, the faction of Sylla, which was very ftrong and of great power: and the other of Marius, which was then under foot, and durst not shew it self. But Cafar because he would renew it again, even at that time when he being Ædilis, all the feafts and common sports were in their greatest ruffe, he secretly caused images of Marius to be made, and of victories that carried triumphs; and those he set up one night within the Capitol. The next morning when every man saw gliftering of these golden images excellently well wrought, shewing by the inscriptions, that they were the victories which Marius had won upon the CIMBRES, every one marvelled much at the boldness of him that durft set them up there, knowing well enough who it was. Hereupon it ran fraight through all the City, and every man came thither to fee them. Then some cryed out upon Casar accused Cafar, and faid, it was a tyranny which he meant to fet up, by renewing of fuch honours as before to make a rehad been trodden under foot and forgotten, by common decree and open proclamation: and that it bellion in the was no more but a bait to gage the peoples good wills, which he had fet out in the stately shews of state. his common plays, to fee if he had brought them to his lure, that they would abide fuch parts to be played and a new alteration of things to be made. They of Marius faction on the other fide incouraging one another, shewed themselves straight a great number gathered together, and made the mount of the Capitol ring again with their cries and Clapping of hands; infomuch as the tears ran down many of their cheeks, for very joy, when they faw the images of Marius, and they extolled Cafar to the skies, judging him the worthieft man of all the kindred of Marius. The Senate being affembled thereupon, Catulus Lucturius, one of the greatest authority at that time in ROME, role. and vehemently inveighed against Casar, and spake that then which ever since hath been noted much: that Cafar did not now covertly go to work, but by plain force fought to alter the ftate of the Commonwealth. Neverthelels, Cefar at that time did answer him fo, that the Senate was fatisfied. Thereupon they that had him in estimation did grow in better hope then before, and perswaded him, that hardly he should give place to no man, and that through the good will of the people, he should be better then all they, and come to be the chiefest man of the City. At that time the chief Bishop Me- The death of tellus died, and two of the notablest men of the City, and of the greatest authority (Isuricus and Metellus chief Catulus) contended for his room: Cafar notwithstanding their contention, would give neither of them both place, but presented himself to the people, and made suit for it as they did. The suit being equal betwixt either of them, Casulus, because he was a man of greater calling and dignity than the other, doubting the uncertainty of the election, sent unto Cafar a good sum of money, to make him leave off his fuit. But Casar fent him word again, that he would lend a greater fum then that, to maintain the fuit against him. When the day of the election came, his mother bringing him to the door of his house, Cefar weeping, kiffed her, and faid : Mother, this day thou shalt fee thy fon chief Bishop of ROME, or banished from ROME. In fine, when the voices of the people were gathered together, and the strife well debated, Cofar wan the victory, and made the Cofar made Senate and Noble men all afraid of him, for that they thought that thenceforth he would make the chief Bishop of people do what he thought good. Then Catulus and Tife feel flatly out with Cicero, and condemned Rome. him for that he did not bewray Cafar, when he knew that he was of conspiracy with Cataline, and Cafar suspected had opportunity to have done it. For when Cataline was bent and determined, not onely to overtate with Gaitthrow the flate of the Commonwealth, but nitrely to defroy the Empire of Rows be afond. throw the state of the Commonwealth, but utterly to destroy the Empire of Rome, he escaped line in his conof the hands of juffice for lack of fufficient proof, before his full treason and determination was spiracy. known. Notwithstanding he left Lentulus and Cethegus in the City, companions of his conspiracy: unto whom, whether Cafar did give any fecret help or comfort, it is not well known. Yet this is manifest, that when they were convinced in open Senate, Cicero being at that time Consul, asking every mans opinion in the Senate, what punishment they should have, and every one of them till it came to Cafar, gave fentence they fhould die: Cafar then rifing up to fpeak, made an oration (pen- Cafar went aned and premeditated before) and faid, that it was neither lawfull, nor yet their custome did bear it, bout to deliver to put men of fuch Nobility to death (but in an extreamity) without lawfull inditement and condemna- the confpiration. And therefore, that if they were put in prison in some City of ITALY, where Cicero thought tors. best untill that Catiline were overthrown, the Senate then might at their pleasure quickly take such order therein, as might appear best unto their wisdoms. This opinion was thought more gentle, and withall was uttered with fuch a passing good grace and eloquence, that not onely they which were to speak after him did approve it: but such also as had spoken to the contrary before, revoked their opinion, and stuck to his, untill it came to Cato and Catulus to speak. They both did sharply inveigh against him, but Cato chiefly: who in his oration made Cafar suspected to be of the confpi-Cato's oration racy, and stoutly spake against him, infomuch that the offenders were put into the hands of the Of- against Cafar.

Cicero for the fafety of his person, did set upon him with their swords drawn. But some say that Curio covered Cafar with his Gown, and took him out of their hands. And Cicero felf, when the young men looked upon him, beckened with his head that they should not kill him, either fearing the fury of the people, or elfe that he thought it too shamefull and wicked a part. But if that were true, I marvell why Cicero did not put it into his book he wrote of his Confulship. But certainly they blamed him afterwards, for that he took not the opportunity offered him against Casar, onely for overmuch fear of the people, that loved him very dearly. For shortly after, when Cafar went into the Senate, to clear himself of certain presumptions and false accusations objected against him, and being bitterly taunted among them, the Senate keeping him longer, than they were wont: the people came about the Council-house, and called out aloud for him, bidding them let him out. Cato then fearing the infurrection of the poor needy persons, which were they that put all their hope in Cefar, and did also move the people to stir, did perswade the Senate to make a frank distribution of Corn unto them, for a moneth, This distribution did put the Common-wealth to a new charge of five hundred and fifty Myriades. This counfell quenched a prefent great fear, and did in happy time scatter and disperseabroad the best part of Casars force and power, at such time as he was made Prætor, and that for respect of his office he was most to be seared. Yet all the time he was officer, he never fought any alteration in the Commonwealth, but contrarily he himfelf had a great misfortune fell on his house, which was this. There was a young noble man of the order of the PATRICIANS, called Publiss Clodiss, who lacked neither wealth, nor eloquence, but otherwise as insolent and impudent a person, as any was else in Rome. He became in love with The love of P. Pompeia, Cafars wife, who milliked not withall: notwithflanding the was fo firaightly looked to, and Aurelia (Cafars mother) an honeft Gentlewoman had fuch an eye of her, that these two lovers could not meet as they would, without great peril and difficulty. The ROMANS do use to honour The good god a goddes, which they call the good goddes, as the GRECIANS have her whom they call Gynacia, Ine good gou to wit, the goddes of women. Her, the PHRYGIANS do claim to be peculiar unto them, faywas, and her ing: that the is King Mids mother. Howbeit the ROMANS hold opinion, that it is a Nymph of the Woods married unto the god Faunus. The GRECIANS, they also, that the was one of the mothers of the god Bacchin, whom they dare not name. And for proof hereof, on her feaft day, the women make certain Tabernacles of vine twigs, and leaves of vine branches; and also they make as the tale goeth, a holy Dragon for this goddels, and do fet it by her: besides, it is not lawfull for any man to be present at their sacrifices, no not within the house it self where they are made. Furthermore, they fay, that the women in these facrifices do many things among themselves, much like unto the Ceremonies of Orpheus. Now when the time of this feaft came, the husband (whether he were Prator or Conful) and all his men and the boys in the house, do come out of it, and leave it wholly to his wife, to order the house at her pleasure, and there the sacrifices and ceremonies are done the most part of the night, and they do besides pass the night away in songs and musick. Pompeia Cafars wife, being that year to celebrate this feaft, Clodius who had yet no hair on his face, and thereby thought he should not be bewrayed, disguised himself in a singing Wenches apparell, because his face was very like unto a young Wench. He finding the Gates open, being secretly brought in by her Chamber-maid that was made privy unto it, she left him, and ran to Pompeia her miftress, to tell her that he was come. The Chamber maid tarried long before she came again, infomuch as Clodius being weary waiting for her where she left him, he took his pleasure, and went from one place to another in the house, which had very large rooms in it, still shunning the light and was by chance met withall by one of Aurelia's maids, who taking him for a woman, prayed her to play. Clodim refusing to play, the maid pulled him forward, and asked him what he was: Clodius then answered her, that he tarried for Abra one of Pompeia's women. So Aurelia's maid knowing him by his voice, ran straight where the lights and Ladies were, and cryed out, that there was a man difguifed in womans apparell. The women therewith were fo amazed, that Aurelia caused them presently to leave off the Ceremonies of the Sacrifice, and to hide their secret things; and having feen the Gates fast locked, went immediately up and down the house with Torch-light to feek out this man : who at the last was found out in the Chamber of Pompeia's maid, with whom Clading taken he hid himself. Thus Cloding being found out, and known of the women, they thrust him out in the facrifices of the doors by the shoulders. The same night the women told their husbands of this chance as foon as they came home. The next morning, there ran a great runtour through the City, how goaders. Clodism had attempted a great villany, and that he deferved, not onely to be punished of them whom for prophoning he had flandered, but also of the Commonwealth and the gods. There was one of the Tribunes of the lacrifices of the people that did indite him, and accuse him of High Treason to the gods. Furthermore, there the good god- were also of the chiefest of the Nobility and Senate, that came to depose against him, and burthened him with many horrible and deteftable facts, and specially with incest committed with his own fifter, which was married unto Lucullus. Notwithstanding the people stoutly defended Clodius against their acculations: and this did help him much against the Judges, which were amazed, and afraid to stir the people. This notwithstanding, Cafar prefently put his wife away, and thereupon being brought by Clodius accuser to be a witness against him, he answered, he knew nothing of that they objected against Clodius. This answer being clean contrary to their expectation that heard it, the accuser asked Cafar, why then he had put away his wife: Because I will not, faid he, that my wife be so much as suspected. And some say, that Cefar spake truly as he thought. But others think, that he did it to please the common people, who were very desirous to save Clodius. So Clodius was dis-different of this Acculation, because the most part of the Judges gave a confused Judgement, for the fear they stood in one way, of the danger of the common People, if they condemned him, and Clodius quit by for the ill opinion on the other fide of the Nobility, if they did quit him. The government of the the Judges, for Provinces of Spain being faln unto Cafar, for that he was Prætor, his Creditors came and cried Sacrifices of our upon him, and were importunate of him to be payed. Cafar being unable to fatisfie them, was the good godcompelled to go unto Craffus, who was the richest man of all Rome, and that stood in need of dels. Cafars boldness and courage to withstand Pompeys greatness in the Commonwealth. Crassus be- Casar Prator Cafars boldness and courage to within a home of eight hundred and thirty Talents: where of spain, came his furety unto his greedieft Creditors for the fum of eight hundred and thirty Talents: where of spain, upon they suffered Casar to depart to the Government of his Province. In this Journey it is report for Casar to ed, that paffing over the Mountains of the Alpes, they came through a little poor Village that his Creditors had not many Housholds, and yet poor Cottages. There his friends that did accompany him, asked him merrily, if there were any contending for Offices in that Town, and whether there were any strife there amongst the Noblemen for honour. Cafar speaking in good earnest, answered: I cannot tell that, faid he, but for my part I had rather be the chiefest man here, then the second perfon in ROME. Another time also when he was in SPAIN, reading the History of Alexanders acts, when he had read it, he was forrowfull a good while after, and then burft out in weeping. His friends feeing that, marvelled what should be the cause of his forrow. He answered them. Do you not think, faid he, that I have good cause to be heavy, when King Alexander being no elder then my felf is now, had in old time won fo many Nations and Countries: and that I hitherunto have done nothing worthy of my felf? Therefore when he was come into Spain, he was very carefull of his business, and had in few days joyned ten new Ensigns more of Footmen, unto the other Spain, twenty which he had before. Then marching forward against the CALLESIANS and LUSITA-NIANS, he conquered all, and went as far as the great Sea Oceanum, fubduing all the People which before knew not the ROMANS for their Lords. There he took order for pacifying of the War, and did as wifely take order for the establishing of Peace. For he did reconcile the Cities together, and made them friends one with another, but specially he pacified all suits of Law, and strife betwixt the Debtors and Creditors, which grew by reason of usury. For he ordained that the Cre- Casars order ditors should take yearly two parts of the Revenue of their Debtors, untill such time as they had between the payed themselves: and that the Debtors should have the third part themselves to live withall. He Creditor and having won great estimation by this good order taken, returned from his Government very rich, and his Souldiers also full of rich Spoils, who called him Imperator, to fay, Soveraigne Captain. Cafara Souldi-Now the ROMANS having a cuftom, that fuch as demanded honour of Triumph, should remain ers called him a while without the City, and that they on the other fide which fued for the Confulship, should of Imperator. necessity be there in person: Casar coming unhappily at the very time when the Consuls were chofen, he fent to pray the Senate to do him that favour, that being ablent he might by his friends fue for the Confulfhip. Cato at the first did vehemently inveigh against it, vouching an express Law to the contrary. But afterwards, perceiving that notwithstanding the reasons he alledged, many of the Senators (being won by Cafar) favoured his request, yet he cunningly fought all he could to prevent them, prolonging time, in dilating his Oration untill night. Cafar thereupon determined rather to give over the fuit of his Triumph, and to make fuit for the Confulship : and so came into the City, and had fuch a device with him, as went beyond them all, but Cato onely. His device Cafur reconciwas this: Pompey and Craffin, two of the greatest personages of the City of Rome being at jar leth Pompey together, Cafar made them friends, and by that means got unto himself the power of them both, and Craffin tofor by colour of that gentle act and friendship of his, he subtilly (unawares to them all) did greatly alter and change the state of the Commonwealth. For it was not the private discord between Pompey and Cafar, as many men thought, that caused the Civil-War: but rather it was their agreement together, who joyned all their Powers first to overthrow the state of the Senate and Nobility, and afterwards they fell at jar one with mother. But Cato that then foresaw and prophecied ma- Cato's foreny times what would follow, was taken but for a vain man: but afterwards they found him a wifer fight and Pro man, then happy in his Counsell. Thus Cafar being brought unto the Affembly of the election, phecy. in the middeft of these two noble persons, whom he had before reconciled together, he was there Consultation chosen Consult with Calphurnius Bibulus, without gain-saying, or contradiction of any man. Now with Colphurwhen he was entred into his Office, he began to put forth Laws meeter for a feditious Tribune of nius Bibalus. the People, then for a Confull: because by them he preferred the division of Lands, and distributing Casars Laws. of Corn to every Citizen gratis, to please them withall. But when the Noblemen of the Senate were against his device, he desiring no better occasion, began to cry out, and to protest, that by the overhardness and austerity of the Senate, they drave him against his will to lean unto the People: and thereupon having Craffus on the one fide of him, and Pompey on the other, he asked them openly in the Affembly, if they did give their confent unto the Laws which he had put forth. They both answered, they did. Then he prayed them to stand by him against those that threatned him with force of Sword to let him. Craffus gave him his word, he would, Pompey also did the like, and added thereunto, that he would come with his Sword and Target both, against them that would withftand him with their Swords. These words offended much the Senate, being far unmeet for his gravity, and undecent for the Majesty and Honour he carried, and most of all uncomely for the prefence of the Senate, whom he should have reverenced: and were speeches fitter for a rash lightheaded youth, then for his Person. Howbeit the common People on the other side, they rejoyced.

Pompey by authorized Cx-

Then Cefar because he would be more assured of Pompey's power and frendship, he gave handis Cafer married Daughter Julia in Marriage, which was made fure before unto Servilius Cepio, and promifed him in exchange Pompey's Daughter, who was fure also unto Faustus the Son of Sylla. And shortly after allo, Cafari felf did marry Calphurnia, the Daughter of Pife, whom he caused to be made Con-Pompey.

Cafar matried full, to fucceed him the next year following. Cato then cried out with open mouth, and called the Calar married run, to increase min the man year community and not to be fuffered, that they should in that fort Calpburnis the gods to witness, that it was a shamefull matter, and not to be suffered, that they should in that fort make havock of the Empire of ROME, by fuch horrible bawdy matches, distributing among themfelves through those wicked marriages, the Governments of the Provinces, and of great Armies, Chalphurnius Bibulus, fellow-Confull with Cefar, perceiving that he did contend in vain, making all the reliftance he could to withftand this Law, and that oftentimes he was in danger to be flain with Cato, in the Market-place and Affembly; he kept close in his House all the reft of his Consulting.

When Pompey had married Julia, he filled all the Market-place with Souldiers, and by open force authorized the Laws which Cafar made in the behalf of the People. Furthermore, he procured that Cafur had Gaul on this fide and beyond the Alpes, and all ILLYRIA, with four Legions granted him for five years. Then Cato standing up to speak against it, Cafar bade his Officers lay hold on him, and carry him to prison, thinking he would have appealed unto the Tribunes. But Caso said never a word when he went his way. Cesar perceiving then, that not onely the Senators and Nonever a billity were offended, but that the common People also for the reverence they bare unto Cato's vertues, were ashamed, and went away with silence; he himself secretly did pray one of the Tribunes that he would take Cato from the Officers. But after he had played this part, there were few Senators that would be Prefident of the Senate under him, but left the City, because they could not away with his doings. And of them, there was an old man called Confidius, that on a time boldly told him, the rest durst not come to Council, because they were assaid of his Souldiers. Casar answered him again; and why then doeft not thou keep thee at home, for the same fear? Considers replied, becaule my age taketh away fear from me : for having to short a time to live, I have no care to prolong it turther. The shamefullest part that Cafar played while he was Conful, seemeth to be this: when he chofe P. Clodius Tribune of the People, that had offered his Wife fuch dilhonour, and pro-C.sfn by Clo- phaned the holy ancient Mysteries of the Women, which were celebrated in his own House. Clodicaptr by Cic- primited to be Tribune to no other end, but to destroy Cicero: and Cafars self also departed not from cero out of Italy ROME to his Army before he had fet them together by the ears, and driven Cicero out of ITALY. All these things they say he did, before the Wars with the Gauls. But the time of the great Armies and Conquests he made afterwards, and of the War in which he subdued all the Gauls (entring into another course of life far contrary unto the first) made him to be known for as valiant a Souldier, and as excellent a Captain to lead them, as those that afore him had been counted the wifelt and most valiant Generals that ever were, and that by their valiant deeds had atchieved great honour. For whosoever would compare the House of the Fabians, of the Scipiocs, of the Metellians. yea those also of his own time, or long before him, as Sylla, Marius, the two Lucullians, and Pompey's felf:

Whose fame ascendeth up unto the Heavens.

It will appear that Cefars prowefs, and deeds of Arms, did excell them all together. The one, in the hard Countreys where he made Wars: another, in enlarging the Realms and Countreys which he joyned unto the Empire of ROME: another, in the multitude and power of his Enemies whom he overcame: another in the rudenels and auftere nature of men with whom he had to do, whose manners afterwards he foftned and made civil: another, in courtefie and clemency which he used unto them whom he had conquered: another, in great bounty and liberality bestowed unto them that ferved under him in those Wars: and in fine, he excelled them all in the number of Battles he had fought, and in the Cesurs Con-multitude of his Enemies he had slain in Battle. For in less then ten years War in GAUL, he took by quelts in Gaul. force and affault above eight hundred Towns, he conquered three hundred feveral Nations : and having before him in Battle thirty hundred thousand Souldiers, at fundry times, he slew ten hundred thousand The love and of them, and took as many more Prifoners. And this appeareth plainly by the The wonderfull example of Acilius: who in a Battle by Sea before the City of MARSEILLES, boarding one of ane wondernul his Enemies Ships, one cut off his right hand with a Sword; but yet he forfook not his Target valiance so of the start of valuances or the License Suips, one case on the argue made and a sworter, our yet he actions not the larget Acilius, Cassus which he had in his left hand, but thrust it in his Enemies faces, and made them fly, so that he Scava, and di- wan their Ship from them. And Cassius Scava also, in a Conflict before the City of Dyrrachivers other of um, having one of his eyes put out with an Arrow, his shoulder stricken through with a Dart, and his shioh with another and having received thirty Arrows toog his Chiald his shioh with another and having received thirty Arrows toog his Chiald has called a his received thirty Arrows toog his Chiald has called a his received thirty Arrows toog his Chiald has called a his received thirty Arrows toog his Chiald has called a his received thirty Arrows toog his Chiald has called a his received thirty Arrows toog his Chiald has called a his received thirty Arrows toog his Chiald has called a his received thirty Arrows toog his Chiald has called a his received thirty Arrows toog his Chiald has called a his received thirty Arrows toog his Chiald has called a his received thirty Arrows toog his Chiald has called a his received thirty Arrows toog his Chiald has called a his received thirty Arrows toog his Chiald has called a his chief the called a his chief thirty Arrows toog his Chiald has called a his chief thirty Arrows toog his Chiald his chief thirty Arrows toog his Chiald his chief the called a his chief thirty Arrows toog his Chiald his chief thirty Arrows toog his Chiald his chief thirty Arrows toog his Chiald his chief thirty Arrows toog his chief the chief thirty Arrows to chief thirty Arrows to chief the chief thirty Arrows to chief the chief thirty Arrows to his thigh with another, and having received thirty Arrows upon his Shield, he called to his Enemies, and made as though he would yield unto them. But when two of them came running to him, he clave one of their shoulders from his body with his Sword, and hurt the other in the face: so that he made him turn his back, and at the length faved himself, by means of his Companions that came to help him. And in BRITAIN also, when the Captains of the Bands were driven into a Marsh or Bogge full of mire and dirt, and that the Enemies did fiercely affail them there, Cafar then standing to view the Battle, he saw a private Souldier of his thrust in among the Captains, and fought fo valiantly in their defence, that at the length he drave the barbarous People to fly, and by his means faved the Captains, which otherwise were in great danger to have been cast away. Then this Souldier being the hindmost man of all the Captains, marching with great pain through the mire and dirt, half swimming, and half on foot, in the end got to the other fide, but left his Shield behind him. Cafar wondering at his noble courage, ran to him with joy to embrace him. But the poor Souldier hanging down his head, the water standing in his eyes, fell down at Cafar's feet, and befought him to pardon him, for that he had left his Target behind him. And in Africk also, Scipio having taken one of Cafar's Ships, and Granius Petronius Granius Peaboard on her amongst other, not long before chosen Treasurer; he put all the rest to the Sword stronius. but him, and faid he would give him his life. But Petronius answered him again, that Cafars Souldiers did not use to have their lives given them, but to give others their lives : and with these words he drew his Sword, and thruft himself through. Now Cafars self did breed this noble courage and life in them. First, for that he gave them bountifully, and did honour them also, shewing thereby, that he did not heap up Riches in the Wars, to maintain his life afterwards in wantonnels and pleasure, but that he did keep it in store, honourably to reward their valiant service; and that by fo much he thought himself rich, by how much he was liberal in rewarding of them that had deserved it. Furthermore, they did not wonder so much at his valiantness, in putting himself at every instant in such manifest danger, and in taking so extream pains as he did, knowing that it was his greedy defire of honour that fet him on fire, and pricked him forward to do it : but that he always continued all labour and hardness, more then his body could bear, that filled them all with admiration. For, concerning the constitution of his body, he was lean, white, and lost skinned, and often subject to head-ach, and other while to the falling-fickness (the which took him castar had the the first time, as it is reported, in CORDUBA , a City of SPAIN :) but yet therefore yielded falling fickness not to the disease of his body, to make it a cloak to cherish him withall, but contrarily, took the pains of War, as a Medicine to cure his fick body, fighting alwaies with his difease, travelling continually, living foberly, and commonly lying abroad in the Field. For the most nights he slept in his Coach or Litter, and thereby bestowed his rest, to make him alwaies able to do something: and in the day time, he would travell up and down the Countrey to fee Towns, Caftles, and ftrong places. He had alwaies a Secretary with him in the Coach, who did ftill write as he went by the way, and a Souldier behind him that carried his Sword. He made such speed the first time he came from Rome, when he had his Office, that in eight days he came to the River of Rhone. He was so excellent a rider of Horse from his youth, that holding his hands behind him, he would gallop his Horse upon the spur. In his Wars in GAUL, he did surther exercise himself to indite Letters as he rode by the way; and did occupy two Secretaries at once with as much as they could write : and as Oppius writeth, more then two at a time. And it is reported, that Cafar was the first that devised friends might talk together by writing Cyphers in Letters, when he had no leifure to speak with them for his urgent business, and for the great distance besides from ROME. How little account Cafar made of his Diet, this example doth prove it. Cafar supping one night The tempein MILLAIN with his friend Valerim Leo, there was served Sperage to his Board, and oyl of rance of Cafar Perfume put into it, instead of Saller-oyl. He simply eat it, and found no fault, blaming his in his diet. friends that were offended: and told them, that it had been enough for them to have abstained to Castars civility eat of that they milliked, and not to shame their friend, and how that he lacked good manners not to blame that found fault with his friend. Another time as he travelled through the Countrey, he was dri- his friend. ven by foul weather on the fudden to take a poor mans Cottage, that had but one little Cabin in it, and that was so narrow, that one man could but scarce lie in it. Then he said to his friends that were about him, Greatest rooms are meetest for greatest men, and the most necessary rooms for the fickest persons. And thereupon he caused Oppins that was fick to lie there all night: and he himself, with the rest of his friends, lay without doors, under the easing of the House. The first War that Cafar made with the GAULS, was with the HELVETIANS and TIGURI-NIANS, who having fet fire on all their good Cities, to the number of twelve, and four hundred Villages befides, came to invade that part of GAUL which was subject to the ROMANS, as the CIMBRI and TEUTONS had done before, unto whom for valiantness they gave no place: and they were also a great number of them (for they were three hundred thousand souls in all) whereof there were an hundred fourfcore and ten thouland fighting men. Of those, it was not Cafar The Tigurinihimself that overcame the TIGURINIANS, but Labienus his Lieutenant, that overthrew them and flain by by the River of Arax. But the HELVETIANS themselves came suddenly with their Army to Laboratory fet upon him, as he was going towards a City of his Confederates. Cafar perceiving that, made haft to get him some place of ftrength, and there did set his men in Battle-ray. When one brought him his Horfe to get upon, which he used in Battle, he said unto them : When I have overcome Cofur refused mine Enemies, I will then get upon him to follow the chase, but now let us give them Charge. his Horsewhen Therewith he marched forward on foot, and gave charge: and there fought it out a long time, be he fought a fore he could make them fly that were in Bartle. But the greatest trouble he had, was to distress Battle. their Camp, and to break their strength which they had made with their Carts. For there, they The Heloviia as that before had fled from the Battle, did not onely put themselves in force, and valiantly fought flain by Cafar. it out : but their Wives and Children also fighting for their lives to the death, were all slain, and he also added another as notable, or exceeding it. For of all the barbarous People that had escaped from this Battle, he gathered together again above an hundred thousand of them, and compelled them to return home into their Countrey which they had forfaken, and unto their Towns also which they had burnt : because he feared the GERMANS would come over the River of Rheyne, and occupy that Countrey lying void. The fecond War he made, was in defence of the Gauss War with King against the GERMANS: although before, he himself had caused Ariovistus their King, to be received for a Confederate of the ROMANS. Notwithstanding, they were grown very unquiet Neighbours, and it appeared plainly, that having any occasion offered them to enlarge their Territories, they would not content them with their own, but meant to invade and poffels the rest of GAUL. Cefar perceiving that some of his Captains trembled for fear, but specially the young Gentlemen of noble Houses of Rome, who thought to have gone to the Warswith him, as onely for their pleasure and gain, he called them to Council, and commanded them that were afraid. that they should depart home, and not put themselves in danger against their wills, sith they had fuch womanish faint hearts, to shrink when he had need of them. And for himself, he said, he would fet upon the barbarous People, though he had left him but the tenth Legion onely, faying that the Enemies were no valianter then the CIMBRI had been, nor that he was a Captain inferiour unto Marius. This Oration being made, the Souldiers of the tenth Legion fent their Lieutenants unto him, to thank him for the good opinion he had of them: and the other Legions also fell our with their Captains, and all of them together followed him many days Journey with good will to ferve him, untill they came within two hundred furlongs of the Camp of the Enemies. Ariovistus courage was well cooled, when he saw Casar was come, and that the ROMANS came to leck out the GERMANS; where they thought, and made account, that they durst not have abidden them: and therefore nothing miftrusting it would have come so to pass, he wondered The wife we- much at Cefars courage, and the more when he faw his own Army in a maze withall. But much men of Germa more did their courage tall, by reason of the soolish Womens Prophesies they had amongst them, my, how they which did foretell things to come : who confidering the waves and trouble of the Rivers, and did foretell things to come : who confidering the waves and trouble of the Rivers, and did foretell things to come : who confidering the waves and trouble of the Rivers, and did foretell things to come : who confidering the waves and trouble of the Rivers, and and torctell things to come the terrible notife they made running down the stream, did fore-warn them not to fight untill things to come the stream of the fight untill things to come the stream of t the new Moon. Cafar having intelligence thereof, and perceiving that the barbarous People thereupon stirred not, thought it best then to set upon them, being discouraged with the superstitious fear, rather then losing time, he should tarry their leisure. So he did skirmish with them even to their Forts, and little Hills where they lay, and by this means provoked them so, that with great fury they came down to fight. There he overcame them in Battle, and followed King Ariovi- he filled all the Fields thitherto with dead Bodies and Spoils. them in chase, with great slaughter, three hundred furlongs, even unto the River of Rheyne : and speed, got over the River of Rheyne, and escaped with a few of his men. It is said that there amongst the Sequanes to winter there: and he himself in the mean time, thinking of the affairs at ROME, went over the Mountains into GAUL about the River of Po, being part of his Province which he had in charge. For there the River called Rubicon, divideth the reft of IT A-LY from GAUL on this side of the Alpes. Cafar lying there, did practise to make friends in Rome, because many came thither to fee him: unto whom he granted their fuits they demanded, and fent them home also, partly with liberall rewards, and partly with large promises and hope. Now during all this Conquett of the GAULS, Pompey did not consider how Cafar enterchangeably did conquer the GAULS with the Weapons of the ROMANS, and wan the ROMANS again with the Money of the GAULS. Cefar being advertised that the BELG& (which were the warlikest men of all the GAULS, and that occupied the third part of GAUL) were all up in Arms, and had raifed a great power of men together : he straight made towards them with all possible speed, and found them spoiling and over-running the Countrey of the GAULS, their Neighbours and Confederates of the ROMANS. So he gave them Battle, and they fighting cowardly, he overthrew the most part of them, which were in a Troop together; and slew such a number of them, that the ROMANS passed over deep Rivers and Lakes on foot, upon their dead bodies, the Rivers were fo full of them. After this overthrow, they that dwelt nearest unto the Sea side, and were next neighbours unto the Ocean, did yield themselves without any compulsion or fight: whereupon, he led his Army against the NERVIANS, the stoutest Warriers of all the Belge. They dwelling in the Wood-Countrey, had conveyed their Wives, Children, and Goods, into a marvellous great Forest, as far from their Enemies as they could; and being about the number of fixfcore thousand fighting men and more, they came one day and let upon Cafer, when his Army was out of order, and fortifying of his Camp, little looking to have fought that day. At the first Charge, they brake the Horsemen of the ROMANS, and compassing in the twelfth and seventh Legion, they slew all the Centurions and Captains of the Bands. And had not Cefars felf taken his Shield on his arm, and flying in amongst the barbarous People, made a lane through them that fought before him: and the tenth Legion also feeing him in danger, run unto him from the top of the Hill where they flood in Battle, and broken the Ranks of their Enemies, there had not a ROMAN escaped alive that day. But taking example of Cafars valiantness, they fought desperately beyond their power, and yet could not make the NERthe exercise of the state of the fought it out to the death, till they were all in a manner flain in the Field. It standing it at Rome, ordained that they should do Sacrifice unto the gods, and keep Feasts and solemn Proceffions fifteen days together without intermission, having never made the like Ordinance at Rome, for any Victory that ever was obtained. Because they saw the danger had been marvellous great, fo many Nations rifing as they did in Arms together against him : and further; the love of the People unto him made his Victory much more famous. For when Cefar had fet his affairs at a flay in GAUL, on the other fide of the Alpes, he alwaies used to lie about the River of Po in the Winter time, to give direction for the establishing of things at ROME, at his pleasure. For, not onely they that made fuit for Offices at ROME, were cholen Magistrates by means of Cofars Money which he gave them, with the which, bribing the People, they bought their voices, and when they were in Office, did all that they could to increase Casars power and greatness: but the greatest and chiefest men also of the Nobility, went into Luca unto him. As Pompey, Crassim, Appins, The great Prator of SARDINIA, and Nepos Proconful in Spain. Infomuch as there were at one time, Lords of Rome fixfcore Serjeants carrying Rods and Axes before the Magistrates: and above two hundred Senators befides. There they fell in Confultation, and determined that Pompey and Crassiu should again be chosen Consuls the next year following. Furthermore they did appoint, that Casar should have Money again delivered him to pay his Army; and befides, did prorogue the time of his Government hive years further. This was thought a very strange and an unreasonable matter unto unwise men. For they themselves that had taken so much Money of Cofar, perswaded the Senate tolet him have Money of the common Treasure, as though he had had none before: yea to speak more plainly, they compelled the Senate unto it, fighing and lamenting to fee the Decrees they paffed. Cato was not there then, for they had purposely sent him before into Cyprus. Howbeit Faonius that followed Cato's steps, when he saw that he could not prevail, nor withstand them, he went out of the Senate in choler, and cried out amongst the People, that it was a horrible shame. But no man did hearken to him: fome for the reverence they bare unto Pompey and Craffue; and others favouring Cafars proceedings, did put all their hope and trust in him: and therefore did quiet themselves, and ftirred not. Then Cafar returning into GAUL beyond the Alpes unto his Army, found there a great War in the Countrey. For two great Nations of GERMANY had not long before paffed over the River of RHEYNE, to conquer new Lands : and the one of these People were called 1 PES, Iper and Tenteand the other TENTERIDES. Now touching the Battle which Cefar fought with them, he him- rides, People felf doth describe it in his Commentaries, in this fort. That the barbarous People having sent Am- of Germany. bassadors unto him, to require peace for a certain time; they notwithstanding, against the Law of Arms, came and fet upon him as he travelled by the way, infomuch as eight hundred of their men of Arms, overthrew five thousand of his Horsemen; who nothing at all mistrusted their coming. Again, that they fent him other Ambassadors to mock him once more: but that he kept Gasars Horsethem, and therewith caused his whole Army to march against them, thinking it a folly and madnels, flight. to keep faith with such traiterous barbarous breakers of Leagues. Canutius writeth, that the Senate appointing again to do new Sacrifices, Frocessions and Featts, to give thanks to the gods for this Victory, Cato was of contrary opinion, that Casar should be delivered into the hands of the barbarous People, for to purge their City and Commonweal of this breach of faith, and to turn the curse upon him that was the Authour of it. Of these barbarous People, which came over the the curse upon him that was the Authour of it. Of these parparous reopic, which came over the RHEYNE (being about the number of four hundred thousand persons) they were all in a manner slain, the speraral saving a very sew of them, that slying from the Battle got over the River of RHEYNE again, who by Costar. were received by the SICAMBRIANS, another People of the GERMANS. Cafar taking this Sycambri, occasion against them, lacking no good will of himself besides, to have the honour to be counted People of the the first ROMAN that ever passed the River of RHEYNE with an Army, he built a Bridge over it. Germans. the first Roman that ever passed the River of RHEYNE with an Army, the boat a bridge of the River is marvellous broad, and runneth with great fury; and in that place specially where he Bridge overthe built his Bridge, for there it is of a great breadth from one fide to the other: and it hath fo ftrong River of and swift a stream belides, that men casting down great bodies of Trees into the River (which the Rhepne. ftream bringeth down with it) did with the great blows and force thereof marvellously shake the posts of the Bridge he had set up. But to prevent the blows of those Trees, and also to break the fury of the stream, he made a pile of great Wood above the Bridge a good way, and did forcibly ram them into the bottom of the River; fo that in ten days space he had set up and finisht his Bridge, of the goodlieft Carpenters work, and most excellent invention to see to, that could be possibly thought or devised, Then passing over his Army upon it, he found none that durst any more fight with him. For the Swevians, which were the warlikest People of all GERMANY, had gotten themselves with their Goods into wonderfull great Valleys and Boggs, full of Woods and Forests. Now when he had burnt all the Countrey of his Enemies, and confirmed a League with the Confederates of the ROMANS, he returned back again into GAUL after he had tarried eighteen days at the most in GERMANY, on the other side of the RHEYNE. The Journey he made also into England was a noble Enterprize, and very commendable. For he was the Cafars Journey first that sailed the West Ocean with an Army by Sea, and that passed through the Sea Atlanticum into England. with his Army, to make War in that fo great and famous Island (which many ancient Writers would not believe that it was so indeed, and did make them vary about it, saying it was but a sable

For twice he passed over the narrow Sea against the firm Land of Gaul, and fighting many But tles there, did hurt his Enemies more then inrich his own men : because of men hardly brought up, and poor, there was nothing to be gotten. Whereupon the War had no fuch fucces as he looked for, and therefore taking pledges onely of the King, and impoling a yearly Tribute upon him, to be payed unto the People of Rome, he returned again into Gaul. There he was no fooner landed, but he found Letters ready to be fent over the Sea unto him: in the which he was advertifed from ROME, of the death of his Daughter, that she was dead with child by Pompey. For the which Pompey, and Cefar both, were marvellous forrowfull: and their friends mourned allo, thinking that this alliance which maintained the Commonwealth (that otherwife was very tickle) in good peace and concord, was now fevered, and broken afunder; and the rather likely, because the child lived not long after the Mother. So the common People at Rome took the Corps of Julia, in despight of the Tribunes, and buried it in the Field of Mars. Now Celar being driven to divide his Army (that wasvery great) in fundry Garrisons for the Winter time, and returning again into ITALY as he was wont, all GAUL rebelled again, and had raifed great Armies in every Quarter to fet upon the ROMANS, and to affay if they could distress their Forts where they lay in Garrison. The greatest number and most warlick men of these GAULS, that entred into action of rebellion, were led by one Ambiorix: and first did set upon the Garrisons of Cotta and Titurius, whom they Cottaind Tim. flew, and all the Souldiers they had about them. Then they went with threefcore thousand fight-COSTAGNO 1 1011.

THE WHITHHER THE METERS THE CONTROL OF THE WHITH CIOCTO had in his charge, and had almost taken the control of the control them by force, because all the Souldiers were every man of them hurt: but they were so valiant and couragious, that they did more then men (as they fay) in defending of themselves. These news being come to Cafar, who was far from thence at that time, he returned with all possible speed, and leavying feven thousand Souldiers, made haste to help Cicero, that was in such diffress. The Gauss that did befiege Cicero, understanding of Cesars coming, raised their Siege incontinently, to go and meet him: making account that he was but a handfull in their hands, they were so lew. Cafar to deceive them, ftill drew back, and made as though he fled from them, lodging in places meet for a Captain that had but a few, to fight with a great number of his Enemies: and commanded his men in no wife to ftir out to skirmish with them, but compelled them to raise up the Rampiers of his Camp, and to fortifie the Gates, as men that were afraid, because the Enemies should the lefs effect of them: untill at the length he took opportunity, by their diforderly coming to affail the Trenches of his Camp, (they were grown to fuch a prefumptu-Cefar flew the ous boldness and bravery) and then fallying out upon them, he put them all to flight, with llaughter of a great number of them. This did suppress all the rebellions of the GAULS in thote parts, and furthermore he himself in person went in the middest of Winter thither, where he heard they did rebell, for that there was come a new supply out of ITALY of three whole Legions, in their room which he had loft : of the which, two of them Pompey lent him, and the other Legion he himself had levyed in Gaul about the River Po. During these stirs, brake forth The second re- the beginning of the greatest and most dangerous War that he had in GAUL, the which had bellion of the been fecretly practifed of long time by the chiefest and most Warlike People of that Coun-Guilt reginit trey, who had levied a wonderfull great Power. For every where they levied multitudes of nien, and great Riches befides, to fortifie their ftrong Holds. Furthermore, the Countrey where they rofe, was very ill to come unto, and specially ar that time, being Winter, when the Rivers were frozen, the Woods and Forests covered with Snow, the Meadows drowned with Flouds, and the Fields fo deep of Snow, that no ways were to be found, neither the Marthes nor Rivers to be differned, all was fo overflown and drowned with water: all which troubles together were enough (as they thought) to keep Cefar from fetting upon the Rebels. Many Nations of the Gauls were of this Confpiracy, but two of the chiefest were the ARVERNIANS and CAR-NUTES : who had chosen Vereingentorix for their Lieutenant-General, whose Father the GAULS before had put to death, because they thought he aspired to make himself King. This Vereingentorix dividing his Army into divers parts, and appointing divers Captains over them, had gotten to take his part, all the People and Countreys thereabouts, even as far as they that dwell towards the Sea * Adriatick, having further determined (understanding that Rome did conspire against Cafar) to make all GAUL rife in Arms against him. So that if he had but tarried a little longer, untill Cafar had entred into his Civil Wars, he had put all ITALY in as great fear and danger, as it was when the CIMBRI did come and invade them. But Cafar, that was valiant in all affayes and dangers of War, and that was very skilfull to take time and opportunity, so soon as he understood the news of this Rebellion, he departed with speed, and returned back the selffame way which he had gone, making the barbarous People know, that they should deal with an Army invincible, and which they could not possibly withstand, considering the great speed he had made with the same, in so sharp and hard a Winter. For where they would not possibly have believed, that a Post or Currier could have come in so short a time from the place where he was, unto them, they wondred when they faw him burning and deftroying the Countrey, the Towns and strong Forts where he came with his Army, taking all to mercy, that yielded unto him: untill The Helai re- fuch time as the Heddu took Arms against him, who before were wont to be called the brethren bel against the of the ROMANS, and were greatly honoured of them. Wherefore Cafur men, when they understood that they had joined with the Rebels, they were marvellongly forry, and half discouraged thereupon. Cafar departing from those parts, went through the Countrey of the LINGONES. to enter the Countrey of the * Burgonians, who were Confederates of the Romans, and * Sequani. the nearest unto ITALY on that fide, in respect of all the rest of GAUL. Thither the Enemies came to fet upon him, and to environ him on all fides, with an infinite number of thousands of fighting men. Cafar on the other fide tarried their coming, and fighting with them a long time, he made them so afraid of him, that at length he overcame the barbarous People. But at the first, it Vertingentoris. feemeth notwithstanding, that he had received some overthrow: for the ARVERNIANS shewed overthrown by a Sword hanging up in one of their Temples, which they faid they had won from Cafar. Info- Cafar. much as Celars felf coming that way by occasion, saw it, and fell a laughing at it. But some of his friends going about to take it away, he would not fuffer them, but bad them let it alone, and touch it not, for it was an holy thing. Notwithstanding, such as at the first had saved themselves by flying, the most part of them were gotten with their King into the City of ALEXIA, the which Cefar went and befieged, although it feemed inexpugnable, both for the height of the Walls, as also The Siege of for the multitude of Souldiers they had to defend it. But now during this Siege, he fell into a marvellous great danger without, almost incredible. For an Army of three hundred thousand fighting Casars danger, men, of the best men that were among all the Nations of the GAULS, came against him being at and wife policy the Siege of ALEXIA, besides them that were within the City, which amounted to the number of threefcore and ten thousand fighting men at the least: so that perceiving he was shut in betwixt two fo great Armies, he was driven to fortifie himfelf with two Walls, the one against them of the City, and the other against them without. For if those two Armies had joyned together, Casar had been Casars great unterly undone. And therefore this Siege of ALEXIA, and the Battle he wan before it, did de-lexia. fervedly win him more Honour and Fame then any other. For there, in that inftant and extream danger, he shewed more valiantness and wildom then he did in any Battle he fought before. But what a wonderfull thing was this? that they of the City never heard any thing of them that came to aid them, untill Cefar had overthrown them: and furthermore, that the ROMANS themselves which kept Watch upon the Wall that was built against the City, knew also no more of it then they. untill it was done, and that they heard the cries and lamentations of men and women in ALEXIA. when they perceived on the other fide of the City, such a number of glittering Shields of Gold and Silver, such store of bloody Corsless and Armours, such a deal of Plate and Moveables, and such a number of Tents and Pavillions after the fashion of the Gauls, which the Romans had gotten of their Spoils in their Camp. Thus suddenly was this great Army vanished, as a Dream or Vision: where the most part of them were slain that day in Battle. Furthermore, after that they within the City of ALEXIA had done great hurt to Cafar and themselves also, in the end they all Alexis yielded vielded themselves. And Vereingentoria (he that was their King and Captain in all this War) up to Cafur. went out of the Gates excellently well armed, and his Horse furn thed with a rich Caparison accordingly, and rode round about Cafar, who fate in his Chair of State. Then lighting from his Horse, he took off his Caparison and Furniture, and unarmed himself, and laid all on the ground, and went and fare down at Cafars feet, and faid never a word. So Cafar at length committed him as a Prisoner taken in the Wars, to sead him afterwards in the Triumph of Rome. Now Casar had of long time determined to destroy Pompey, and Pompey him also. For Crassus being killed amongst the PARTHIANS, who onely did fee, that one of them two must needs fall, nothing kept Casar from being the greatest person, but because he destroyed not Pompey, that was the greater : neither from being the greatest person, but because he dettroyed not rompey, that was the greater: netter the discord did any thing let Pompey to withstand that it should not come to pass, but because he did not first betwitt Casin overcome Cafar, whom onely he feared. For till then, Pompey had not long feared him, but al- and Pompey waies before let light by him, thinking it an easie matter for him to put him down when he would, and the cause fut he had brought him to that greatness he was come unto. But Cafar contrarily, having had that of the Civil drift in his head from the beginning, like a Wreftler that studieth for tricks to overthrow his Ad-Wars. versary, he went far from Rome, to exercise himself in the Wars of Gaul, where he did ness. train his Army, and presently by his valiant deeds did encrease his Fame and Honour, by these means became Cafar as famous as Pompey in his doings, and lacked no more to put his enterprile in execution, but some occasions of colour, which Pompey partly gave him, and partly also the time delivered him, but chiefly the hard fortune and ill Government at that time of the Common-wealth at ROME. For they that made fuit for Honour and Offices, bought the voices of the People with The Peoples ready Money, which they gave out openly to usury, without shame or fear. Thereupon the com- voices bought mon People, that had fold their voices for Money, came to the Market-place at the day of election, at Rome for to fight for him that had hired them: not with their voices, but with their Bows, Slings and Money. Swords. So that the Affembly seldom times brake up, but the Pulpit for Orations was defiled and sprinkled with the blood of them that were slain in the Market-place, the City remaining all that time without Government of Magistrate, like a Ship left without a Pilot. Infomuch as men of deep judgement and discretion, seeing such sury and madness of the People, thought themselves happy if the Commonwealth were no worse troubled then with the absolute state of a Monarchy and soveraign Lord to govern them. Furthermore, there were many that were not afraid to speak it openly; that there was no other help to remedy the troubles of the Commonwealth, but by the Authority of one man onely, that should command them all: and that this Medicine must be ministred by the hands of him, that was the gentlest Physician, meaning covertly Pompey. Now Pompey used many fine speeches, making semblance as though he would none of it, and yet cunningly under-hand did lay all the irons in the fire he could, to bring it to pass, that he might be chosen Dictator. Cato finding the mark he shot at, and fearing left in the end the People should be compelled to make him Dictator, he perswaded the Senate rather to make him sole Confull, that contenting himfelf with that more just and lawfull Government, he should not cover the other unlawfull. The Senate following his counfell, did not onely make him Confull, but further did prorogue his Government of the Provinces he had. For he had two Provinces, all Pomper gover- Spain and Africk, the which he governed by his Lieutenants: and further, he received yearly of the common Treasure to pay his Souldiers, a thousand Talents. Hereupon Casar took Africe. occasion also to fend his men to make suit in his name for the Consulfhip, and also to have the Cosegur menture vernment of his Provinces prorogued. Pompey at the first held his peace, but Marcellus and Lenbe Conful, and tulus (that otherwise hated Cefar) withstood them; and to shame and dishonour him, had much tohave his Go-needlels speech in matters of weight. Furthermore, they took away the freedom from the Colonies which Cefar had lately brought unto the City of Novumcomium in Gaul towards Ita-LY, where Cafar not long before had lodged them. And moreover, when Marcellus was Conful, he made one of the Senators in that City to be whipped with rods, who came to Rome about those matters: and faid, he gave him those marks, that he should know that he was no ROMAN Citizen, and bade him go his way, and tell Cefar of it. After Marcellus Confulthip, Cefar fetting open his Coffers of the Treasure he had gotten among the GAULS, did frankly give it our amongst the Ma-Cafar bribeth giftrates at Rome, without reftraint or spare. First, he set Carro the Tribune clean out of debt: the Magistrates and gave also unto Paul the Consult a thousand five hundred Talents; with which Money he built that notable Palace by the Market-place, called Pauls Bafilick, in the place of Fulvius Bafilick. Then Pon pey being atraid of this practice, began openly to procure, both by himself and his friends, that they should fend Cafar a Successor: and moreover, he sent unto Cafar for his two Legions of men of War which he had lent him, for the conquest of Gaul. Cefar fent him them again, and gave every private Souldier two hundred and faity filver Drachma's. Now, they that brought thele two Legionsback from Cafar, gave out ill and feditious words against him among the People, and did also abuse Pompey with false perswassons and vain hopes, informing him that he was marvellouly desired and wished for in Cesars Camp: and though in Rome, for the malice and fecret spight which the Governours there did bear him, he could hardly obtain that he desired, yet in GAUL he might affure himfelf, that all the Army was at his commandment. They added further also, that if the Souldiers there did once return over the Mountains again into ITALY, they would all straight come to him, they did so hate Cefar, because he wearied them with too much labour, and continual fight: and withall, for that they suspected he aspired to be King. These words breeding security in Pompey, and a vain conceit of himself, made him negligent in his doings, so that he made no preparation of War, as though he had no occasion to be alraid: but onely studied to thwart Cafar in speech, and to cross the suits he made. Howbeit Cafar passed not of all this, For the report went, that one of Cafars Captains which was fent to Rome to profecute his Suit, being at the Senate door, and hearing that they denied to prorogue Cefars time of Government which he fued for, clapping his hand upon his Sword, he faid: Sith he will not grant it him, this shall give it him. Notwithstanding, the requests that Cafar propounded, carried great semblance of rea-Cafars request ion with them. For he said, that he was contented to lay down Arms, so that Pompey did the like: and that both of them as private persons should come and make suit of their Citizens to obtain honourable recompence : declaring unto them, that taking Arms from him, and granting them unto Pompey, they did wrongfully accuse him in going about to make himself a Tyrant, and in the mean time to grant the other means to be a Tyrant. Curio making these offers and perswasions openiy before the People, in the name of Cefar, he was heard with great rejoycing and clapping of hands, and there was fome that caft Flowers and Nofegays upon him when he went his way, as they commonly use to do unto any man, when he hath obtained victory, and wan the Games. Then Antonius one of the Tribunes, brought a Letter fent from Cefar, and made it openly to be read in despight of the Consuls. But Scipio in the Senare, Pompeys Father-in-law, made this motion: that if Cefar did not dismisshis Army by a certain day appointed him, the ROMANS should proclaim him an enemy unto ROME. Then the Consuls openly asked him in the presence of the Senators, if they thought it good that Pompey should dismiss his Army: but sew agreed to that demand. After that again they asked, if they liked that Cofar should dismis his Army: thereto they all in manner and wered yea, yea. But when Antoniss requested again that both of them should lay down Arms, then they were all indifferently of his mind. Notwithstanding, because Scipio did infolently behave himself, and Marcellus also, who cried, that they must use force of Arms, and not mens opinion against a Thief, the Senate rose straight upon it, without further determination; and men changed Apparell through the City because of this diffention, as they use to do in a common calamity. After that, there came other Letters from Cafar, which feemed much more reasonable: in the which he requested that they would grant him GAUL, that lieth between the Mountains of the Alpes and ITALY and ILLIBIA, with two Legions onely, and then that he would request nothing elfe, untill he made fuit for the second Consulship. Cicero the Orator, that was newlycome from the Government of CILICIA, travelled to reconcile them together, and pacified Pompey the best he could: who told him he would yield to any thing he would have him, so he did let him alone with his Army. So Cicero perswaded Casars friends to be contented, to take those two Provinces, and vielded unto it, and granted them. But Lentulus the Conful would not agree to it, but thamefully drave Curio and Antonius out of the Senate: whereby they themselves gave Cafar a happy occasion ers Cart. For they were driven for fear to steal out of ROME, disguised in that manner. Now at Carto Tribunes that time, Cafar had not in all about him above five thousand Footmen, and three thousand Horse fly from Rome men: for the rest of his Army, he lest on the other side of the Mountains, to be brought after him to Costir. by his Lieutenants. So confidering that for the execution of his Enterprize, he should not need so many men of War at the first, but rather suddenly stealing upon them, to make them afraid with valiantness, taking benefit of the opportunity of time; because he should more easily make his Enemies afraid of him, coming fo fuddenly when they looked not for him, then he should otherwise distress them, affailing them with his whole Army, in giving them leifure to provide further for him: he commanded his Captains and Lieutenants to go before, without any other Armour then their Swords, to take the City of ARIMINUM (a great City of GAUL, being the first City mencome to, when they come out of GAUL) with as little bloodfled and tumult, as they could possible. Then committing that Force and Army he had with him, unto Hortenfine one of his friends, he remained a whole day together, openly in the fight of every man, to fee the Sword-players handle their Weapons before him. At night he went into his Lodging, and bathing his body a little, came afterwardsinto the Hall amongst them, and made merry a while with them, whom he had bidden to Supper. Then when it was well forward night, and very dark, he rose from the Table, and prayed his company to be merry, and no man to ftir, for he would straight come to them again: howbeit he had fecretly before commanded a few of his trustiest friends to follow him, not all together, but fome one way, and fome another way. He himself in the mean time took a Coach he had hired, and made as though he would have gone fome other way at the first, but suddenly he turned back again towards the City of ARIMINUM. When he was come unto the little Ri- Cafars doubtver of RUBICON, which divided GAUL on this fide the Alpes from ITALY, he stayed upon a fud-full thoughts den. For, the nearer he came to execute his purpose, the more remorse he had in his conscience, at the River of to think what an Enterprize he took in hand : and his thoughts also fell out more doubtfull. Rubicon. when he entred into confideration of the desperateness of his attempt. So he fell into many thoughts with himself, and spake never a word, waving sometime one way, sometime another way, and oftentimes changed his determination, contrary to himself. So did he talk much also with his friends he had with him, amongst whom was Alinius Pollio, telling him what mischiefs the beginning of this paffage over that River would breed in the World, and how much their Pofterity and they that lived after them, would speak of it in time to come, but at length casting from him with a noble courage all those perillous thoughts to come, and speaking these words which valiant men commonly say, that attempt dangerous and desperate Enterprizes: A man can be but The Greeke once undone, come on, he passed over the River; and when he was come over, he ran with his use this phrase Coach, and never stayed, so that before day-light he was within the City of ARIMINUM, and took of speech: Cast neither by any perswasion of reason bridle such a confused and disorderly multitude : so that Rome had in manner destroyed it self for lack of rule and order. For in all places, men were of contrary opinions, and there were dangerous stirs and tumults every where, because they that were glad of this trouble, could keep in no certain place, but running up and down the City, when they met with others in divers places, that feemed either to be afraid or angry with this tumult (as otherwise it is impossible in so great a City) they flatly fell out with them, and boldly threatned them with that that was to come. Pompey himself, who at that time was not a little amazed, was yet much more troubled with the ill words fome gave him on the one fide, and some on the other.

For some of them reproved him, and said, that he had done wisely, and had paid for his folly because he had made Cesar fo great and strong against him and the Commonwealth. And other again did blame him, because he had resuled the honest offers and reasonable conditions of peace, which Cafar had offered him, fuffering Lentulus the Confull to abuse him too much. On the other fide, Phaonius fpake unto him, and bade him ftamp on the ground with his foot : for Pompey being one day in a bravery in the Senate, faid openly: Let no man take thought for preparation of War, for when he lifted, with one stamp of his foot on the ground, he would fill all ITALY with Souldiers. This notwithstanding, Pompey at that time had a greater number of Souldiers then Cafar: but they would never let him follow his own determination. For they brought him fo many lies, and put fo many examples of fear before him, as if Cafar had been at other times, but whole Cities themselves leaving their Habitations, fled from one place to another through all ITALY. And ROME it felf also was immed ately filled with the flowing repair of all Rome in uprote the People their neighbours thereabouts, which came thither from all parts like droves of Cattle, with Cafars and colour as could be, ftirring up his Souldiers the more against them, when he shewed them these two Noblemen and Tribunes of the People that were driven to fly, difguifed like Slaves in a Carri- Antonius and it. It is faid, that the night before he passed over this liver, he dreamed a damnable Dream, that Castar took the he carnally knew his Mother. The City of ARIMINUM being taken, and the rumour thereof dif- City of Arimiperfed through all ITALY, even as if it had been open War both by Sea and Land, and as if all num. the Laws of Rome, together with the extream Bounds and Confines of the same had been bro- Casars damnaken up : a man would have said, that not onely the men and women for fear, as experience proved ble Dream.

already at their heels, and had won all: so that in the end he yielded unto them, and gave place to their fury and madness, determining (feeing all things in such tumult and garboil) that there was no way but to forfake the City, and thereupon commanded the Senate to follow him, and not a man to tarry there, unless he loved. Tyranny more then his own Liberty and the Commonwealth. Thus the Confuls themselves, before they had done their common Sacrifices accustomed at their going out of the City, fledevery man of them. So did likewise the most part of the Senators, taking their own things in half, such as came first to hand, as if by stealth they had taken them from another own things in half, such as came first to hand, as if by stealth they had taken them from another own things in half, such as came first to hand, as if by stealth they had taken them from another own things in half, such as came first to hand, as if by stealth they had taken them from another own things in half, such as came first to hand, as if by stealth they had taken them from another own things in half, such as came first to hand, as if by stealth they had taken them from another own things in half, such as came first to hand, as if by stealth they had taken them from another own things in half, such as came first to hand, as if by stealth they had taken them from another own things in half, such as came first to hand, as if by stealth they had taken them from another own the stealth they had taken them from another own things in half, such as came first to hand, as if by stealth they had taken them from another own the stealth they had taken them from another own the stealth they had taken them from another own the stealth they had taken the stealth the st ther. And there were some of them also that always loved Cefar, whose wits were then so troubled, and besides themselves with the sear they had conceived, that they also sled, and followed the stream of this tumult, without manifest cause or necessity. But above all things, it was a lamentable fight to see the City it selt, that in this fear and trouble was left at all adventure, as a Ship toffed in storm of Sea, for faken of her Pilots, and despairing of her safety. This their departure being thus miserable, yet men esteemed their banishment (for the love they bare unto Pompey) to be their natural Countrey, and reckoned Rome no better then Casar's Camp. At that time also Labienus, who was fook C-[47, and one of Cafar's greatest friends, and had been alwaies used as his Lieutenant in the Wars of GAUL, fled to Pompey, and had valiantly fought in his cause, he likewise for fook him then, and fled unto Pompey. But Cafur fent his Money and Carriage after him, and then went and encamped before the City of CORFI-NIUM, the which Domitius kept with thirty Cohorts or Enfigns. When Domitius faw he was befieged, he straight thought himself but undone; and despairing of his success, he bade a Physician, a Slave of his, give him poylon. The Physician gave him a drink which he drank, thinking to have died. But shortly after, Domitius hearing them report what elemency and wonderfull courtesse Ca-far used unto them he took, repented him then that he had drunk this drink, and began to lament went straight where he thought to find Pompey himself. But Pompey tarried not his coming, but fled into the City of BRUNDUSIUM, from whence he had sent the two Consuls before with that Army he had, unto Dyrrachium: and he himself also went thither afterwards, when he understood that Casar was come, as you shall hear more amply hereaster in his Life. Casar lacked no good will to follow him, but wanting Ships to take the Seas, he returned forthwith to ROME:

fo that in less then threescore days he was Lord of all ITALY, without any bloodshed. Who when he was come to ROME, and found it much quieter then he looked for, and many Senators, and bewail his desperate resolution taken to die. The Physician did comfort him again, and told Domitius elea- him that he had taken a drink, onely to make him fleep, but not to destroy him. Then Domitius Domittal cica min that he had careful units, onesy to make thin heep, but not to definely him. Then Domittal ped from Carrejoyced, and went flraight and yielded himself unto \(\int_{\text{e}} \) far, who gave him his life, but the notwithped form Carrejoyced, and went flraight and yielded himself unto \(\int_{\text{e}} \) far, who gave him his life, but the notwithped form Carrejoyced, and went flraight and yielded himself unto \(\int_{\text{e}} \) more per. When thele news were brought to Rome, for they did marvelloully rejoyce and comfort them that fill remained there; and moreover there were they did marvelloully rejoyce and comfort them that fill remained there; and moreover there were of them that had fortaken ROME, which returned thither again. In the mean time Cefar did put all Domitisus men in pay, and he did the like through all the Cities, where he had taken any Captains that levied men for Pompey. Now Cafar having affembled a great and dreadfull Power together, there also, he courteoully entreated them, and prayed them to send unto Pompey, to pacific all matters between them, upon reasonable Conditions. But no man did attempt it, either because they feared Pompey, for that they had forfaken him, or elfe for that they thought Cafar meant not as he spake, but that they were words of course, to colour his purpose withall. And when Merellus also, one of the Tribunes, would not suffer him to take any of the common Treasure out of the Temple of Saturn, but told him that it was against the Law; Tush, said he, time of War and Law, are two things. If this that I do, quoth he, do offend thee, then get thee hence for this time: for War cannot abide this frank and bold speech. But when Wars are done, and that we are all quiet again, then thou shalt speak in the Pulpit what thou wilt : and yet I do tell thee this of favour, impairing fo much my right, for thou art mine, both thou, and all them that have rifen against me, and whom I have in my hands. When he had spoken thus unto Merellus, he went to the Temple door where the Treasure lay, and finding no keys there, he caused Smiths to be sent for, and made them break open the locks. Metellus thereupon began again to withfrand him, and certain men the Temple of that stood by, praised him in his doing: but Casar at length speaking bigly to him, threatned him, he would kill him prefently, if he troubled him anymore: and told him furthermore, Young man, quoth he, thou knowest it is harder for me to tell it thee, then to do it. That word made Metellus quake for fear, that he got him away roundly; and ever after that, Cefar had all at his commandment for the Wars. From thence he went into Spain, to make War with Petreius and Var-Cofurs Journy 10, Pompey's Lieutenants: first to get their Armies and Provinces into his hands which they governed, anto spain, 2 gaing Pampey that afterwardshe might follow Pompey the better, leaving never an Enemy behind him. In this Lieutenants. Journey he was oftentimes himself in danger, through the Ambushes that were laid for him in di-Cofar Dictator vers strange sorts and places, and likely also to have lost his Army for lack of Victuals. All this notwithstanding, he never left following of Pompey's Lieutenants, provoking them to Battle, and intrenching them in, untill he had gotten their Camp, and Armies into his hands, albeit that the Lieutenants themselves fled unto Pompey. When Casar returned again to Rome, Piso his Father-in-law gave him counsell to fend Ambassadors unto Pompey, to treat for peace. But Ifauricus, to flatter (esar, was against it. Cesar being then created Dictator by the Senate, called home again all the banished men, and restored their children to honour, whose fathers before had been flain in Sylla's time : and did somewhat cut off the usuries that did oppress them; and besides, did make to me fuch other Ordinances as those, but very few. For he was Dictator but eleven days onely, and then did yield it up of himself, and made himself Consul with Servilius Isauricus, and Casarand Island after that determined to follow the Wars. All the reft of his Army he left coming on the way, riens Confuls, behind him, and went himself before with fix bundred Horse, and five Legions onely of Footmen, in the Winter-Quarter, about the Moneth of January, which after the ATHENIANS is called Posidion. Then having past over the Sea IONIUM, and landed his men, he wan the Cities of ORI-CUM and APOLLONIA. Then he fent his Ships back again unto BRUNDUSIUM to transport the rest of his Souldiers that could not come with that speed he did. They as they came by the way, Casar goeth into the Kine (like men whose strength of body and lusty youth was decayed) being wearied with so many sun almost extreme. dry Battles as they had fought with their Enemies, complained of Cafar in this fort. To what end Complaints of and purpose doth this man hale us after him, up and down the World, using us like Slaves and the old Souldi-Drudges? It is not our Armour, but our bodies that bear the blows away: and what, shall we ers against never be without our Harness on our backs, and our Shields on our arms? should not Cafar think, at the least when he feeth our blood and wounds, that we are all mortal men, and that we feel the mifery and pains that other men do feel? and now even in the dead of Winter, he putteth us unto the mercy of the Sea and tempest, yea which the gods themselves cannot withstand, as if he fled before his Enemies, and purfued them not. Thus spending time with this talk; the Souldiers still marching on, by small Journeys came at length unto the City of BRUNDUSIUM. But when they were come, and found that Cafar had already passed over the Sea, then they straight changed their complaints and minds. For they blamed themselves, and took on also with their Captains, because they had not made them make more haste in marching; and sitting upon the Rocks and Cliffs of the Sea, they looked over the main Sea, towards the Realm of Epirus, to fee if they could discern the Ships returning back, to transport them over. Casar in the mean time being in the City of APOLLONIA, having but a small Army to fight with Pompey, it grieved him for that the rest of his Army was so long in coming, not knowing what way to take. In the end he followed a A great advendangerous determination, to imbarque unknown in a little Pinnace of twelve Oars onely to pass ture of Casiar. over the Sea again unto BRUNDUSIUM, the which he could not do without great danger, confidering that all the Sea was full of Pompey's Ships and Armies. So he took Ship in the night, apparelled like a Slave, and went aboard upon this little Pinnace, and faid never a word, as if he had been some poor man of mean condition. The Pinnace lay in the mouth of the River of Anius, Anius st. the which commonly was wont to be very calm and quier, by reason of a little wind that came from the shore, which every morning drave back the waves far into the main Sea. But that night (by ill fortune) there came a great wind from the Sea, that overcame the Land-wind, infomuch as the force and strength of the River fighting against the violence of the rage and waves of the Sea, the encounter was marvellous dangerous, the water of the River being driven back, and rebounding upward, with great noise and danger in turning of the water. Thereupon the Master of the Pinnace feeing he could not possibly get out of the mouth of this River, bade the Mariners to cast about again, and to return against the stream. Cafar hearing that, straight discovered himself unto the Master of the Pinnace, who at the first was amazed when he saw him; but Casar then taking him by the hand, said unto him, Good sellow, be of good chear, and forwards heartily, sear not, for thou hast Cafar and his fortune with thee. Then the Mariners forgetting the danger of the storm they were in, laid on load with Oars, and laboured for life what they could against the wind, to get out of the mouth of this River. But at length, perceiving they laboured in vain, and that the Pinnace took in abundance of water, and was ready to fink, Cafar then to his great grief was driven to return back again: who when he was returned into his Camp, his Souldiers came in great companies unto him, and were very forry, that he miftrufted he was not able with them alone to overcome his Enemies, but would put his person in danger to go fetch them that were absent, putting no trust in them that were present. In the mean time Antonius arrived, and brought with him the Casus dangers rest of his Army from BRUNDUSIUM. Then Cefar finding himself strong enough, went and of fered Pompey Battle, who was passingly well lodged, for victualling of his Camp both by Sea and Epirus. Land. Cofar on the other fide, who had no great plenty of Victuals at the first, was in a very hard case: insomuch as his men gathered roots, and mingled them with milk, and eat them. Furthermore, they did make bread of it also, and sometime when they skirmished with the Enemies, and came along by them that watched and warded, they caft of their bread into their Trenches, and faid: that as long as the earth brought forth such fruits, they would never leave besieging of Pompey. But Pompey straightly commanded them, that they should neither carry those words nor bread into their Camp, fearing left his mens hearts would fail them, and that they would be afraid when they should think of their Enemies hardness, with whom they had to fight, sith they were weary with no pains, no more then bruite Beafts. Cafars men did daily skirmilh hard to the Trenches of Pompey's Camp, Gafars Army fled from Ponty in the which Cafar had ever the better, faving once onely, at which time his men fled with fuch fear, that all his Camp that day was in great hazard to have been cast away. For Pompey came on with his Battle upon them, and they were not able to abide it, but were fought with, and driven into their Camp, and their Trenches were filled with dead bodies, which were flain within the very Gate and Bulwarks of their Camp, they were so valiantly pursued. Cafar stood before them that fled, to make them to turn head again, but he could not prevail. For when he would have taken the En-figns to have flayed them, the Enfign-bearers threw them down on the ground: fo that the Enemies took two and thirty of them, and Cafars felf also cleaped hardly with the For the great big Souldier that fled by him, commanding him to flay, and turn his face to his Enemy: the Souldier being afraid, lift up his Sword to strike at Cefar. But one of Cefars Pages preventing him, gave him fuch a blow with his Sword, that he strake off his shoulder. Cafar that day was brought unto fo great extremity, that (if Pompey had not either for fear, or spightfull fortune, lest off to follow his Victory, and retired into his Camp, being contented to have driven his Enemies into their Camp) returning to his Camp with his friends, he faid unto them: The Victory this day had been our Enemies, if they had had a Captain that could have told how to have overcome. So when he was come to his Lodging, he went to bed, and that night troubled him more then any night that ever he croy.

Coffee troubled had. For still his mind ran with great forrow of the foul fault he had committed, in leading of his Army, of self-will to remain there so long by the Sea side, his Enemies being the stronger by Sea, confidering that he had before him a goodly Countrey, rich and plentifull of all things, and goodly Cities of MACEDON and THESSALY: and had not the wit to bring the War from thence, but to lose his time in a place, where he was rather besieged of his Enemies, for lack of Victuals, then that he did beliege them by force of Arms. Thus fretting and chafing to fee himself so straightned with Victuals, and to think of his ill luck, he raifed his Camp, intending to go fet upon scipio, making account that either he should draw Pompey to Battle against his will, when he had not the Sea at his back to surnish him with plenty of Victuals; or else that he should easily overcome Pompeys deter- Scipio, finding him alone, unless he were aided. This remove of Cefars Camp, did much encourage Pompey's Army, and his Captains, who would needs in any case have followed after him, as though he had been overcome, and had fled. But for Pompey himself, he would in no respect hazard Battle, which was a matter of so great importance. For finding himself so well provided of all things necessary to tarry time, he thought it better to draw this War out in length, by tract of time, the rather to confume this little Arength that remained in Cafars Army : of the which, the best men were marvellous well trained, and good Souldiers, and for valiantness at one days Battle, were incomparable. But on the other fide again, to remove here and there so oft, and to fortifie their Camp where they came, and to befiege any Wall, or to keep watch all night in their Armour: the most part of them could not do it, by reason of their age, being then unable to away with their pains; so that the weakness of their bodies did also take away the life and courage of their hearts. Furthermore, there fell a pestilent disease among them, that came by ill meats hunger drave them to eat. Yet was not this the worst : for besides, he had no store of Money, neither could tell how to come by Victuals; fo that it feemed in all likelihood, that in very short time he would come to nothing. For these respects, Pompey would in no case fight, and yet had he but Cato onely of his mind in that, who stuck in it the rather, because he would avoid shedding of his Countreymens blood. For when Cato had viewed the dead bodies slain in the Camp of his Enemies, at the last Skirmish that was between them, the which were no less then a thousand persons, he covered his face, and went away weeping. All other but he, contrarily fell out with him, and blamed him, because he folong retrained from Battle: and some prickt him forward, and called him Agamemnon, and King of Kings, saying that he delayed this War in this fort, because he would not leave his Authority to command them all, and that he was glad alwaies to fee many Captains round about him, which came to his Lodgings to honour him, and wait upon him. And Faonim also a hair-brain'd fellow, frankly counterfeiting the round and plain speech of Cato, made as though he was marvellous angry, and faid : Is it not great piry, that we shall not eat this year of THUS CULIUM Figs, and all for Pompey's ambitious mind to reignalone? and Africanus, who not long before was but lately come out of SPAIN (where because he had but ill success, he was acculed of Treason, that for Money he had fold his Army unto Casar) he went bufily asking, why they fought not with that Merchant, unto whom they faid he had fold the Province of SPAIN? So that Pompey with these kind of speeches, against his will, was driven to follow Cesar to fight with him. Then was Cafar at the first, marvellously perplexed and troubled by the way, because he found none that would give him any Victuals, being despited of every man, for the late loss and overthrow he had received. But after he had taken the City of GOMPHES in THESSALY, he did not onely meet with plenty of Victuals to relieve his Army with, but he ftrangely also did rid them of their Difease. For the Souldiers meeting with plenty of Wine, drinking hard, and making merry, drave away the infection of the Peftilence. For they disposed themselves unto dancing, masking, and playing the BACCHERIANS by the way, infomuch that drinking drunk they overcame their discase, and made their bodies new again. When they both came into the Countrey of PHARSA-LIA, and both Camps lay before each other, Pompey returned again to his former determination, and the rather, because he had ill signs and tokens of missortune in his sleep. For he thought in his sleep, that when he entred into the Theatre, all the ROMANS received him with great clapping of hands. Whereupon they that were about him grew to fuch boldness and fecurity, affuring themselves of Victory, that Domitius, Spinther, and Scipio, in a bravery contended between themselves for the chief Bishoprick which Cesar had. Furthermore, there were divers that sent unto ROME to hire the nearest Houses unto the Market-place, as being the fittest places for Prætors, and Confuls: making their account already, that those Offices could not scape them, incontinently after the Wars. But besides those, the young Gentlemen, and ROMAN Knights were marvellous desirous to fight, that were bravely mounted, and armed with glistering gilt Armours, their Horses fat and very finely kept, and themselves goodly young men, to the number of seven thousand, where the Gentlemen of Cafars fide were but one thousand onely. The number of his Footmen also were much after the fame reckoning. For he had five and fourty thousand a- Pompeys Army gainst two and twenty thousand. Wherefore Cofar called his Souldiers together, and told them as great again how Cornificius was at hand who brought two whole Legions, and that he had fifteen +ntigens as Cafari. led by Calenm, the which he made to stay about MEGARA and ATHENS. Then he asked them, if they would tarry for that aid or not, or whether they would rather themselves alone venture Battell. The Souldiers cried out to him, and prayed him not to deler Battell, but rather to devise fome fetch to make the Enemy fight as foon as he could. Then as he facrificed unto the gods, for the purifying of his Army, the first Beast was no sooner facrificed, but his Soothsayer affured him that he should fight within three dayes. Cefar asked him again, if he saw in the Sacrifices, any lucky fign or token of good luck. The Soothfayer answered: for that, thou shalt answer thy self, better then I can do: for the gods do promife us a marvellous great change and alteration of things that are now, unto another clean contrary. For if thou beeft well now, doeft thou think to have worfe fortune hereafter? and if thou be ill, affure thy felt thou shalt have better. The night before A wonder seen the Battell, as he went about midnight to visit the Watch, men saw a great Fire brand in the Ele- in the Element, all of a light fire, that came over Cafars Camp, and fell down in Pompeys. In the morning ment, before also when they relieved the Watch, they heard a false Alarm in the Enemies Camp, with the Butel in out any apparent cause: which they commonly call a suddain fear, that makes men besides themfelves. This notwithstanding, Cafar thought not to fight that day, but was determined to have raifed his Camp from thence, and to have gone towards the City of Scotusa; and his Tents in his Camp were already overthrown when his Scouts came in with great speed, to bring him news that his Enemies were preparing themselves to fight. Then was he very glad, and after he had made his prayers unto the gods to help him that day, he fet his men in Battell-ray, and divided them into three Squadrons, giving the middle Battell unto Domitius Calvinus, and the left Wing unto Cafirs Army Antenism, and placed himself in the right Wing, chusing h s place to fight in the tenth Legion. But and his order feeing that against that , his Enemies had set all their Horsemen , he was half afraid when he saw the of Bartell , in great number of them, and so brave besides. Wherefore he closely made six Ensigns to come Phanfalia. from the rereward of his Battell, whom he had laid as an ambush behind his right Wing, having first appointed his Souldiers what they should do, when the Horsemen of the Enemies came to give them charge. On the other fide, Pompey placed himself in the right Wing of his Battell, gave Pompey Army the left Wing unto Domitiu, and the middle Battell unto Scipio his Father-in-law. Now all the and his order ROMAN Knights (as we have told you before) were placed in the left Wing of purpose to environ Cafars right Wing behind, and to give their hottest Charge there, where the Generall of their Enemies was: making their account, that there was no Squadron of Footmen, how thick foever they were, that could receive the charge of fo great a Troop of Horiemen, and that at the first onset they should overthrow them all, and march upon their Bellies. When the Trumpets on either fide did found the Alarm to the Battell', Pompey commanded his Footmen that they should stand still without stirring, to receive the charge of their Enemies, untill they came to throwing of their Darts. Wherefore Casar afterwards faid, that Pompey had committed a foul fault, not to confider that the charge which is given running with fury, belides that it giveth the more ftrength also unto their An ill counsell blowes, doth fet mens hearts also on fire: for the common hurling of all the Souldiers that run and foul fault together, is unto them as a box on the ear that fets men on fire. Then Cafar making his Battell of Pompey. march forward to give the onfet, saw one of his Captains (a valiant man , and very skilfull in War, in whom he had also great confidence) speaking to his souldiers that he had under his charge encouraging them to fight like men that day. So he called him aloud by his Name, and faid unto him: Well, Cassim Crassinus, what hope shall we have to day? how are we determined. to fight it out manfully? Then Craffinius casting up his hand, answered him aloud: This day O Cafar, we shall have a Noble Victory, and I promise theeere night thou shalt praise me alive or dead. When he had told him fo, he Was himself the foremost man that gave charge upon his Enemies, with his Band following of him, being about fix-score men; and making a lane through the foremost Rank, with great slaughter he entred far into the Battell of his Enemies, untill that valiantly fighting in this fort, he was thrust in at length into the mouth with a Sword, that the point of it came out again at his Neck. Now the Footmen of both Battels be- The Batell in ing come to the Sword, the Horsemen of the left Wing of Pompey did march as fiercely also, sprea- the Fields of ding out their Troops to compass in the right Wing of Calary Battell. But before they began to Phusfatts. give charge, the fix Enfigns of Footmen which Cafar had laid in ambush behind him; they began to run full upon them, not throwing away their Darts far off, as they were wont to do, neither striking their Enemies on the thighes nor on the Legs, but to feek to hit them full in the eyes, and to hurt them in the face, as Cafar had taught them. For he hoped that these lusty young Cafari Strata-Gentlemen that had not been often in the Wars , nor were used to see themselves hurt , and the which, being in the prime of their youth and beauty, would be afraid of those hurts, as well for the fear of the present danger to be slain, as also for that their faces should not for ever be deformed. As indeed it came to pass, for they could never abide that they should come so near their faces with the points of their Darts, but hung down their heads for fear to be hit with them in their eyes, and turned their backs, covering their face, because they should not be hurt. Then, breaking of themselves, they began at length cowardly to slie, and were occasion also men from the other Wing of his Battell, fo scattered and dispersed, flying away, forgatthat he was any more Pompey the Great, which he had been before, but was rather like a man whose wits the gods had taken from him, being afraid and amazed with the flaughter fent from above, and so retired into his Tent, speaking never a word, and sate there to see the end of this Battell; untill at the length all his Army being overthrown and put to flight, the Enemies came, and got up upon the Rampiers and defence of his Camp, and fought hand to hand with them that flood to defend the same. Then as a man come to himself again, he spake but this onely word: What, even in our Camp? So in haft, cafting off his Coat-Armour and Apparell of a Generall, he shitted him, and put on such as became his miserable Fortune, and so stole out of his Camp. Pompey: Bight. Furthermore, what he did after this overthrow, and how he had put himself into the hands of the ÆGYPTIANS, by whom he was miferably slain, we have set it forth at large in his Life. Then Calar entring into Pompeys Camp, and feeing the bodies layed on the ground that were flain, and others also that were a killing, faid, feeching a great figh: It was their own doing, and against my will. For Cuim Cafar, after he had won to many famous Conquests, and overcome to many great Battels, had been utterly condemned notwithstanding, if he had departed from his Army. Afinim Pollio writeth, that he spake these words then in Latin, which he afterwards wrote in Greek; and faith furthermore, that the most part of them which were put to the Sword in Brutarthattlew the Camp, were Slaves and Bondmen, and that there were not flain in all this Battell above fix Cafer taken thouland Souldiers. As for them that were taken Priloners, Cafar did put many of them amongst millioners at the transfer of the camp of them amongst millioners. priloner at the his Legions, and did pardon also many men of estimation, among whom Brutu was one, that afterwards flew Casar himself: and it is reported, that Casar was very forry for him, when he could not immediatly be found after the Battell, and that he rejoyced again when he knew he was signs and tobefore this Battell, but the notablest of all other that happened to him, was in the City of TRAL-LES. For in the Temple of Victory, within the same City, there was an Image of Casar, and the Earth all about it very hard of it self, and was paved besides with very hard Stone: and yet some control of the self of the sel fay that there sprang up a Palm hard by the Base of the same Image. In the City of PADUA, Cains A firinge tale Correlins an excellent Soothfayer, (a Countreyman and Friend of Tim Livius the Historiographer) A strange tale was by chance at that time fet to behold the slying of Birds. He (as Livie reporteth) knew the veor cornering on ry time when the Battell began, and told them that were prefent, Even now they give the onfet on both sides, and both Armies do meet at this instant. Then sitting down again to consider of the Birds, after he had bethought him of the Signs, he fuddainly rose upon histeet, and cried out as a man possessed with some Spirit: O Casar the Victory is thine. Every man wondering to see him, he took the Crown he had on his head, and made an Oath that he would never put it on again, till the event of his Prediction had proved his art true. Livie testifieth, that it came so to pals. Cefar afterwards giving freedom unto the THESSALIANS, in respect of the Victory which he wan in their Countrey, he followed after Pompey. When he came into Asia, he gave freedom alfo unto the Guidians for Theopompas fake, who had gathered the Fables together. He did release Asia also, the third part of the Tribute which the Inhabitants paid unto the Romans. Then he came into ALEXANDRIA after Pompey was slain : and deterted Theodorus that prefented him Pompeys head, and turned his head aside because he would not see it. Notwithstanding, he took Cofars clemen his Seal and beholding it, wept. Furthermore, he courteously used all Pompeys friends and familia cy in Victory ars, who wandring up and down the Countrey, were taken of the King of EGYPT, and wan them all to be at his Commandment. Continuing these courtes; he wrote unto his friends at The cause of Roma, that the greatest pleasure he took of his Victory, was, that he daily faved the lives of some of his Countreymen that bore armes against him. And for the War he made in ALEXANDRIA, or ms Countrymen that bute arms against the willingly did it for the love of Cleopatra: wherein Alexandria.

The standard of Publinus the the King of EGYPTS Ministers but specially on Pathinus the Eunuch, who bearing the greatest Eunuen caused from the Kings Servants, after he had caused Pompey to be slain, and driven Cleopatra from the Court, secretly laid wait all the ways he could, how he might likewise kill Casar. Wherefore Casar hearing an inkling of it, began thenceforth to spend all the night long in featting and banqueting, that his person might be in the better safety. But besides all this, Pathinus the Eunuch spake many things openly not to be born, onely to shame Cesar, and to stir up the People to envie him. For he made his Souldiers have the worft and oldest Wheat that could be gotten: then if they did complain of it, he rold them they must be contented, seeing they ear at another mans cost. And he would ferve them also at the Table in treen and Earthen-dishes, saying that Casar had alway all their Gold and Silver, for a debt that the Kings Father (that then reigned) did owe unto him: which was, a thousand seven hundred and firty Myriades, whereof Casar had before forgiven seven hundred and fitty thousand unto his Children. Howbeit then he asked a Million to pay his Souldiers withall. Thereto Pothinua answered him, that at that time he should do better to follow his other causes of greater importance, and afterwards that he should at more leafure recover his debt with the Kings go od will and favour. Cafar replied unto him, and faid, that he would not ask counsell of the ÆGYPTIANS for his Affairs, but would be paid : and thereupon fecretly fent for Cleopaira, which was in the Countrey, to come unto him. She onely taking Apollodorus SICILIAN of all her friends, a little Boat , and went away with him in it in the night, and came and landed hard by the foot of the Caftle. Then having no other mean to come into the Court without being known, she laid her Cleopatra came felf down upon a Mattress or Flock-bed, which Apollodorus her friend tied and bound up together to Cafar. like a bundle with a great Leather-thong, and so took her upon his back and brought her thus Cleopatra true like a bungle with a great Leaunce mong, and to specify the state of t that made Calar to love her: but afterwards, when he faw her fweet convertation and pleasant enter- fo brought to trainment, he fell then in further liking with her, and did reconcileher again unto her Brother the Galar, upon King, with condition, that they two joyntly should reign together. Upon this new reconciliation, Apollodorus a great Feast being prepared, a Slave of Casars that was his Barber, the fearfullest wretch that lived fill bufily preying and liftening abroad in every corner, being miftruftfull by nature, found that Poshinus and Achillas did lie in wait to kill his Mafter Cafar. This being proved unto Cafar, he did fet fuch fure warch about the Hall, where the Feaft was made, that in fine, he flew the Eunuch Puthinus himself. Achillus on the other side, saved himself, and fled unto the Kings Camp . where he raifed a marvellous dangerous and difficult War for Cefar; because he having then but a few men about him, was to fight against a great and strong City. The first danger he fell into, was the want of Water: for that his Enemies had ftopped the mouth of the Pipes, the which conveyed the Water into the Castle. The second danger he had, was, that seeing his Fnemies came to take his Ships from him, he was driven to repulse that danger with fire, the which The great Liburnt the Arlenall where the Ships lay, and that notable Library of ALEXANDRIA withall. The brary of Alexthird danger was in the Battell by Sea, that was fought by the Tower of PHAR: where meaning to andria bunn. help his men that fought by Sea, he leapt from the Peer into a Boat. Then the ÆGYPTIANS made towards him with their Oars on every fide but he leaping into the Sea, with great hazard faved Casture twimmany towards thin with their oals on every new divers Books in his hand, he did never let them mine with go, but kept them always upon his head above water, and fwam with the other hand, notwith-Books in his standing that they shot marvellously at him, and was driven sometime to duck into the water: hand, howbeit the Boat was drowned prefently. In fine, the King coming to his men that made War with Cafar, he went against him, and gave him Battell, and wan it with great slaughter, and effufion of bloud. But for the King, no man could ever tell what became of him after. Thereupon Cafar made Cleopatra his Sifter, Queen of EGYPT, who being great with Chlid by him, was short- Cafar made Cafar made Cleopatra his Shrer, Queen of ALEXANDRIANS named Cafarion. From thence he went Queen of . Einto SYRIA, and fo going into Asia, there it was told him that Domitiu was overthrown in Bat-gipt. tell , by Pharnaces the Son of King Mithridates , and was fled out of the Realm of PONT with a Cafarion , Cafew men with him: and that this King Pharmaces greedily following his Victory, was not contented far Son, bewith the winning of BITHYNIA and CAPPADOCIA, but further would needs attempt to win AR-MENTA the lefs, procuring all those Kings, Princes, and Governours of the Provinces thereabours to rebell against the ROMANS. Thereupon Cafar went thither straight with three Legions and Casars Victor fought a great Battell with King Pharnaces by the City of ZELA, where he flew his Army, and drave ry of King him out of all the Realm of PONT. And because he would advertise one of his friends of the sud- Pharnaces. dainels of this Victory , he onely wrote three words unto Anitim at ROME : Veni , Vidi , Vici : to Cafarwineth gainers of this victory, he onerly whole three words ending all with like found and letter in the Latin, three words to wit, I came, I faw, I overcame. These three words ending all with like found have a certain thort grace more pleasant to the ear, then can be well expressed in any other Tongue. Victory. After this he returned again into ITALY, and came to ROME, ending his year for the which he was made Dictator the second time, which Office before was never granted for one whole year, but unto him. Then was he chosen Consull for the year following. Alterwards he was very ill spoken of, for that his Souldiers in a mutiny having flain two Prators, Cofconius and Galba; he gave them no other punishment for it, but instead of calling them Souldiers, he named them Citizens, and gave unto every one of them a thousand Drachma's a man, and great Possessions in ITALY. He was much milliked also for the desperate parts and madness of Dolabella, for the covetousness of Anitius, for the drunkenness of Antonius and Cornificus, which made Pompeys house be pulled down and builded up again, as a thing not big enough for him, wherewith the ROMAN'S were marvelloully offended. Cafar knew all this well enough, and would have been contented to have redressed them: but to bring this matter to pals, he pretended he was driven to serve his turn by fuch Instruments. After the Battell of PHARSALIA, Cato and Scipio being fled into AFRICK, C. fare journey King Juba joyned with them, and leavied a great puissant Army. Wherefore Cafar determined to into Africk amake War with them : and in the middeft of Winter, he took his journey into SICILE. There, gaint care and because he would take all hope from his Captains and Souldiers to make any long abode there, he went and lodged upon the very Sands by the Sea fide, and with the next gale of wind that came, he took the Sea with three thousand Footmen, and a few Horsemen. Then having put them aland, unawares to them he hoifed fail again to fetch the rest of his Army, being afraid lest they should meet with fome danger in passing over, and meeting them mid-way, he brought them all into his Camp. Where, when it was told him, that his Enemies trufted in an Ancient Oracle, which faid, that it was predestined unto the Family of Scipio's to be Conquerours in Africk : either of purpose to mock Scipio the Generall of his Enemies, or otherwise in good earnest to take the benefit of this Name (given by the Oracle) unto himself, in all the Skirmishes and Battels fought, he gave the charge of his Army unto a man of mean quality and account, called Scipio Salutius, who came of the Race of Scipio AFRICAN, and made him always Generall when he fought. For he was effloors compelled to weary and harry his Enemies: for that neither his men in his Camp had Corn enough, nor the Beafts Forrage, but the Souldiers were driven to take Sea-weeds, called Alga Fan washing Cafar troubles away the brackishness thereof with fresh Water, putting to it a little Herb called Dogs-tooth) to cast it to to their Horseto eat. For the Numidians (which are light Horsemen, and very ready of Alga and dog- fervice) being a great number together, would be on a suddain in every place, and spread all the took given to Fields over thereabout, fo that no man durst peep out of the Camp to go for Forrage. And one day as the men of Arms were staying to behold an AFRICAN doing notable things in dancing and eat.
